Civil Procedure Code, ss. 244, 291—Sale in execution of decree—Tender of debt by transferee of property—Question for Court executing decree—Separate suit.

Held that the assignees of a purchaser from a judgment-debtor of property, the subject matter of a decree for enforcement of hypothecation, were entitled to come in and protect the property from sale in execution of the decree by tendering the debt and costs under s. 291 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that the executing Court was bound to accept the money and stop the sale.

Held also, where the executing Court had refused to accept the money and the sale had taken place, that a suit by the assignees to set aside the sale and for a declaration of their right to come in under s. 291, was not barred by s. 244 of the Code.

THE facts of this case were as follows :—The defendants, Ganpat Rai and Shambhu Nath, in execution of a decree for enforcement of hypothecation of zamindari property, which they had obtained against Musammat Gaura, caused the property to be attached and advertised for sale. Subsequently, the decree-holders having failed to pay the necessary fee for the issue of the proclamation of sale, the case was struck off the file on the 17th September, 1884.

On the 18th December, 1884, the judgment-debtor conveyed her proprietary right in the property to one Kundan Lal by a deed of sale which was registered on the date of execution.

[2] On the 6th January, 1885, the defendants made a fresh application for execution of their decree, and by an order passed on the next day, the 20th February was fixed for sale of the property.

On the 18th February, 1885, Kundan Lal conveyed his rights under the deed of the 18th December, 1884, to the plaintiffs, Behari Lal, Bindraban, Tej Nath, Shambhu Nath, Rahman Bakhsh and Balram, by a deed of sale which was registered on the same date.

On the 20th February, the date fixed for the sale, the plaintiffs made an application under s. 291 of the Civil Procedure Code, to the Deputy Collector, who was the officer conducting the sale, for leave to pay the amount of the judgment-debt and costs into Court. This application was opposed by the decree-holder on the allegation that the sale in favour of the petitioners had not been completed, and that the judgment-debtor had denied her sale to Kundan Lal. The Deputy Collector passed the following order:—"I cannot give permission to the petitioners to deposit money on the part of the judgment-debtor in any Court, inasmuch as the decree-holders cannot receive it. The petitioners should seek relief formally in reference to their right of purchase." The petitioners thereupon renewed their application to the Court executing the decree, but the application was rejected. The sale then took place, and the property was purchased by the decree-holders themselves on the 20th February, 1885.

The plaintiffs then instituted the present suit, in which they prayed "that the plaintiffs' right to pay off the amount of the defendants' decree, as representatives of the judgment-debtor, be declared; and that by setting aside the sale of the 20th February, 1885, at which the defendants became the purchasers, a decree for the property in suit be passed in the plaintiffs' favour with costs."

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur) found that "the original vendor, Musammat Gaura, whose rights were under attachment and put up to sale, denied the sale executed by her." The material portion of the Court's judgment was as follows:—"In this case, when the plaintiffs offered to pay the money on the day fixed for sale, the defendants decree-holders, who represented the mortgagee, refused to receive the money, declaring the sale to be disputed and unadmitted. They were not bound, and [3] could not be compelled, to receive it. The Court could not receive the money in deposit and stay the sale by reason of such deposit. S. 291 does not contemplate the payment of money by a stranger asserting a disputed or unproved right in the property, and render it incumbent on the Court to receive it. As the decree-holders' refusal to receive the money and the Court's order not allowing it to be deposited were legally valid, and as the not staying of the sale was a necessary consequence thereof, the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief he seeks by his suit, nor is such a suit maintainable. Moreover, even if the sale alleged by the plaintiff had been admitted, he would not have been competent to bring a fresh suit. What he should have done was to apply to be made a party to the execution case." The Court accordingly dismissed the suit.

The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

The Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath, for the appellants.

The Hon. T. Conlan and Mr. C. H. Hill, for the respondents.

EDGE, C. J., and TYRRELL, J.—In this case the respondents had obtained a decree on a hypothecation-bond against Musammat Gaura. They attached her property in execution thereof, but not having paid the proper fees into Court, the Court made an order striking the execution off the list of pending cases. That was on the 17th September, 1884. On the 18th December following Musammat Gaura sold the property in question to Kundan Lal. That sale-deed was registered on the 18th February. Kundan Lal sold the property to the appellants-plaintiffs. That sale-deed was registered. On the 6th January, 1885, the respondents-decree-holders put in an application for execution against the property. The 20th February following was fixed for the sale. On the 20th February the appellants, acting under s. 291 of the Code of Civil Procedure, presented a petition for leave to pay the judgment-debt and costs into Court. That petition was opposed by the respondents, they raising a doubt as to the transfer. The Deputy Collector referred the case to the Court, which seems to have been close by. The application was then made to the Court, and was refused. The sale proceeded, and the decree-holders-respondents purchased on the same day. Upon that this suit was brought. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit, apparently on the ground that as Musammat Gaura had questioned the sale made by her, the appellants were not persons entitled to have the sale stayed by paying the money into Court. He also held that s. 244 barred the suit. This involved one question of fact and two questions of law. The question of fact was whether Musammat Gaura had sold the property to Kundan Lal. The evidence proved that she did, and had executed the sale-deed of the 18th December, 1884. When that deed was registered, she was identified by a person deputed by the Registrar for that purpose from the office. Mr. Conlan admits that he cannot dispute that the sale did take place. The first question of law is, whether the appellants, who were the assignees who purchased from Kundan Lal, who purchased from Musammat Gaura, were entitled to come in and protect the property by tendering the money under s. 291 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The only right of the decree-holders was to have this debt and costs paid to them, or to have the property sold to satisfy this judgment and costs. It is only as a matter of grace that a decree-holder is allowed to purchase at auction-sale at all. If the debt and costs are paid by a third person on behalf of the debtor, the decree-holder ceases to have any interest in the property, and the money so paid cannot be recovered from him. The judgment-debtor might object to the intervention of a third party, but that is not the present case. Indeed, we are strongly of opinion that if Musammat Gaura had attempted to interfere, the assignees would have been entitled to an injunction against her; and further, we think they would be entitled to use her name in paying the money into Court, because her rights had passed to her vendees. Consequently, we are of the opinion that the executing Court was bound to accept the money and stop the sale.

The only other point now remaining is, whether the case is governed by s. 244 or not. We think that the current of decisions shows that s. 244 does not apply to a case like this, and that current of decisions is opposed to the doctrine in the case cited to us (1). On these grounds we decree the appeal with costs, that is to say, the appellants should have a decree conditioned on payment into Court within thirty days of the judgment-debt and costs as it stood on the 20th February, 1885, at the first stage of the sale, minus the costs of this litigation.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[5] Before Mr. Justice Mahmood.

IJRAIL (Defendant) v. KANHAI AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs).*
[13th June, 1887.]

Jurisdiction—Civil and Revenue Courts—Suit for partition and possession of a share in a particular plot in a patti—Act XIX of 1873 (N. W. P. Land Revenue Act), ss. 135, 241 (f).

A suit by a co-sharer in a joint zamindari estate for partition and possession of his proportionate share of an isolated plot of land is not maintainable in a Civil Court, with reference to ss. 135 and 241 of the N.W.P. Land Revenue Act (XIX of 1873). Ram Dayal v. Megu Lal (1) distinguished.

THE plaintiffs in this case, Kanhai and Bhaggu, obtained a decree against the defendant, Ijrail, on the 14th September, 1882, declaring their proprietary right to a one-third share in a plot of land measuring 5 bighas 19 biswas, adversely to the plea of the defendant that the plot was sir land belonging exclusively to himself. They subsequently brought the present suit in the Court of the Munsif of Kaimganj, praying for actual partition and possession of the one-third share to which their decree had declared them entitled. The claim was described in the plaint as a claim for "possession by means of partition of a one-third share of 5 bighas and 19 biswas pucka." The plot in which the one-third share in suit was held was part of a patti measuring 203 bighas 11 biswas.

The defendant pleaded that partition of the plot could not be had without partition of the entire patti, but that partition of the entire patti could be claimed only in the Revenue Court, with reference to ss. 135 and 241 (f) of the North-Western Provinces Land Revenue Act, and that the Munsif had therefore no jurisdiction to entertain the suit.

The Munsif held that he had jurisdiction, observing as follows:—
"In my opinion the plaintiffs should not be prohibited from suing in this Court, as the claim refers to a very small portion of land out of their one-third share in a patti of the village, and the whole patti, as admitted by both parties, is 203 bighas and 11 biswas pucka. The provisions of the Revenue Act cannot be applicable to the partition of such small portions of land. Had [6] the plaintiff claimed his whole share of the patti in the village, he would have claimed it in the Revenue Court and applied for partition there. This view is supported by Ram Dayal v. Megu Lal (1). As the claim is not only for partition but for possession of the land too, there is no reason to doubt its validity." The Munsif, after considering the suit upon the merits, passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed to the District Judge of Farukhabad, who gave judgment as follows:—

"I am of opinion that this case is ruled by the judgment given in the precedent cited by the lower Court, viz., the case of Ram Dayal v. Megu Lal (1), and that the object sought by the plaintiffs does not require the intervention of the Collector for the purpose of giving effect to a decree previously obtained. The plaintiffs originally sued for a declaration that the plot of 5 bighas 19 biswas (now in suit) was not sir land belonging to the defendant, but that one-third of it belonged to them (the plaintiffs) and they obtained a decree on the 14th September, 1882. They now sue to get possession of this one-third share of this particular plot of land, and to get it by means of an actual physical partition of this plot. I do not think it was necessary for them to apply to the revenue authorities for a partition of their share in the whole estate in which they are co-parceners, inclusive of their zamindari right, in order to get their proportionate area of the plot in suit; and I therefore hold that they were entitled to sue in the Civil Court for possession of the land which the Civil Court had declared their right to. The other pleas of the appellants are futile, and the appeal is dismissed with costs."

* Second Appeal, No. 1960 of 1886, from a decree of W. H. Hudson, Esq., District Judge of Farukhabad, dated the 15th July, 1886, affirming a decree of Maulvi Muhammad Unwar Husain, Munsif of Kaimganj, dated the 12th May, 1886.

The defendant appealed to the High Court.

Maulvi Abdul Majid, for the appellant.

Babu Ratan Chand, for the respondents.

MAHMOOD, J.—This was an action for the understanding of which the following few facts are necessary :—The subject-matter of dispute between the parties is certain land constituting an area of 5 bighas 19 biswas of land, being the aggregate area of four plots, viz. Nos. 146, 337, 526, and 688 of pukhta or pucka measurement. These very plots were the subject-matter of litigation [7] between the parties upon a former occasion, in which litigation the parties being co-sharers of the land, the dispute was whether it did or did not form the private sir land of the present defendant-appellant, Ijrail. In that litigation Ijrail was unsuccessful and the final decree of the 14th September, 1882, declared that the plaintiffs-respondents now before me were entitled to a one-third share in the patti to which these lands appertain. Having obtained that decree the plaintiffs instituted this suit with the object of having these four plots of land specifically partitioned, upon the allegation that these lands were the joint property of the parties, and that circumstances had arisen which would entitle the plaintiffs to claim a separation of the shares for which they pray. Both the Courts below, feeling themselves bound by the adjudication of the 14th September, 1882, held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the one-third share in these plots, and with reference to the ruling of this Court, to which I was a party in the case of Ram Dayal v. Megu Lal (1), those Courts have held that such a suit was entertainable by the Civil Court. The main defence urged by the defendant-appellant in the Court below was that such an action virtually amounted to claiming partition of a portion of the mahal, irrespective of the other plots constituting the mahal; and he contended that although the plaintiffs were entitled to the one-third land, yet the share could not be separated in this isolated manner irrespective of the revenue law. Upon these grounds it was further contended by him that the action was not maintainable by the Civil Court. This contention having been disallowed by both the Courts below, the present second appeal repeats that contention, and I am of opinion that it has force. It is admitted on all hands that the parties are co-sharers of the patti in which these four plots are situate, also that these plots form part of numerous other plots of land situate in that same patti, also that all these plots are jointly owned by the parties along with other co-sharers of the patti, and this being so, the prayer contained in the plaint amounts simply to asking for a partition of four plots out of many more plots included in the zamindari property. By s. 241 of Act XIX of 1873 (the Land Revenue Act), matters of this description have been excluded from the jurisdiction of the Civil Court, and the reason of the law seems to be that if isolated plots are to be [8] brought into litigation for purposes of partition in this manner, the broad partition which can be effected only by a Revenue Court, such as is contemplated by ss. 107 to 139 of the Revenue Act, could not be properly worked. The only ruling upon which reliance is placed for the opposite view by Mr. Ratan Chand on behalf of the respondents is the ruling to which I have already referred. And as the judgment in that case was delivered by myself, I think I need only say that the effect of that judgment is simply to hold that when a Civil Court has passed a decree whereby certain trees were to be uprooted, without specifying the exact area from where the trees were to be uprooted, the Court executing that decree (behind which decree such Court could not go) could give effect to that decree without resorting to the provisions contained in s. 265 of the Code. I do not understand that ruling to mean that any co-sharer of a joint zamindari estate could, by suing for partition and division of isolated plots of land, bring about a state of things whereby it would (when the question arises before the Revenue Court) be extremely inconvenient, if not impossible, to duly effect a partition, such as the Revenue Act in s. 135 and in other sections contemplates. I hold, therefore, that the nature of the claim set forth in the plaint in this suit, and the defence set up thereto, gave rise to a dispute of such a character as could not be entertained by a Civil Court, and should have been dismissed upon this ground in limine. For these reasons I decree this appeal, setting aside the decrees of both the lower Courts. The plaintiff-respondent's suit will stand dismissed with costs in all the Courts.

Mr. G. T. Spankie, for the appellants.

Mr. W. S. Howell, for the respondent.

MAHMOOD, J.—Mr. Spankie, who has appeared on behalf of the defendants-appellants in this case, has conceded that in view of the ruling of this Court in the case of Nainsukh Rai v. Umadai (1), which followed the ruling of the Lords of the Privy Council in Pestonjee Nussurwanjee v. Manockjee and Co. (2), the first ground taken in the memorandum of appeal is not maintainable; and the learned counsel has also abandoned the third ground which appears in the memorandum of appeal. The only ground upon which he insists is the contention contained in the second ground of the memorandum of appeal; and in order to dispose of that contention it is necessary to refer to the following facts:—

The suit was for possession of certain zamindari shares, and it was instituted in August, 1884. On the 10th January, 1885, the parties agreed to refer the matter to arbitration, and on the same day the Court of first instance made an order referring the dispute to the arbitration of the persons named in the submission. Subsequently, on the 19th January, 1885, the defendants put in an application, complaining of the arbitrators, and praying that the case might be disposed of on the merits. On the 23rd January, 1885, an order was passed by the first Court to the effect that the objections raised by the defendants were not sufficient to disturb the submission, and that the proper time for presenting such objections was after the arbitration award. That award was made on the 16th February, 1885 and the defendants presented a second application containing their objections to the award, which objections charged the arbitrators with misconduct and corruption. Those objections were allowed by the Court of first instance, without going into the evidence on the allegations, on the 26th February, [10] 1885, and that Court proceeded to deal with the case upon the merits irrespective of the arbitration award of the 16th February, 1885. The result of such trial was to decree the claim in part. This decree was made on the 18th July, 1885, and from that decree an appeal was preferred by the plaintiff, and the lower appellate Court remanded the case under s. 566 of the Civil Procedure Code for inquiry as to whether the arbitration award of the 16th February, 1885, was valid with reference to the question raised by the defendants under s. 521 of the Civil Procedure Code. This order of remand was made on the 1st December, 1885, and the case going back to the Court of first instance, the defendants appear to have been served with notice calling upon them to produce evidence in the Court of first instance. But they did not do so, and the Court of first instance recorded its finding upon the issue remanded, finding that no such ground of complaint was proved as was contemplated by s. 521 of the Code, because the defendants had produced no evidence. Upon receipt of this finding the Court of first appeal held that the arbitration award of the 16th February, 1885, was not open to any legal objection; that it was valid and binding upon the parties, and holding this, that Court passed a decree in accordance with the terms of that award, thereby decreeing the whole claim of the plaintiff-respondent.

From that decree this second appeal has been preferred, and Mr. Howell, on behalf of the respondent, contends that the appeal does not lie, because under the last part of s. 522 of the Civil Procedure Code, the decree passed by the lower appellate Court, being in accordance with the award, is nonappealable. On the other hand, Mr. Spankie, relying upon the ruling of the Calcutta Court in the case of Pureshnath Dey v. Nobin Chunder Dutt (1), which was followed in the case of Rughoobur Dyal v. Maina Koer (2), contends that because the decree of the first Court was not in accordance with the arbitration award, the mere circumstance that the decree of the lower appellate Court reversing the decree of the Court of first instance gives effect to such award will not preclude the right of second appeal which would otherwise exist under the law. Then the learned counsel further argues that the Court of first instance, to which the case [11] was remanded under s. 566 of the Code, did not allow sufficient time to the defendants-appellants for producing evidence to prove the corruption and misconduct of the arbitrators, as they alleged in their petition of objections of the 18th February, 1885, and that therefore the non-production of evidence was matter to be dealt with as such, with reference to the allegations contained in the defendants-appellants' application of the 13th February, 1886, where they stated that one of the petitioners, had been seriously ill, and the other was taking care of the other appellant, and that only five days were allowed for production of evidence. I am of opinion that both the rulings upon which Mr. Spankie has relied supports his contention. But with due respect for the views of the learned Judges who decided those cases, I find myself unable to hold that the provisions of s. 521 or s. 522 of the Code are to be limited either to the Court of first instance or to the Court which makes the order referring the case to arbitrators. In neither of the rulings relied upon are there any reasons given for holding that those provisions are not available to the Court of appeal. It is conceded that if the Court of first instance in this case had disallowed the objections to the arbitration award taken by the defendants, and had passed a decree in accordance with the arbitration award, such a decree would have been final, under the last part of s. 522 of the Civil Procedure Code. What is contended is that a Court of first appeal when, in exercising its power as a Court of appeal empowered to deal with the merits, it does exactly what, if the Court of first instance did, would render the decree of that Court final, the decree of such appellate Court is not exempt from appeal under the last part of s. 522 of the Code. I am of opinion that the provisions of the whole of ss. 521 and 522 of the Code are applicable to the Court of first appeal by reason of the provisions of s. 582 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that when a Court of first instance wrongly sets aside an arbitration award, and passes a decree against the terms of such award, and a Court of appeal dealing with the merits of the case comes to the conclusion that the award was not open to any such objections as are contemplated by s. 521 of the Code, and upon that finding passes a decree strictly in conformity with the terms of such arbitration award, such decree of the Court of first appeal is entitled to the same [12] finality as a decree of the first Court would have been entitled to under the last part of s. 522 of the Code. This view seems to be supported by the fact that whilst cls. 25 and 26 of s. 588 of the Civil Procedure Code allow appeals from orders superseding an arbitration or modifying an award, no such appeal is allowed from orders passed under s. 521, disallowing objections to arbitration awards. The decree of the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court is, therefore, a decree which is in conformity with the award, because the judgment, of which it is the result, rejects the objections which were raised against such award under s. 521 of the Code. The decree is, therefore, final, and cannot be made the subject of second appeal any more than the decree of the first Court could have been made the subject of the first appeal if it had rejected the objections against the arbitration award and conformed with the requirements of s. 522 of the Civil Procedure Code.

(1) 12 W.R. 93.

The Code throughout gives to the Court of appeal all the powers that the Court of first instance has in connection with litigation; and if the question did arise as to the questions of minor detail, I should probably hold that the Court of first appeal has all the powers of a Court of first instance in dealing with references to arbitration, and disposing of objections to arbitration awards.

For these reasons I hold that the decree from which this appeal has been preferred is a final decree, and could not be appealed from; and this view, dissenting as it is from the ruling cited by Mr. Spankie, renders it unnecessary for me to consider the question whether, under the circumstances of this case, the lower Courts acted rightly in not allowing to the defendants-appellants further time for producing evidence to substantiate the objections contained in the application of the 18th February, 1885, in respect of the corruption or misconduct of the arbitrators. I dismiss this appeal with costs.

THE plaintiffs in this suit held certain lands under a lease which determined in 1289 fasli. Their lessor granted a lease to the defendants for a term commencing in 1290 fasli, and on the 15th October, 1882, the defendants took possession, demanded rents from the sub-tenants and received the rents and profits. The lessor had not given to the plaintiffs the written notice of ejectment required by s. 36 of the N.-W. P. Rent Act (XII of 1881). The plaintiffs subsequently obtained from the Revenue

Court an order putting them in possession, to which the defendants and the lessor were parties. The plaintiffs then brought the present suit for mesne profits in respect of rents and profits received by the defendants subsequently to 15th October, 1882.

The Courts below (Subordinate Judge and District Judge of Moradabad dismissed the claim, on the ground that the plaintiffs' lease had determined prior to the period for which mesne profits were claimed, and that the omission to issue notice of ejectment under s. 36 of the Rent Act was under the circumstances immaterial. The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

EDGE, C. J., (after stating the facts as above, continued):—It is contended that on the determination of the term in 1289 fasli the tenancy also determined. The Rent Act must be looked at to see if this contention is well founded. S. 36 of the Rent Act enacts that if the landholder desires to eject a tenant holding only for a limited period after the determination of his tenancy, he shall cause a written notice of ejectment to be served on the tenant under the provisions of the Act. Ss. 37 and 38 provide for the contents and method of serving such notice, and s. 39 gives the tenant a right within thirty days after the service of notice to contest his liability to be ejected, and provides the tribunal to determine such questions. Sub-clause (c) of s. 39 enacts that upon the determination of such questions adversely to the tenant or where no application under that section has been made, the "tenancy of the land in respect of which notice has been served shall cease." The only construction I can put on the section is that if the landlord has failed to give the notice required by s. 36, the tenancy is not to be treated in law as determined on the determination of the term provided by the lease, but is to be treated as subsisting. S. 40, I think, also leads to the same conclusion. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the tenancy did not determine on the determination of the term granted by the lease, and the defendants were wrong-doers in usurping possession and taking the rents and profits of the lands. The only question remaining is as to damages. It is admitted that the defendants have received Rs. 3,126. It is also admitted on both sides that Government Revenue, Rs. 1,147-13-10, has been paid, leaving a balance of Rs. 1,978-2-2. The defendants say that they have paid the landlord Rs. 875 and have incurred costs of collection of the rents. The Rs. 875 were not paid at the request of, or on behalf of the plaintiffs; they were paid by the defendants on their own behalf wrongly out of the moneys with which the defendants had no legal or equitable right to intermeddle. The payment, if made, is no answer to the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiffs say: You have wrongfully and in violation of my right [15] received Rs. 3,126. The defendants cannot claim being tort-feasors, to deduct the costs of the collection of money they have wrongfully collected. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs-appellants are entitled to a decree for Rs. 1,978-2-2 plus interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from the 17th February, 1883, to the date of this decree, and with costs here, and below, and 6 per cent. on the amount of this decree and costs until realization.

TYRRELL, J.—I entirely concur.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Mahmood.

MATUK DHARI SINGH (Judgment-debtor) v. ALI NAQI AND OTHERS

Occupancy tenancy—Sale by occupancy-tenant—Decree in favour of Zamindar against purchaser for mesne profits—Mesne profits how to be assessed.

Where in a suit against an occupancy-tenant and his vendee, the zamindar obtained a decree for cancelment of the deed of sale for possession of the land by ejectment, and for mesne profits from the date of suit to the date of recovery of possession, — held that the mesne profits awarded must be assessed as damages against the vendee as a trespasser, and that the proper measure of such damages was not the rent which was payable by the vendor, but the actual market-value of the land for the purpose of letting.

THE facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Court.

Kunwar Shivanath Sinha and Munshi Kashi Prasad for the appellant.

Mr. Niblett for the respondents.

MAHMOOD, J.—In arguing this appeal Mr. Kashi Prasad, who has appeared on behalf of Mr. Shivanath Sinha, has not pressed the second, third and the fourth grounds of appeal, and has confined his argument to the first and fifth grounds of appeal. I need not therefore deal with the case beyond the scope of these grounds in the memorandum of appeal.

The facts necessary to elucidate the questions raised are that one Jageshar and Musammat Abhlakhi were occupancy-tenants of the land to which this suit relates, and on the 20th February, 1882, [16] they executed a sale-deed whereby they conveyed their occupancy tenure to Matuk Dhari Singh, the present appellant before me. Thereupon the present respondents, who are zamindars of the village, sued the vendors and the vendee for the cancellation of the deed of sale, and also for possession of the land, but the prayer for ousting was limited to the ejectment of the vendee on the ground that the sale-deed under which he had purchased the tenure was illegal, by reason of the prohibition contained in s. 9 of the Rent Act. The suit was instituted on the 26th May, 1883, and the plaint included a prayer that the future mesne profits might be awarded as against the defendant-vendee, who was, according to the contention in the plaint, a trespasser upon the land by reason of the invalidity of the sale-deed under which he had entered into possession. The suit was decreed on the 17th January, 1884, but the decree by some oversight did not contain any award as to the future mesne profits claimed in the suit. This circumstance led to an application for amendment of the decree, and the application was granted on 15th January, 1886, whereby, in awarding the remedy, the decree specified that the plaintiffs who had succeeded were also to realize future mesne profits in respect of the land to which the suit related.

The decree having been so amended, the plaintiffs, decree-holders-respondents, before me obtained possession of the land, and on the 28th May, 1886, they presented the present application for execution of their decree for the purpose of realizing future mesne profits as the amended decree awarded,

The application was resisted upon the grounds, inter alia, that the future mesne profits to which the decree related referred only to a period subsequent to the date of the decree, and not to the period intervening between the institution of the suit and the passing of the decree; and in the next place, that the amount of mesne profits claimed by the decree-holder was excessive.

The decree-holders had claimed in the application for execution Rs. 369-6-0 as mesne profits for the year 1291 fasli; but the lower appellate court has found that the sum was extravagant, and that the real letting market value of the land would be Rs. 148-8-0, and this sum that Court has allowed as the proper amount [17] of mesne profits to which the respondents-decree-holders were entitled under the decree. The lower appellate Court has also held that the period to which such mesne profits related was the period from the date of the institution of the original suit up to the date when the decree-holders obtained possession of the land under the decree. The order of the lower appellate Court gives effect to these views, and it is from that order that this second appeal has been preferred to this Court.

The contention of the parties before me raises two questions for determination:—

1. Whether the future mesne profits awarded by the decree of the 17th January, 1884, as amended on the 15th January, 1886, are to be calculated for the period between the date of the suit up to the actual possession, or is limited to the interval between the passing of that decree and the date of possession of the decree-holders under that decree.

2. Whether in the assessment of mesne profits as damages for the purposes of ss. 211 and 212 of the Code, the mesne profits to be awarded are to be represented by such rents as the occupancy tenants, Jageshar and Musammatt Abhlakhi, paid to the zamindars, decree-holders, before the sale-deed of the 20th February, 1882, or by the actual market value of the land for the purposes of letting.

Upon the first point, having considered the matter, I am of opinion that the future mesne profits, which the decree awarded, relate to the whole period intervening between the date of the suit and the date of possession. This view is the same as that taken by the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court. But upon this point it is ingeniously argued by Mr. Kashi Prasad on behalf of the appellant, that the application of the 28th May, 1886, which prayed for execution of the decree and mesne profits claimed, contained the Hindustani words "zar kharcha wa wasilat mobad digri," that is to say, the costs and mesne profits subsequent to the passing of the decree of the 17th January, 1884. The original application, which is now before me, contains some words of amendment which seem to have been hurriedly made by the decree-holders' pleader, and which may possibly bear the interpre-[18]tation upon which Mr. Kashi Prasad insists. But having considered the matter, I think that the Hindustani words may be so read as to render the expression applicable to future mesne profits, calculated, not from the date of the decree, but from the date of the institution of the suit, namely, 26th May, 1883.

As to the second point, I confess I have had some difficulty in deciding the question because of a dictum in an unreported case decided by a Division Bench of this Court. But that case is not on all fours with the present, and I do not think it precludes me from expressing my own views as to the matter of the assessment of mesne profits. What is contended is, that according to law in a case of this kind the measure of damages when claimed as mesne profits is the rent which the zamindars could have realized from the occupancy-tenants who have by reason of an illegal sale, placed the vendee in possession, and that the amount of such damages should not be assessed upon any other principle. It is perfectly true that if the vendors of the deed of the 20th February, 1882, had never executed that deed, and had continued in possession of their occupancy holding, the plaintiffs-zamindars could not realize more than the rent due by those occupancy-tenants; but it does not follow therefrom that such rent is the measure of damages. When such damages are claimed against a person who, by taking an illegal sale from such occupancy-tenants acquires possession of the land, and, as such, holds possession, his position is no better than that of a trespasser. In this case the question has been pressed, because, whilst the decree-holders claimed no less than Rs. 369-6-0 as the amount of mesne profits, the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has fixed such mesne profits to amount only to Rs. 148-8-0 and the rent payable by the occupancy-tenants-vendors is only Rs. 37-3-0.

It has been ruled by me in the case of Debi Prasad v. Har Dyal (1) that the act of an occupancy-tenant in making a transfer which would be void under the law as contained in s. 9 of the Rent Act, is not such an act as would involve forfeiture of the tenure and ejectment of the occupancy-tenant under cl. (b) of s. 93 of the Rent Act. The view there expressed has been approved by the present learned Chief Justice of this Court in the case of Fatima [19] Begam v. Hansi (2), and has since been adhered to by me in the more recent case of Mul Chand v. Pitam (3): but those views relate more to a case in which the zamindar, in consequence of an invalid transfer made by an occupancy-tenant, seeks to oust such tenant by process of the Rent Court, than to a case of this kind, where a decree has already been made, rightly or wrongly, in a regular suit awarding possession to the zamindars of the holding of an occupancy-tenant, which holding such tenant had invalidly sold. As a Court executing the decree cannot go behind the decree itself, I must take it that the decree now sought to be executed was a decree properly passed, though I am not prepared to express any opinion as to whether the effect of that decree is to terminate the occupancy tenure of Jageshar and Musammatt Abhlakhi. So far as the immediate question now under consideration is concerned, it seems to me that the mesne profits awarded must be assessed as damages against the present appellant with reference to his character of having been in possession under an invalid sale-deed, and thus a trespasser upon the land. It seems to me that the proper measure of damages is not the rent which was payable by the occupancy-tenant to the zamindar, a rent subject to its own peculiar statutory limitations, but the proper market value of the land for the purposes of leasing. That value has been found to be Rs. 148-8 per annum; and this sum, therefore, represents the loss occasioned by the wrongful act of the present appellant in getting into possession of the land under an invalid sale-deed from the occupancy-tenants.

For these reasons, agreeing with the conclusions at which the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has arrived, I dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Held that an assignment by endorsement of a registered bond hypothecating certain crops was a transaction relating to moveable property, and registration of such endorsement was not required by s. 17 of the Registration Act (III of 1877) or s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882); and that a suit by the assignee to enforce the hypothecation was not a Small Cause Court suit within the meaning of s. 6 of Act XI of 1865, in which a second appeal would be barred by s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code. *Surajpal Singh v. Held also that the assignment was not void by reason that notice thereof was not proved to have been given to the obligor, inasmuch as the effect of s. 131 of the Transfer of Property Act was merely to suspend the operation of the assignment up to the time when such a notice was received; that in this case the assignment would come into operation against the obligor when he became aware of it by the institution of the suit; and that if he had prior notice, and sold the property to bona fide transferees for value without notice either of the charge created by the bond or of the assignment, such transferees would be protected from liability. *Lala Jugdeo Sahai v. THE facts of this case were as follows:—Chandan Singh, defendant No. 1, executed a deed in lieu of Rs. 100 in favour of Muhammad Husain Khan, defendant No. 2, on the 17th July, 1885, and as collateral security hypothecated certain property described in the deed as “khet-naishakar” (literally, “a field of sugarcane”). The deed was duly registered, and subsequently, on the 13th October, 1885, the obligee of the bond, Muhammad Husain Khan, defendant No. 2, made an endorsement on the deed purporting to sell or assign the bond to Kalka Prasad, the plaintiff-appellant in this case. The endorsement was, however, neither stamped nor registered. [21] In the meantime Chandan Singh cut down the crops of sugarcane and sold the same to Mendu Khan, defendant No. 3, and Imam Ali, defendant No. 4.

The present suit was commenced by the plaintiff on the 2nd March, 1886, having for its object the recovery of the money due upon the bond of the 17th July, 1885, either from Chandan Singh, defendant No. 1, or his vendees, defendants Nos. 3 and 4, who had purchased the sugarcane. The suit was met by the plea that the endorsement of the 13th October, 1885, being unregistered, could not have transferred the bond to the plaintiff, and this view having been accepted by the Court of first instance (Munsif of Shahjahanpur), the suit was dismissed by that Court without going into the evidence. That Court regarded the bond of the 17th July, 1885, as one hypothecating immoveable property, and, as such, requiring registration under s. 17 of the Registration Act (III of 1877), the absence of such registration vitiating the sale itself under s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882). On appeal, the lower appellate Court (District Judge of Shahjahanpur) not only upheld this view, but held that the sale was in itself invalid by reason of the fact that the obligee of the bond of the 17th July, 1885, Muhammad Husain, in transferring it to the plaintiff, Kalka Prasad, never gave notice to the obligor, Chandan Sing, and that therefore the transfer was bad with reference to the provisions of s. 131 of the Transfer of Property Act.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court. The further facts of the case, and the arguments on both sides, sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the appellant.

Lala Lalta Prasad, for the respondents.

MAHMOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above, continued) :—Pandit Sundar Lal, in supporting this second appeal, has contended in an able argument, that the judgments of both the lower Courts are erroneous because, in the first place, what was hypothecated in the bond of the 17th July, 1885, was not the land, but only the sugarcane crop of the field, and the hypothecation therefore related only to moveable property within the meaning of cl. (6) of s. 2 of the General Clauses Act (I of 1868), and s. 3 of the Registration [22] Act (III of 1877), and s. 2 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), and that therefore no registration of the document was required either by s. 17 of the Registration Act, or s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act, so far as the endorsement of the 13th October, 1885, transferring the bond to the plaintiff, was concerned.

Before proceeding further, I may at once say that no question arises as to the absence of stamp upon that endorsement, because a penalty thereon has already been taken under s. 34 of the Stamp Act, and the validity of such penalty cannot be questioned in appeal at this stage under the same section.

A preliminary objection has been taken by Mr. Lalta Prasad, on behalf of the respondents, to the hearing of this appeal, upon the ground that even if the appellant's contention in this Court be valid and the property hypothecated in the bond now sued upon be taken to be only the crops, and, as such, moveable property, no such suit can be made the subject of second appeal, as it is of the nature of a Small Cause Court suit within the meaning of s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code; and, in support of this contention, the learned pleader relies upon a ruling of the Madras High Court in Appavu Pillai v. Subroya Muppen (1), where Scotland, C.J., and Holloway, J., said :—"There is nothing, in our opinion, in the Small Cause Courts Act to prevent the pledgee enforcing his security on moveable property. The Court, having jurisdiction in a suit for the recovery of such property, has clearly jurisdiction to enforce a contract pledging such property." On the other hand, Pandit Sundar Lal contends that the suit is not of the nature of the Small Cause Court suit contemplated by s. 6 of Act XI of 1865, and in support of this view he cites the case of Ram Gopal Shah v. Ram Gopal Shah (2) and also a recent ruling of this Court in Surajpal Singh v. Jairamgir (3), where my brethren Straight and Tyrrell concurred in holding that a suit which sought to recover a sum of money by enforcement of hypothecation of certain cattle by their attachment and sale was a suit not cognizable by the Small Cause Court, and, as such, could be made the subject of an appeal.

[23] In this state of authority, before I can consider the remaining part of the case, I have to determine first—Whether the bond of the 17th July 1885, hypothecated the sugarcane crops only or also the land; secondly—If the hypothecation related only to the crops, whether the present appeal is maintainable at all as a second appeal, within the meaning of s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code, considering that the amount claimed is below Rs. 500.

Upon the first of these questions I am of opinion, having read the original deed, that what was intended to be hypothecated was not the field itself, but only the crops of that field, and Pandit Sundar Lal's contention is sound that such crops are moveable property, and that the deed, therefore, did not require registration. It seems to me that in the expression "khet-naishakar," the word khet, which means field, was intended to indicate simply a measure, such as in the expression "a pint of milk:" the pint is used simply as a measure, and not as a physical pint by which such measurement is made. "Khet-naishakar" means the particular field specified in the deed whereon the naishakar or sugarcane which was hypothecated under the bond was standing.

This conclusion is supported by the circumstance that Chandan Singh is only a tenant in the village, the present plaintiff is representing the zamindar in that same village, and the executant of the bond was not to be expected to be dealing with the field or hypothecating the land. This being so, the hypothecation was of moveable property and not of immoveable property.

As to the second question, I have already cited the somewhat conflicting rulings upon which the learned pleaders for the parties have relied, and without expressing any personal opinion of my own upon the particular question, I need only say that, sitting here as a single Judge, I do not think I should, without very strong reasons to the contrary, depart from a Division Bench ruling of this Court, such as that of my brothers Straight and Tyrrell, in Surajpal Singh v. Jairamgir (1), and I therefore follow it and hold that this was not a Small Cause Court suit within the meaning of s. 6 of Act XI of 1865, and that, therefore, this second appeal did lie to this Court, notwithstanding the provisions of s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code.

[24] I now proceed to deal with the case itself, having taken cognizance of it in second appeal. In doing so I have to consider the provisions of chapter VIII of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882). I have already shown that the Court of first instance was wrong in dismissing the suit simply for want of registration of the endorsement of the 13th October, 1885, whereby the bond of the 17th July, 1885, was sold to the present plaintiff. The lower appellate Court's view virtually amounts to holding that the plaintiff, not having proved that he or his vendor gave notice of the transfer to the debtor, Chandan, the transfer itself was void. This view seems to me to be erroneous in law. In the common law of England the assignee of a debt was in old days bound to sue in the name of his assignor, a procedure which was inconsistent with the fact of the transfer, and inconsistent also with the rules of equity applicable to such matters.

(1) 7 A. 855.

What the doctrines of equity required was that a debtor, when the obligation which he owed to his obligee had been transferred by the latter to another person, should be entitled to a notice of such transfer in order to be protected from having to pay the money in fulfilment of the obligation over again to the assignee, after having paid to the original assignor. That rule has found formulation in our statute law in s. 131 of the Transfer of Property Act, which says:—"No transfer of any debt or any beneficial interest in moveable property shall have any operation against the debtor or against the person in whom the property is vested, until express notice of the transfer is given to him, unless he is a party to, or otherwise aware of, such transfer, and every dealing by such debtor or person, not being a party to or otherwise aware of, and not having received express notice of a transfer, with the debt or property, shall be valid as against such transfer."

This is the quintessence of what Courts of Equity in England have repeatedly held, and the effect of this section is clear enough, and it would govern the transfer of the bond of the 17th July, 1885, under the endorsement of the 13th October, 1885, purporting to sell the same bond to the present plaintiff. It is necessary to bear in mind, in the first place, that although this section expressly renders necessary the giving of express notice to the debtor, and although it suspends [25] the operation of such a transfer as against such a debtor up to the time when such notice is given to the debtor, it contains no provisions invalidating such transfer when no such notice is given. That is to say, in other words, there is nothing in this section which would justify the contention that the transfer is ab initio void for want of such notice as that section contemplates.

All that that section requires is that when an obligation is transferred by the obligee to another person, the obligor who has to fulfil such obligation is not to be subject to any liability thereunder at the instance of the transferee without such debtor having received notice of the transfer. As to the notice itself, the section does not limit that to "express notice," but to the broader doctrine of notice as understood in equity, because the words of the section are—"unless he is a party to or otherwise aware of such transfer." The last phrase is broad enough to bring under the purview of the section all cases in which the knowledge of the transfer in an ascertainable form has reached the debtor. The latter part of the section is, of course, intended to protect a debtor who, without knowledge of the transfer of the obligation by the obligee to another person, fulfils the obligation, and is subsequently sued by the assignee of such an obligee as fraudulently accepts the fulfilment notwithstanding such assignment; and the same rule is also applied to persons, other than the debtor himself, and those who, being bona fide persons, acquire rights or any beneficial interest in moveable property in the absence of any kind of notice of the transfer of the debt by the original obligee to another person.

These views are applicable to the present case; because the mere absence of any express notice to Chandan on the one hand would not vitiate the endorsement of the 13th October, 1885, whereby the bond was sold to the present plaintiff, Kalka Prasad, although the operation of such transfer, as against Chandan, would be regulated in accordance with the time when the said Chandan obtained knowledge as to such transfer. Similarly, even if Chandan had notice of the transfer, and sold the moveable property subject to the plaintiff's bond to Mendu Khan, defendant No. 3. and Imam Ali, defendant No. 4, these two persons in the position of bona fide transferees for value without notice either of the charge [26] which the bond of the 17th July, 1885, may have created upon the crops or of the transfer of that bond in favour of the plaintiff, would undoubtedly be protected from any liability arising out of the action of Chandan in selling the sugarcane to them under such circumstances.

But the pleadings of the parties in this case raised questions of fact which required determination before the case could have been finally disposed of. First of all it was pleaded by Chandan Singh, the original obligor of the bond of the 17th July, 1885, that he had paid up the amount due under the bond to the original obligee, Muhammad Husain, and that the transfer of the 13th October, 1885, was not a real but simply a colourable transaction in which no consideration passed, and that Kalka Prasad was not the real purchaser of the bond, and, as such, not entitled to maintain the action. There was no allegation as to any information having been given to Chandan Singh in respect of the alleged transfer, and the suit appears to have been brought without any kind of notice having been issued as required by s. 131 of the Transfer of Property Act.

The lower Courts, however, taking the erroneous view of law which they have done in the case, have not gone into the merits. The view of the lower appellate Court as to the absence of notice is itself based upon a misapprehension of the interpretation of s. 131 of the Transfer of Property Act. I have already said that that section does not vitiate the transfer of a debt, but that it only postpones its operation in accordance with the date of the knowledge of such transfer reaching the debtor. In a recent case, Lala Jugdeo Sahai v. Brij Behari Lal (1), a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court had to consider the exact effect of that section, and the learned Judges there held, in conformity with the cases cited in White and Tudor's Leading Cases, 4th edition, Vol. II, pp. 776-777, as notes to the leading case of Ryall v. Rowles, that whilst notice is not a condition precedent to the validity of a transfer of a debt such as contemplated by s. 131 of the Transfer of Property Act, the section only fixes the time with reference to notice when such transfer would come into operation as against [27] the debtor. The case before the learned Judges was one where an assignee of a mortgagee brought a suit on the mortgage against the mortgagor and the mortgagee, and no notice of the assignment had been given to the mortgagor under s. 131 of the Transfer of Property Act. The learned Judges held that the Court was wrong in dismissing the suit merely on the ground that no notice was served, as after the suit was instituted the mortgagor became aware of the assignment, and the transfer accordingly came into operation on the date when he thus became aware of it. I agree in this view of the law, and I hold that in the present case the mere absence of an express notice having been served by the plaintiff would not render the action unmaintainable.

Under these circumstances, I hold that neither of the Courts below has tried the case upon the merits, and in my opinion the proper course is to decree this appeal, to set aside the decrees of both the lower Courts, and to remand the case for trial de novo on the merits, with reference to the observations which I have made. The remand will be under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code, and under the last part of that section I may point out that the Court should try, in the first place, whether the assignment of the 13th October, 1885, was a real and genuine assignment or not; and in the second place, whether Chandan Singh actually had paid the money due on the bond of the 17th July, 1885, to Muhammad Husain, either before such assignment or thereafter at a time when he had no notice of the assignment. Thirdly, whether the defendants Mendu Khan and Imam Ali, Nos. 3 and 4, had no notice either of the sugarcane crops being hypothecated under the bond of the 17th July, 1885, or of that bond having been transferred by Muhammad Husain to the present plaintiff, and whether their action in purchasing the crops was bona fide or not.

The costs will abide the result.

Practice—Remand by lower appellate Court under Civil Procedure Code, s. 566—No objections filed by plaintiffs under 567—Objections raised for the first time in second appeal by plaintiffs—Such objections not entertainable.

Objections which might have been, but were not, made under s. 567 of the Civil Procedure Code in a lower appellate Court to the findings on remand of the Court of first instance, cannot be raised for the first time as grounds of second appeal from the lower appellate Court's decree.

THE facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Mahmood, J.

Shah Asad Ali, for the appellants.

Lala Juala Prasad, for the respondent.

MAHMOOD, J.—This was an action for recovery of rent, and was dealt with by the Court of first instance in a judgment dated the 16th February, 1885, the effect of which was to decree the claim in part. From that decree the plaintiffs appealed to the lower appellate Court, and that Court, by an order dated the 4th September, 1885, remanded the case under s. 566 for findings on no less than nine issues. The Court of first instance, in an elaborate order of the 8th January, 1886, recorded findings upon these issues, and re-submitted these to the lower appellate Court. To these findings no objection was taken by the present plaintiffs-appellants, but the defendant-respondent before me took objections, and the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court, in dealing with them, disallowed them for the reasons stated in his judgment, and upholding the findings of the Court of first instance, dismissed the appeal on the 29th May, 1886.

This appeal has been preferred, not by the defendants, whose objections to the findings of the first Court were disallowed by the Judge of the lower appellate Court, but by the plaintiffs, who never took any objections at all to the findings of the first Court upon remand. The grounds now urged are such as might have been taken as objections, s. 567 of the Code, to the findings of the [29] Court of first instance upon remand. These objections never having been urged before the lower appellate Court, the Court has naturally not dealt with these points, taking it for granted that the present (plaintiffs-appellants) had no objections to urge.

Under these circumstances, I do not think that, hearing this appeal as a second appeal, I can for the first time allow those objections to be taken here as grounds of second appeal.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

An administration-bond executed by an administrator in accordance with s. 256 of the Succession Act is not an instrument of the kind referred to in the exception to s. 74 of the Contract Act, so as to make the obligor liable, upon breach of the condition thereof to pay the whole amount mentioned therein; and an assignee of the bond under s. 257 of the Succession Act cannot recover more damage than he proves to have resulted to himself or to those interested in the bond.

Held therefore, where neither the assignee of such a bond nor any one else had suffered any damage by reason of the breach of a condition requiring the obligor to file an inventory of the estate within a specified period, that the assignee was not entitled to recover from the obligor any compensation in respect of such breach.

THE facts of this case were as follows:—On the 23rd January, 1883, one Marcar Chater took out letters of administration to the estate of one J.R. Shircore, and on the same date executed an administration-bond in favour of the District Judge of Agra, in accordance with the provisions of s. 256 of the Succession Act (X of 1865). One John Owen joined in the execution of the bond as surety. The amount of the bond was Rs. 7,000; and the executants made themselves jointly and severally liable to the District Judge of Agra for the time being, engaging for the due collection and administration of the estate according to law, and to make a true inventory of the estate and to exhibit the same in the District Court on or before the 22nd January, 1884.

[30] Application was subsequently made to the District Judge by certain creditors of the estate, namely, the plaintiff, Seth Lachman Das, Chhotay Lal, Nand Ram, and Hardwar Nath, under s. 257 of the Succession Act, representing that the engagement to file the inventory on or before the 22nd January, 1885, had not been kept; and by an order dated the 15th June, 1885, the Judge assigned the bond to the plaintiff, Seth Lachman Das, on the ground that the conditions of the bond had been broken in the following respects:—(i) that the inventory had not been exhibited within the time prescribed, (ii) that accounts had not been properly presented, (iii) that the assets had not been applied within a reasonable time to the satisfaction of the claims of creditors. The plaintiff then brought the present suit against Chater and Owen, to recover "for himself and as trustee for all persons interested in the estate of the deceased," Rs. 7,000, the amount of the bond. The suit was instituted in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Agra on the 5th December, 1885. Meanwhile, on the 4th February, 1885, the defendants had filed the inventory of the estate in the Court of the District Judge.

The defence was in effect that the engagements of the bond had been substantially fulfilled, that the estate had been duly administered and all the debts paid except that of the plaintiff and one other creditor who had refused to accept the dividends offered to them, that the entire assets were Rs. 3,300, and that the plaintiff could not in any event recover more than that amount.

The substantial portion of the Subordinate Judge's judgment was as follows:—

“There can be no doubt that an inventory was not exhibited on or before the 22nd January, 1884, as required by the bond, or within six months from the grant, as required by s. 277 of the Indian Succession Act. And it is also an undisputed fact that the accounts were not presented in proper form. It was not until the 4th February, 1885, that the administrator, Mr. Chater, submitted an inventory and an account to the District Judge through the post. The requirements of the rules prescribed by the High Court for the presentation of inventories and accounts (Civil Rules and Orders, p. 146) were not fulfilled in any respect.

[31] “It is contended that mere failure to submit an inventory and accounts in time was not sufficient to pronounce the bond forfeited, and this intention seems to be valid. In matters like these, the practice of the Courts in England should be the best guide. It was held in Crowley v. Chipp (1), quoted in Williams on Executors and Administrators, p. 511, that ‘the Court might, in its discretion, decline to make any order, notwithstanding it was clear that there had been a breach of the bond. On that occasion an administratrix had not exhibited an inventory and accounts within the time assigned by her administration-bond, but no proceedings had been instituted against her for the purpose of calling for an inventory. An application was made to the Ecclesiastical Court by a creditor of the deceased, for an order that the bond might, be ‘attended with,’ for the purpose of being sued upon at law; and it was contended that since the non-delivery of the inventory at or before the day specified in the bond clearly constituted a breach of the condition, the Court ought to order the bond to be delivered out. But Sir H. Jenner Fust said that he should be extremely unwilling in any case upon the mere non-delivery of an inventory to allow the bond to be ‘attended with,’ and he refused to make any order until the parties should have cited the administratrix to bring in an inventory. She afterwards brought one in, whereupon the Court dismissed the parties. In another case, cited at page 518, the Court refused to permit the bond to be put in suit, on the ground that an inventory and account had not been called for from the administrator. These cases are clear authorities in support of the defendants’ contention that the mere non-delivery of an inventory and account do not justify the forfeiture of the bond. The reasons which would induce a forfeiture appear to be that ‘the administrator has not delivered a true and perfect inventory, or that he has not made a just and true account.’ (Williams, page 546.) In this case, when the administrator omitted to submit his inventory and account, the proper course would have been, as was done in the case cited above, to call upon him to file an inventory. But this was not done. He did subsequently file an inventory and accounts. They were not, it is true, verified before a zilla Judge or Justice of the peace, but the defendant, Mr. Chater, has, in this suit sworn to their correctness. He has [32] pledged his oath that the inventory is true and complete, and that the account is true and correct. The plaintiff has not attempted to show that the defendant’s allegations are untrue in regard to any item except one, namely, Mr. Shircore’s law books. It is said that the books were valuable, and were removed to Calcutta in order that they might fetch a higher price. Mr. Chater has sworn that he sent the books to Mackenzie, Lyall and Co., a well-known firm of auctioneers in Calcutta, for sale, and that he has entered in his accounts the amount which was received by him as the proceeds of the sale. There is nothing to contradict his sworn statement; and although the books may have been sold for less than their proper value, it cannot be said that he was at all to blame in the matter. The correctness of no other item has been impugned. I accordingly hold that the inventory and accounts submitted by the defendants are true and correct, and that there has been no breach of the conditions of the bond in respect of inventory and accounts such as to induce a forfeiture of it.

"The only other ground on which the bond has been pronounced forfeited is that the assets have not been applied to the payment of debts within a reasonable time. This breach is not, it seems, a valid ground for forfeiture. It is laid down in Williams on Executors and Administrators, page 547, that "it is no ground of forfeiture that the administrator has not paid the debts of the intestate, and therefore a creditor could not sue upon the bond and assign for breach the non-payment of a debt to him. There has not, it appears, been any culpable negligence on the part of the defendant in regard to the payment of debts. The defendant swears that, shortly after the death of Mr. Shircore, his household effects were sold in Agra. An advertisement was published in the Pioneer, and the claims of some of the creditors were received. In 1884, the defendant states he was in bad health and was obliged to go to Darjeeling, and therefore nothing was done. That he did actually go to Darjeeling also appears from the plaintiff's application to the District Judge, dated 4th November, 1884. In February, 1885, the defendant published a second advertisement in the Pioneer, and several claimants appeared. Among these were the plaintiffs Seth Lachman Das and Hira Lal, proprietor of the firm of Chhotay Lal, Nand Ram, who sent to the defendant affidavits in support of their claims in March, 1885. In August, 1885, the defendant gave notice to all the creditors whose claims had been admitted, and among the persons to whom notices were given were the plaintiffs, Seth Lachman Das, Chhotay Lal, Nand Ram and Hardwar Nath, the three persons who had moved the District Judge to assign the bond. All the registered creditors, including Hardwar Nath, have received dividends and granted receipts.....The only persons who refused to do so were the plaintiff and Hira Lal, proprietor of the firm Chhotay Lal, Nand Ram. So that, except two of the creditors, the rest have been paid. The non-payment to these creditors is owing to their own laches. They themselves neglected to send in their claims, although all creditors had been called upon to do so, and it is therefore their own fault that they have not been paid. Besides, 'a bond could only be enforced for the general benefit of persons interested in the estate of the intestate, and not for the non-payment of a particular debt.' (Williams on Executors, p. 549.) As all the persons interested in the estate except two have been paid, the bond cannot be enforced on the ground that these two persons have not been paid. For the above reasons, the grounds for which the bond was forfeited were not such as could induce its forfeiture."

The Court accordingly dismissed the suit. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

Mr. G.T. Spankie and Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri, for the appellant
Mr. J. E. Howard, for the respondents.

EDGE, C. J.—This is an action on an administration bond. The defendants are the administrators; the bond was for Rs. 7,000, and one of the conditions was that the administrators should make a true inventory of the estate and exhibit the same at the Court of the Judge of Agra on or before the 22nd January, 1884. The condition to which I have referred is the one relied on in this appeal. As a matter of fact the administrator did not exhibit his inventory in the Court of Agra until February, 1885. The bond was a bond given in accordance with s. 256 of the Indian Succession Act. It was assigned to the plaintiff under s. 257 of the Act. The case came on for trial before the Subordinate Judge of Agra. He [34] dismissed the suit, thinking that no substantial breach of the bond had been proved. I am of opinion that the failure to exhibit the inventory was a breach of a condition of the bond. It is an important matter in the administration of an estate that the administrator should file his account in proper time. It is contended that as there had been a breach which has been admitted, of the bond, the amount recoverable was the sum of Rs. 7,000 mentioned in the bond. It is said that the bond in question was one which came within the exception of s. 74 of the Contract Act, and consequently the whole sum mentioned in the bond became payable on the breach. I think the bond referred to in that exception is of the class of which an illustration is given in the illustrations to the section, and that the bond in question does not come within that exception. If an administration-bond came within that exception, and on breach of any of the conditions of the bond the whole amount of the bond became payable, the result might be that the creditors and heirs of an intestate might receive more, so far as the creditors were concerned, than their debts, and so far as the heirs were concerned, than the balance of the estate in the hands of the administrators. To take a case, assume that an administrator having given a bond like that in this case has fully administered the estate and paid all the creditors the utmost farthing owing to them and has handed over to the legal representatives the balance which remained in his hands after deduction of the debts of the intestate. There would be in that case no creditors interested in the performance of the conditions of the bond. By interested I mean pecuniarily interested, and the only person who could be interested would be the heir; but neither the creditor nor the heir would have suffered loss by breach of the conditions. If under such circumstances the assignee of the bond would be entitled to recover the full amount mentioned in the bond, what was to become of it? It could not be paid to the creditors, who had no longer any interest and had suffered no loss. The plaintiff could not retain it himself, unless he could show that he had been damaged. The heir could not be entitled in justice or common sense to be paid money recovered as compensation for a damage he had not suffered. It appears to me that in an action brought on the breach of a bond of this description the plaintiff [35] cannot recover more damage than he has proved to have resulted to himself or those interested in the bond on which he relies. In this case the plaintiff has not, nor has any one else, suffered any damage whatever. The inconvenience which the plaintiff and the others may have suffered was not caused by the breach complained of, but by reason of their having failed to send in their claims and accept the dividends which were offered to them. I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs, and I think it is a case that should never have been brought. It is not contended that the inventory when filed was other than true and complete, nor is it contended that the account was not correct. This being so, the delay in exhibiting the inventory in the District Judge's office, though it would be reprehensible if it could have been avoided, would not, I think, by itself entitle the appellant to succeed in a case like the present to recover the penalty of the administration bond.

This was a suit to recover a proportionate share of the assets realized in execution of a decree held by the defendants, the plaintiffs having previously made an application in the execution department to the same effect under s. 295 of the Civil Procedure Code, and the application having been rejected. The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Edge, C.J.

Mr. G. T. Spankie and Mr. W. M. Colvin, for the appellants.

The Hon. T. Conlan and Maulvi Abdul Majid, for respondents.

EDGE, C.J.—In this action the plaintiffs claim under s. 295 of the Civil Procedure Code to share rateably in the proceeds of a sale effected in the execution of decrees of the defendants. The facts are shortly these:—On the 9th August, 1884, the defendants obtained two money decrees against Balmukand, Ram Sarup and Piare Lal. On the 19th January, 1885, the plaintiffs obtained two decrees against the same persons and one Rao Sahib Singh.

* Second Appeal, No. 617 of 1886, from a decree of J. Sladen, Esq., District Judge of Bareilly, dated the 31st March, 1886, reversing a decree of Maulvi Muhammad Qayum, Subordinate Judge of Bareilly, dated the 27th November, 1885.

(1) 9 C. 920, (2) 12 C. 298. (3) 5 A. 566. (4) 11 C. 718.

The defendants obtained an attachment under their decrees against the property of Balmukand and obtained an order that the property should be brought to sale on the 20th April, 1885. On the 10th April, 1885, the plaintiff applied for an attachment under the decrees against the property of Balmukand, and on the 16th April following they applied for an order to enable them to share rateably in the proceeds of the defendants' execution.

The Subordinate Judge decreed the plaintiffs' claim. On appeal, the District Judge of Bareilly dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. From that dismissal the present appeal is brought. The decrees of the plaintiffs, obtained on the 19th January, 1885, did not specifically decree that any property of Balmukand should be brought to sale. It is not necessary to consider the nature of those decrees as affecting the other judgment-debtors or their property, further than to say that the plaintiffs could have executed, if they had chosen, their decrees against the property of the other people affected directly by [37] the decrees, that is to say, against the property of other judgment-debtors specifically ordered to be sold by those decrees.

On behalf of the defendants it has been contended that the decrees in question of the plaintiffs were not decrees for money within the meaning of s. 295 of the Civil Procedure Code, even against Balmukand, because under them the lien of the plaintiffs could have been enforced against the judgment-debtors, other than Balmukand.

It was also contended that the decrees in question were not against the same judgment-debtor, because there was a fourth judgment-debtor, Rao Sahib Singh, affected by the plaintiffs' decrees, who was not affected by the decrees of the defendants.

It was also contended that the plaintiffs were bound in law before having recourse against the property of Balmukand to proceed against the hypothecated property of the other judgment-debtors. It was also urged on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiffs sold and purchased some of the property of the other judgment-debtors decreed to be sold by their decrees. The latter point is one as to which there has been no evidence brought to our attention. Apparently there is no evidence as to when or for what amount, whether reasonable or otherwise, these alleged sales and purchases took place. In fact, we have got no information on which we can act as to the sales. The question was not raised in the written statement, and is one which, even if there had been any evidence in support of it, would merely relate to the amount in respect of which the plaintiffs could claim to share rateably. In support of the contention that the plaintiffs were bound in law to have recourse first to the property of the other judgment-debtors directed to be sold under their decrees, the defendants rely on the case of Wali Muhammad v. Turab Ali (1) decided by my brother Mahmood and Mr. Justice Straight. We need not discuss that case. It has no bearing on this case. We have in Johari Mal v. Sant Lal (2) explained that case. It was obviously one of fraud, which required the interference of the equitable jurisdiction of this Court.

No question of fraud arises in this case; therefore there is nothing in law or in equity to prevent the plaintiffs from enforcing their decrees in the first instance against the property of Balmukand. [38] It is obvious that as far as Balmukand was concerned the plaintiffs' decrees were money-decrees. Those decrees did not lose their character as money-decrees against Balmukand because by them a sale of the property of the other judgment-debtors was decreed. We are of opinion that the plaintiffs' decrees, so far as Balmukand was concerned, were decrees for money within the meaning of s. 295 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We express no opinion as to whether there were or were not as against the other judgment-debtors decrees for money within the meaning of that section. That is a question which we need not decide here, as it is not necessary for the decision of this appeal.

The remaining question is whether the fact that there are four judgment-debtors in the plaintiffs' decrees and only three judgment-debtors in the defendants' decrees would deprive the plaintiffs of their right to share rateably.

A precisely similar question was decided by Shumbhoo Nath Podder v. Lucky Nath Dey (1). I agree with that decision, and am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to share rateably in the proceeds of the defendants' decrees. The case of Deboki Nunden Sen v. Hart (2) is not in point and does not conflict with the view of the law which I have expressed. That was a case, to put it shortly, in which the property sold was the joint property of two judgment-debtors, whereas the decree in respect of which the right to claim rateably was made, was a decree against one of the judgment-debtors only. The case of Jagat Narain Pal v. Dhundhey Rai (3) has been pressed upon us. The facts there are not similar to those of this case, consequently that case does not affect our judgment in this.

The case of Hart v. Tara Prasanna Mukerji (4) has been relied on by each side. We do not think that, looking at the facts of the case, it is in point. In the result the appeal must be allowed with costs. The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and the case remanded under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code, to be disposed of by the Judge of Bar-eilly with reference to the observations made in this judgment. The costs will abide the result.

MAHMOOD, J.—I concur.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. DEOKINANDAN. [18th July, 1887.]

Criminal Procedure Code, s. 198—"Complaint"—Criminal Procedure Code, ss. 4, 200—Charge of defamation not made in complaint, but added in subsequent examination.

A charge of defamation not contained in the complaint presented to the Magistrate, but added subsequently by the Magistrate upon statements made by the complainant in his examination under s. 200 of the Criminal Procedure Code, whether of his own accord or in consequence of suggestions from the Magistrate, is not a legal "complaint" made by an aggrieved person within the meaning of ss. 4 (a) and 192, so as to enable the Magistrate to take cognizance of the offence. Queen-Empress v. Kallu (5) referred to.

[R., Rat. Unrep. Crim. Cas. 584 (585).]

THE petitioner in this case was convicted and sentenced by the Joint Magistrate of Allahabad, for defamation (s. 500 of the Penal Code), under the following circumstances:—On the 27th January, 1887, one Baijnath filed a written complaint in the Court of the Joint Magistrate against the petitioner, who was the editor of the Prag Shamachar newspaper, and between whom and the complainant enmity existed owing to the fact that each had started a school in Allahabad and regarded the other as a rival. The complaint as committed to writing by the Magistrate was headed "charge under ss. 352 and 504 of the Penal Code." It was to the effect that the accused was "in the habit of publishing various kinds of false and libellous matters in respect of the complainant in his paper;" that in particular on the 22nd January, he had falsely accused the complainant of an assault; that on the 26th, the parties having met, a dispute began, in the course of which the complainant said, "If you will write more libellous matter, I will bring an action against you," and that the accused (with two other persons) then used insulting language and tried to strike him.

On the following day, the Joint Magistrate having examined the complainant on oath, passed the following order:—"Let summons issue under ss. 506 and 500 of the Penal Code."

The accused having been convicted and sentenced as above stated, appealed to the Sessions Judge of Allahabad, the principal ground of appeal being that there having been no legal complaint [40] of an offence punishable under s. 500 of the Penal Code, there could be no trial and conviction under that section, with reference to s. 298 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Upon this point, the Sessions Judge in his judgment made the following remarks:—

"The first contention in appeal is that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction, because, as the offence of which the appellant has been convicted falls under chapter XXI of the Penal Code, it was essential that a complaint should be made by the person aggrieved, and it is alleged that no such offence was made. The charge was brought in the petition of complaint under ss. 352 and 504 of the Penal Code (assault and insult calculated to provoke a breach of the peace), but after examining the complainant on oath, as required by s. 200 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the Magistrate considered that the facts alleged disclosed a libel, and that the libel was what the prosecutor really wished to complain of. The accused was therefore charged under ss. 506 and 504 of the Penal Code. It is argued for the appellant that the prosecutor's original intention to complain only of assault and insult is evidenced by his saying (see petition of complaint) that if he continued to publish defamatory matter against him he would proceed against him, and by his calling witnesses only to prove the assault, in the first instance. But whatever the original intention may have been, it is enough that before the Magistrate the prosecutor distinctly declared his desire to prosecute the accused for defamation. It is further argued that the statement on oath under s. 200 of the Criminal Procedure Code is not "a complaint" in the sense of s. 4 of the Act, and reference is made to the ruling in Queen-Empress v. Kallu (1). It appears to me that the statement on oath is in elucidation and confirmation of the opening petition, and is a part of the "complaint" laid in the latter. In the case quoted it does not appear who made the first report to the police: possibly the chaukidar and not the husband. But however this may be there is a difference between proceedings initiated in Court by the aggrieved person himself and a case sent up for trial by the police, in which the person whose complaint in Court was necessary to legalize the prosecution appears only as a witness. I am therefore of opinion that the provisions of s. 198 of the Criminal Procedure Code have been observed." In the result, the Sessions Judge affirmed the conviction, but reduced the sentence from two months' rigorous imprisonment and Rs. 250 fine to one month's simple imprisonment and Rs. 100 fine.

The accused applied to the High Court for revision of the Sessions Judge's order.

Babu Dwarka Nath Banerji and Babu Durga Charan Banerji, for the petitioner.

The Public Prosecutor (Mr. G.E. A. Ross), for the Crown.

BRODHURST, J.—This is an application for revision of the order of the Sessions Judge of Allahabad, dated the 3rd June, 1887, by which he, on an appeal against the order of the Joint Magistrate of Allahabad, dated the 28th March, 1887, affirmed the conviction of the present petitioner under s. 500 of the Indian Penal Code, but reduced his sentence from two months' simple imprisonment and fine of Rs. 250, or in default two months' further simple imprisonment, to one month's simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100, or in default to one month's further simple imprisonment.

Three grounds for revision have been taken. The first of these is, "Because there having been no legal complaint there could be no trial and conviction under s. 500." It is pointed out by Mr. Banerji, counsel for the petitioner, that the offence of defamation punishable under s. 500 of the Indian Penal Code is one of the offences mentioned in s. 345 of the Criminal Procedure Code as compoundable; that s. 500 of the Penal Code is in chapter XXI of that Code; that it is enacted in s. 198 of the Criminal Procedure Code, that "no Court shall take cognizance of an offence falling under chapter XIX or chapter XXI of the Indian Penal Code or under ss. 493 to 496 (both inclusive) of the same Code, except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence;" that "complaint," as defined in s. 4 of the Criminal Procedure Code, "means the allegation made orally or in writing to a Magistrate with a view to his taking action under this Code that some person, whether known or unknown, has committed an offence, but does not include the report of a Police officer;" that in this case the complaint was made in writing, but that it does not contain a charge under s. 500 of the Penal Code, and [42] that the allusion made in it to "libellous matter" is merely in support of the charges under ss. 352 and 504 of the Penal Code that were there actually made, and Mr. Banerji referred to the judgment of my brother Straight in the case of Queen-Empress v. Kallu (1) as sustaining his plea.

I think Mr. Banerji's argument is sound. The libellous matters referred to were published in the Prag Samachar of the 22nd January, 1887. The complainant did not on the publication of the paragraph take immediate action. He did not make any objection until he happened to meet the accused in the street. His complaint is dated the 27th January, 1887; the charges preferred in it are of offences under ss. 352 and 504 of the Penal Code, and these offences are alleged to have been committed on the 26th January, 1887, by Pandit Deokinandan, Brahmin, Editor of the Prag Samachar, Jagrup Brahmin and Ram Bakhsh, Sonar.

(1) 5 A. 233.

In the complaint there is this passage :—" On the 26th January, 1887, all of the accused met the complainant in muhalia Atarsua; the complainant asked the accused No. 1 why he was publishing libellous matters in respect of him, and told him that he should not do so. Thereupon the said accused observed that unless he, the complainant, closed his school he would publish still more defamatory matter in respect of him; that he, complainant, replied, ' If you write still more libellous matters against me, I will bring an action against you.' Thereupon all of the accused became angry and used abusive language towards him, and when he remonstrated they raised sticks with the intention of assaulting him and approached near to him calling out ' Strike! Strike!' If the complainant had not moved away and the witnesses had not interfered, all of the accused would undoubtedly have assaulted him."

The cause of enmity is then alluded to, and the petition concludes as follows :—" The complainant therefore prays that after enquiry the accused persons may be punished."

From the above-mentioned passage in the complaint, it is, I think, quite clear that the complainant did not in the first instance prefer a charge of defamation, an offence punishable under s. 500 of the Indian Penal Code, against Pandit Deokinandan, the present [43] petitioner, but merely charged him and the other two accused persons with offences under ss. 352 and 504 of the Penal Code, and prayed that all of them might be punished for those offences. Summonses were issued, not under ss. 352 and 504, but under ss. 500 and 506 of the Penal Code.

In my opinion, the complainant at the time that he presented his petition of the 27th January last had no intention whatever of prosecuting all or any of the three accused persons on account of the paragraph alluded to as having been published in the Prag Samachar of the 2nd idem. The ruling referred to is in point, and the evidence of the complainant, which was given on a date subsequent to that on which the petition was filed, does not, I think, cure the defect in the complaint.

The Joint Magistrate has in his judgment observed :—" The mere omission to include in the complaint a charge under s. 500 of the Code could not invalidate the procedure of the Court. It very frequently happens that the actual offences complained of are not correctly stated in complaints, due on the one hand to the want of acquaintance petition-writers and pleaders' clerks have with the law, and on the other to the inaccurate way in which complainants state their grievances. Along with his complaint the prosecutor filed a copy of the Prag Samachar of the 22nd January, 1887, complaining of the libel complained of. The Court by its action was therefore only taking up the actual complaint, and on these grounds I overrule the legal objection raised."

I do not concur in these remarks. If a charge of defamation can, subsequent to the presentation of the complaint, be added by the Magistrate on statements made by the complainant in his evidence, whether of his own accord or with reference to suggestions made by the Magistrate, I fail to see what difference of procedure there can be between the classes of cases referred to in ss. 198 and 199 of the Criminal Procedure Code and other cases not included in those sections.

I think that the first ground for revision is valid, and I am therefore constrained to set aside the conviction and sentence, and to direct that the fine, if realized, be refunded.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. ZAKIUDDIN AND ANOTHER. [22nd June, 1887.]

Public nuisance—Slaughter of kine by Muhammadans on their own property—Act XLV of 1860 (Penal Code), ss 268, 290.

A person wilfully slaughtering cattle in a public street, so that the slaughter could be heard and seen by the passers-by, would commit an offence punishable under s. 290 of Penal Code.

But where certain Muhammadans, for a religious purpose, killed and cut up two cows before sunrise in a private compound, partly visible from a public road, and the killing of one of the cows only was witnessed by one Hindu—held that the circumstances proved did not amount to the commission of a public nuisance as defined in section 268 of the Code.

Muttumira v. Queen-Empress (1) referred to.

[R., 30 A. 181=5 A.L.J. 147 (152)=A.W.N. (1908) 64=7 Cr. L.J. 381.]

THE facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Brodhurst, J.

Mr. Amiruddin, for the petitioners.

Babu Jogindro Nath and Munshi Ram Prasad, for the complainants.

The Public Prosecutor (Mr. G. E. A. Ross) for the Crown.

BRODHURST, J.—The two applicants have applied for revision of an order of the officiating Magistrate of Pilibhit, by which he convicted them under s. 290 of the Indian Penal Code, and sentenced them each to pay a fine of Rs. 2.

The Magistrate found that the applicants had killed two cows in their compound, and had there cut up and disposed of the carcasses, and had thus committed a public nuisance punishable under s. 290 of the Indian Penal Code.

The Magistrate observes:—"The place in which the slaughter occurred was a compound by the house of the defendants. The wall of the compound has fallen into ruin, and the compound is visible from a high road which passes it. Only one person for the prosecution says he saw the actual slaughter, and he professes to have been on a visit to the defendants. His evidence, at least, is of no use to prove a public nuisance. The case against the accused can only be based on more general grounds, namely, that the slaughter was committed, and that such an event would necessarily cause annoyance to Hindu passers-by. If this were the result, the case would arise under s. 290 of the Indian Penal Code. I assume that the carcasses were cut up at the place indicated by the defendants, and that if they were about a foot high, they would not be visible from the road. At such a place they would not, when merely laid out, annoy passers-by. At the same time the previous felling for slaughter, if there were any passers-by at the time, would be visible; and the stir and moving about of the persons cutting up the carcasses would, in the ordinary course of things, be noticed by persons on the road, even if they could not see the carcasses or cut-up meat. I do not understand it to be pleaded that these occurrences could be hidden from the road."

The Magistrate finds that the slaughter took place "at quite early morning," and remarks, "as to the witnesses, I have already expressed my doubts about them and their way of representing the occurrences and their recourse to the spot. The accused pleaded that they killed only two cows; that they killed them on the 11th September, 1886, merely with a religious object and without any intention of annoying the Hindus: that they killed them in their own compound, where they had on former occasions sacrificed kine, and that a similar charge, preferred by the Hindus in 1865, was dismissed."

The Magistrate observes :—"The defence which seems to me to deserve most consideration is this, that there must be taken to have been a refusal to interfere in this matter in 1865 and a certain measure of uncertainty about the matter since."

It appears that, on the 11th September, 1886, two cows were killed with a religious object in the compound of the accused; that they were killed before sunrise; that at the most, the killing of one cow was witnessed by merely one Hindu, and by him only because he unfortunately chose that day and an unusually early hour to pay a visit to his Muhammadan acquaintances. No one else is found to have seen the killing of the cows or the carcasses or the cut-up meat. If a few Hindus passing by a private compound can have the occupants of that compound punished for a public nuisance merely because they have seen the occupants moving about in their compound, and imagine that they are engaged [46] in cutting up the carcasses of cows, much more could the butchers, who, in the exercise of their trade, carry beef for sale through the streets of almost every station in British India, be punished for a public nuisance.

Sir Charles Turner, in his judgment in Muttumira v. Queen-Empress(1), observed :—"A public nuisance is defined in the Penal Code as an act or omission which causes any common injury, danger, or annoyance to the public or people in general, who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity, or which must necessarily cause obstruction, danger, or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right. It is obvious from the language of the Act that it was not intended to apply to acts or omissions calculated to offend the sentiments of a class. In this country it must often happen that acts are done by the followers of a creed which must be offensive to the sentiments of those who follow other creeds. The scope of the provision we are considering is to protect the public or people in general, as distinguished from the members of a sect, from injury, danger, or annoyance in the neighbourhood of places where they dwell or occupy property, or when they have occasion to use a public right."

I am by no means prepared to hold that a slaughterer of cattle could under no circumstances be convicted of a public nuisance as defined in s. 268 of the Indian Penal Code; for, if a person wilfully slaughtered cattle in a public street so that the groans and blood of the poor beasts were heard and seen by the passers-by, he would commit acts that would necessarily cause annoyance to every one of them, Hindu, European, Muhammadan or other, who was not utterly devoid, not merely of refinement, but also of all proper feeling: and he undoubtedly would, in my opinion, be punishable under s. 290 of the Indian Penal Code.

As regards the petitioners, however, I consider that, under the circumstances I have above mentioned, they have been wrongly convicted. I therefore set aside their convictions and direct that the fines, if realized, be refunded.

In conclusion, I may add that I think the Muhammadans of Pilibhit are entitled to know whether or not they may on special [47] occasions, for religious purposes and under certain restrictions, be permitted, as Muhammadans are, I believe, in many other places in British India, permitted, to sacrifice kine on their own premises. If they are allowed to do so, a clear municipal rule should be framed so as to ensure that cattle killed under such circumstances should be slaughtered, and the carcasses disposed of, in such a way as to cause the least possible annoyance to Hindus and other persons.

GANESH SINGH (Plaintiff) v. SUJHARI KUAR (Defendant).*,
[5th August, 1887.]

Where a decree was obtained by a landholder for cancelment of a deed whereby an occupancy-holding was mortgaged with possession, and the mortgagee consequently failed to obtain possession, and brought a suit against the mortgagor to recover the mortgage-money,—held that inasmuch as the mortgagor must have known that he was mortgaging an estate not legally transferable, while the mortgagee might have believed that the estate was transferable, the act of the former was a default depriving the latter of his security within the meaning of s. 68 (b) of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), and the mortgagee was, therefore, entitled to succeed.

THE facts of this case were as follows:—On the 16th February, 1885, the defendant, Musammatt Sujhari Kuar, executed in favour of the plaintiff, Ganesh Singh, a deed whereby she mortgaged a cultivatory holding of 26 bighas 19 biswas 4 dhurs in consideration of Rs. 599. Under this deed the plaintiff was entitled to possession of the mortgaged property. Shortly after execution of the deed, however, a suit was brought by Madoo Prasad, one of the zamindars of the village, for cancelment of the deed, on the ground that the defendant was his occupancy tenant of the mortgaged property, and that the mortgage was, therefore, contrary to the provisions of s. 9 of the N.-W. P. Rent Act (XII of 1881). On the 8th June, 1885, the zamindar obtained a decree in that suit. Being unable, [48] consequently, to obtain possession under the mortgage deed, the plaintiff brought the present suit to recover the money which he had advanced to the defendant, with interest.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Azamgarh) dismissed the suit upon grounds not material to this report. On appeal by the plaintiff, the lower appellate Court dismissed the appeal, on the ground that, "before bringing the suit, the plaintiff should have asked the defendant if she could mortgage other property or give him other security for his money; Act IV of 1882, s. 68, cl. (c). If the defendant should be unable to give the plaintiff other security, then the plaintiff might bring a suit to recover his money."

* Second Appeal, No. 1101 of 1886, from a decree of J. M. C. Steinbelt, Esq., District Judge of Azamgarh, dated the 11th March, 1886, confirming a decree of Babu Nihal Chandra, Munsif of Azamgarh, dated the 9th November, 1885.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

The Hon. T. Conlan and Mr. W. M. Colvin, for the appellant.

Mr. C. Ross Alston, Munshi Hanuman Prasad, and Munshi Kashi Prasad, for the respondent.

BRODHURST and TYRRELL, JJ.—The respondent in this case gave the appellant a mortgage upon a cultivatory holding. It turned out that that cultivatory holding was of the non-transferable kind referred to in s. 9 of the N. W. P. Rent Act. The respondent was in consequence unable to give possession to the appellant, and he has therefore brought this suit to recover his money. He has been defeated upon the ground that s. 68, cl. (c), of Act IV of 1882, made it obligatory upon him to require the respondent to give him another sufficient security for his debt, a step which admittedly he has not taken. The Courts below accordingly dismissed the appellant's claim.

In second appeal it is argued that clause (b) of the above section contains the law applicable to the circumstances of this case, because the mortgagee has been deprived of the whole of his security in consequence of the default of the mortgagor. This contention must prevail. It is unquestionable that the mortgagor is in default, and the only plea urged here against the appellant is that he knew the law and was aware that the security he was taking was not transferable to him. Even if this consideration was sufficient to defeat his present claim, it is to be observed that it is not proved, or even asserted, that the appellant had this knowledge. While it [49] is certain that the respondent must have known that she was mortgaging an estate which was by law not transferable, the appellant may well have believed that her tenure was of a transferable character. The appeal is decreed, and the appellant's claim is decreed with costs in all the Courts.

Appeal allowed.

The plaintiff in a suit for damages laid at Rs. 200, claimed Rs. 50 on account of medical expenses caused by an assault committed on him by the defendants, Rs. 50 as the costs of a criminal prosecution which he had brought against them, and Rs. 100 for injury to his reputation and feelings.

Held that inasmuch as part of the claim related to alleged actual pecuniary damages resulting from an alleged personal injury, the whole suit was, with reference to s. 6, proviso (3), of the Mufussil Small Cause Courts Act (XI of 1865), of the nature cognizable by a Court of Small Causes, and that, under s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code, no second appeal in such suit would lie. *Gunga Narain Moytro v. THE plaintiff in this suit claimed Rs. 200 as damages upon the following statement:—He alleged that he had been assaulted by the defendants, who were his tenants; that his injuries had involved him in expenditure on account of medical treatment in hospital to the extent of Rs. 50; that he had also been put to the expense of a criminal prosecution against the defendants which had cost him Rs. 50, and he claimed another Rs. 100 an account of injury to his reputation and his feelings.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Bulandshahr) decreed the claim on the first head to the extent of Rs. 10; on the second head to the full extent of Rs. 50; on the third head to the extent of Re. 1. On appeal by the defendants, the lower appellate Court disallowed the claims under the first two heads and gave the plaintiff [50] a decree for Re. 1 on the third head only. He appealed to the High Court.

Pandit Moti Lal, for the appellant.

Lala Jokhu Lal, for the respondents.

A preliminary objection was raised on behalf of the respondents to the hearing of the appeal, on the ground that it was barred by s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code.

MAHMOOD, J.—This appeal has arisen out of an action for recovery of Rs. 200 claimed as damages by the plaintiff for his bodily injury resulting from his having been assaulted by the defendants, and also for the consequent loss of reputation and hurt of feelings, and also in respect of the expenses incurred in the hospital, and in payment of fees to the legal practitioners who prosecuted the defendants in the criminal Court in respect of such assault. The first Court decreed the claim in part, but the lower appellate Court has modified the first Court's decree by assessing damages at only Re. 1, to which extent it upheld the first Court's decree.

The plaintiff has preferred this second appeal; but to the hearing of the appeal Mr. Moti Lal, who appears for Mr. Howell on behalf of the respondents, objects that, the suit being one cognizable by the Court of Small Causes, no second appeal lies to this Court under s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code, and in support of this contention the learned pleader cites the case of Gunga Narain Moytro v. Gudadhar Chowdhry (1), in which Glover and Hobhouse, JJ., concurred in the opinion that to suits in which even a portion of the claim for damages was claimed as actual damages, the third proviso of s. 6 of the Mufussil Small Cause Courts Act (XI of 1865) did not apply, and that in such cases no second appeal would lie.

Having read the prayer for relief of the plaintiff in this case contained in para. 4 of the plaint, I have no doubt that this suit, so far as this preliminary objection is concerned, is on all fours with the case cited on behalf of the respondents. Because there, as here, the claim for damages referred to loss of reputation along with actual damages. In this case it cannot be doubted that the [51] hospital expenses and the fees paid to the lawyer for prosecuting the defendants were claimed as actual damages.

It is of course not necessary for me to decide whether such fees could be claimed; but considering the nature of the suit as set forth in the plaint and the ruling of the Calcutta High Court to which reference has been made, I am of opinion that the suit was one of the nature cognizable by the Small Cause Court, and that, therefore, no second appeal lay to this Court.

(1) 13 W. R. 434.

Some suggestion was made that, in deciding this point, I should refer to the new Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887); but in this case the second appeal was instituted on the 2nd August, 1886, and the consideration of the new law would be unnecessary upon general principles of construing statutes, and indeed, those general principles have been duly given effect to in clause (3) to s. 3 of this enactment itself, which provides that the new enactment is not to affect any proceedings before or after decree in any suit instituted before the commencement of the Act. It is therefore clear that the new Act is not applicable, and, as I have already said under the old Act, this was a Small Cause Court suit, and, being of less value than Rs. 500, was not a fit one for being made the subject of second appeal under s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code. The appeal is dismissed with costs (1).

RAMSARAN AND ANOTHER (Judgment-debtors) v. PERSHIDHER RAI AND OTHERS (Decree-holders).* [10th August, 1887.]

Civil Procedure Code, s. 206—Power of lower Court to amend decree affirmed on appeal.

Where a decree for possession of immoveable property, passed by a lower appellate Court, omitted to specify the plots of land to which it related, and was upheld by the High Court by a decree which likewise gave no specification of those plots, and the lower appellate Court subsequently, on the decree-holder's application, amended its decree, under s. 206 of the Civil Procedure Code, by inserting the required specification—Held that inasmuch as the effect of the amendment was not to alter the effect of the High Court's decree, or to affect [52] property other than that actually claimed and decreed, the amendment was not contrary to law. Shohrat Singh v. Bridgman (2), Gobardhan Das v. Gopal Ram (3), Kristo Kinkur Roy v. Rajah Burrodacaunt Roy (4), and Sundra v. Subbanna (5) referred to.

[R., 6 O.C. 44 (16); Cons., 11 A. 267.]

THE facts of this case were as follows:—Persidhar Rai and others sued Ram Saran and others for possession of certain plots of lands specified in the plaint, and their suit was dismissed by the first Court on the 28th April, 1883; but upon appeal that decree was reversed by the lower appellate Court on the 19th November, 1883, which decreed the claim, but omitted to enter in its decree the numbers and specifications of the plots which formed the subject-matter of the decree. That decree was upheld by the High Court on the 19th March, 1885, and the decree prepared in the High Court also gave no specification of the plots to which the suit related.

An application for execution of decree and recovery of possession of the plots aforesaid was made by the decree-holders on the 9th August, 1885, but it was opposed by the judgment-debtors upon the ground that the only decree capable of execution was the final decree of the High Court, and inasmuch as that decree did not contain a specification of the plots, it could not be executed.

These objections were disallowed by the Court of first instance, which, by its order of the 15th September, 1885, directed that the decree-holders should be placed in possession of the plots to which their suit related. Upon appeal to the lower appellate Court that Court held that so long as the decree of the High Court remained unamended and silent as to the numbers of the plots in suit, the decree could not be executed, and upon this ground it disallowed execution by its order of the 17th April, 1886. That order was not appealed from, and became final. Thereupon the judgment-debtors applied to the Munsif to regain possession of the land from which they had been ousted under the decree, and they were accordingly restored to such possession on the 9th August, 1886. In the meantime the decree-holders made an application to the lower appellate Court to amend its decree of the 19th November, 1883, by entering therein a specification of the plots [53] which formed the subject-matter of this suit, and their application was granted and the requisite amendment made on the 18th June, 1886. The decree having thus been amended, the present application for execution was made by the decree-holders on the 9th August, 1886, and it was allowed by the Court of first instance, and that order was upheld by the lower appellate Court. The judgment-debtors appealed to the High Court.*

Munshi Sukh Ram, for the appellants.

Mr. G. T. Spankie and Lala Juala Prasad, for the respondents.

MAHMOOD, J.—The arguments which Mr. Sukh Ram on behalf of the appellants and Mr. Juala Prasad on behalf of the respondents have addressed to me raise only two questions for determination:—

(1) Whether, with reference to the order of the 17th April, 1886, the present execution proceedings were barred by the rule of res judicata under the ruling of the Privy Council in the case of Mungal Pershad Dichit v. Grija Kant Lahiri (1) and Rup Kuari v. Ram Kirpal Shukul (2).

(2) Whether the order made by the lower appellate Court on the 18th June, 1886, amending its decree of the 19th November, 1883, was legal, in view of the circumstance that the decree has been subjected to appeal to this Court, and the final decree in the case was passed by this Court on the 19th March, 1885.

Upon the first of these two points I do not think it is necessary to say anything beyond observing that the two cases relied upon do not apply, because the effect of the Judge's order of the 17th April, 1886, was to hold that the decree, so long as it remained unamended, was not capable of execution and that it needed amendment. The present application is not one in which the same unamended decree is sought to be executed, but it is an application which relates to the execution of the decree after amendment.

The second question, however, is the only real question in the case, and it is a question of law, because the language of s. 206, which enables the Court passing a decree to amend its decree, is silent as to whether such amendment can be made by such Court [54] after the decree sought to be amended has already become the subject of an appeal before a higher tribunal. Illustrations of how difficulties may arise in connection with the exercise of the power conferred by that section are to be found in some of the reported cases—in Raghunath Das v. Raj Kumar (1) and Surta v. Ganga (2), but this is the first time I have had specifically to deal with the question whether or not the exercise of these powers by a Court passing a decree is legal after the decree has been the subject of an appeal. Mr. Sukh Ram argues that under the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Shohrat Singh v. Bridgman (3) it is the decree of the last Court only which can be executed; and inasmuch as here the decree of the last Court was that of the High Court, dated the 19th March, 1885, and such decree was silent as to the specification of the plots, therefore the amendment of the decree by the lower appellate Court was illegal, because it was not that decree that could be executed. In dealing with this contention, I think it is enough to say that the effect of that Full Bench ruling was explained by Oldfield, J., in Gobardhan Das v. Gopal Ram (4), in which it was held that in cases where a decree of the last Court only affirms the decree of the lower Court, the Court executing the final decree is at liberty to refer to the lower Court's decree for explanation and information. And this view was consistent with the ruling of the Privy Council in Kristo Kinkur Roy v. Rajah Burrodacaunt Roy (5).

It is, therefore, clear, in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, that in a case of this kind, this Court's decree having only upheld the decree of the lower Court, no practical injury can arise in execution, if the lower Court, after the decree had been confirmed by this Court, amended its decree, as was done in this case. There is, indeed, no contention here that the effect of the amendment made by the lower Court is such as to alter the effect of this Court's decree, or to render land other than that which was actually claimed and actually decreed liable to the decree.

Under these circumstances, I think that the amendment of the decree by the lower appellate Court was not opposed to any provision of the law, and that it has caused no injury to the present [55] appellant. In this view I am supported by a ruling of the Madras High Court in Sundara v. Subbana (6), where Collins, C. J., and Muttusami Ayyar, J., concurred in holding that, under s. 206 of the Civil Procedure Code, the Court has power to amend its decree by bringing it into conformity with the judgment after such decree has been confirmed on appeal. This view of the law was accepted by Oldfield and Brodhurst, JJ., in Misc. No. 213 of 1886, Mohan Lal v. Lachmi Prasad (7) decided on the 22nd December, 1886.

The amendment was, therefore, properly made and has caused no failure of justice.

I dismiss this appeal with costs.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. JAGJIWAN AND OTHERS.

[8th September, 1887.]

Summary trial—Complaint including charge not summarily triable—Summary jurisdiction not necessarily ousted thereby—Criminal Procedure Code, s. 260.

The mere circumstance of a complaint charging an accused person with offences not summarily triable along with other offences so triable would not necessarily oust the summary jurisdiction of a Magistrate under s. 260 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Whether a complaint affords sufficient ground for a summary trial, or requires a trial according to the ordinary procedure, must be left in a great measure to the discretion of the Magistrate, exercised with due care according to judicial methods with reference to the circumstances of each case. Ramchunder Chatterjee v. Kanhye Laha (1), Chunder Seekor Sookul v. Dhurm Nath Tewaree (2) Beputoolla v. Najim Sheikh (3), and Empress v. Abdool Karim (4) referred to.

THE facts of this case, which was a reference under s. 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code, are stated in the judgment of Mahmood, J.

MAHMOOD, J.—In this case one Musammatt Sheo Kumari, a Hindu widow, whose husband died in 1885, filed a complaint in the Court of the Joint Magistrate on the 25th March, 1887, alleging that certain acts were committed by the accused on the previous day, and that those acts amounted to offences under ss. 322, 448, [56] and 382 of the Indian Penal Code. In the petition of complaint no reference was made to any other offence, and the Joint Magistrate thereupon dealt with the case as falling under ss. 323 and 448 of the Indian Penal Code, and, as such, he tried the case summarily under s. 260 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and, holding that the evidence for the prosecution was untrustworthy, dismissed the complaint. The offences to which those two sections of the Indian Penal Code relate are triable summarily under s. 260 of the Criminal Procedure Code, under clauses (c) and (h) respectively, and there can, therefore, be no question that the action of the Magistrate to this extent was not illegal. As to the remaining section 382 of the Indian Penal Code, under which the accused had been charged by the complainant, it seems to me enough to say that the facts as stated in the complainant's petition of the 25th March, 1887, themselves fell short of showing any such offence as is contemplated by that section, and the Magistrate was, therefore, right in not charging the accused under that section.

It then appears that the prosecutrix, Musammatt Sheo Kumari, preferred an application for revision to the learned Sessions Judge on the 25th June, 1887, asking for interference under ss. 435 and 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and in that petition the main contention was that the complaint amounted to a charge of offences under ss. 147, 451, 452, and 382 of the Indian Penal Code, and that the action of the Joint Magistrate in trying the case summarily was, therefore, illegal. This contention appears to have been accepted by the learned Sessions Judge, who, acting under s. 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code, has referred this case for the exercise of the revisional powers of this Court. It appears from the learned Judge's order of the 11th August, 1887, that he was labouring under a misapprehension in thinking that the prosecutrix's complaint of the 25th March, 1887, made any mention of ss. 147, 451 and 452 of the Indian Penal Code; and although s. 382 of that Code was mentioned in the complaint, it is clear to me that the facts stated in the petition of complaint itself would furnish no foundation for a charge under that section. The mistake as to the sections under which that charge was brought appears to be shared by the Joint Magistrate in the explanation which he has submitted in conformity with the rules of this Court, and he [57] seems to think that charges under ss. 147, 451, and 452 formed part of the original charge brought by the complainant against the accused.

All I have now to consider is whether the circumstances of the case require me to interfere in revision under the powers vested in this Court by s. 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In deciding this question, I have felt some difficulty at the outset as to whether the mere circumstance that the prosecutrix, in preferring her complaint of the 25th March, 1887, included a charge under s. 382 of the Indian Penal Code, is a circumstance which by itself ousts the summary jurisdiction of the Joint Magistrate under s. 260 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The learned Judge has expressed the view that the decision of the question whether a complaint is or is not summarily triable is to be regulated by the complaint itself. The learned Sessions Judge observes:—"The charge may be exaggerated, but the law does not allow the Magistrate to presuppose this in order that he may try the case summarily."

This view seems to be to some extent in accord with the rulings of the Calcutta High Court in Ramchunder Chatterjee v. Kanhye Laha (1), Chunder Seekor Sookul v. Dhurm Nath Tewaree (2), Beputoolla v. Najim Sheikh (3), and Empress v. Abdool Karim (4). The facts of those cases are, however, distinguishable from those of this case now before me. In the last-mentioned ruling the learned Judges in expressing their opinions laid down the rule that if a charge of an offence "not triable is laid and sworn to, the Magistrate must proceed with the case accordingly, unless he is at the outset in a position to show from the deposition of the complainant that the circumstances of aggravation are really mere exaggeration and not to be believed."

I agree in the rule so laid down, but I must say that I am not prepared to hold that the mere circumstance of a complaint charging an accused person of offences not summarily triable would oust the summary jurisdiction of a Magistrate under s. 260 of the Criminal Procedure Code. It is far from being an uncommon circumstance that complainants, either bona fide suffering from a grievance or out of ill-will towards the accused, exaggerate the heinous-[58]ness of the facts complained of; and if I were to hold that the terms of the complaint are in themselves conclusive to decide the question as to whether the case might be summarily tried or not, I should virtually be holding that the summary jurisdiction can be evaded at the choice of the complainant. In this class of cases no hard-and-fast rule can be laid down, and much depends upon the facts and circumstances of each individual case. The Criminal Procedure Code has empowered Magistrates, under certain limitations, to decline to proceed with a complaint; and even in cases not summarily triable, it is only when a Magistrate sees sufficient ground for proceeding against the accused that a charge is framed. This, speaking in general language, is the effect of ss. 210 and 254, Criminal Procedure Code, and I think that whether a complaint does or does not afford sufficient grounds for a summary trial, or requires a trial under the ordinary procedure, is a question which must be left in a great measure to the discretion of the Magistrate, which discretion of course must be exercised with due care and caution according to judicial methods, with reference to the circumstances of each case. In this case, the facts as stated by the complainant might possibly have fallen under s. 147, 451, or 452 of the Indian Penal Code, none of which offences was summarily triable. But before the Magistrate could charge the accused under those sections, he would have to satisfy himself that there was ground for proceeding under any of those sections. The Magistrate, in the present case, does not appear to have rejected any evidence for the prosecution, and his judgment shows that he disbelieved the entire evidence adduced on behalf of the prosecution. Under these circumstances, I do not think that the case requires any interference in revision. I therefore decline to interfere. The record will be returned.

APPELLATE CRIMINAL.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. WAZIR JAN. [16th September, 1887.]

Personating public servant—Extortion—Several offences—Conviction for each offence proved necessary—Separate sentences—Sentence necessary upon each conviction—Act XLV of 1860 (Penal Code), ss. 71, 170, 383—Criminal Procedure Code, ss. 35, 235.

Where more than one offence is proved in respect of which the accused has been charged and tried, a conviction for each such offence must follow, whether [59] s. 71 of the Penal Code applies to the case or not; and, subject to the provisions of s. 71, a separate sentence must be passed in respect of each such conviction.

Under s. 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code sentences of imprisonment cannot be passed so as to run concurrently.

In a trial for offences under ss. 170 and 383 of the Penal Code, committed in the same transaction, it appeared that but for personating a public servant the accused would not have been in a position to commit the act of extortion complained of.

Held that the first and second paragraphs of s. 71 of the Penal Code did not apply to the case; that the third paragraph also did not apply, because the words "constitute an offence" refer to the definitions of offences contained in the Code, irrespective of the evidence whereby the acts complained of are proved, and personating a public servant as defined in s. 170 was not a constituent element of extortion as defined in s. 383; that in the present case the former offence was completed before the latter had begun; and that separate sentences for each offence, were, therefore, not illegal.

[F., 12 C. L. J. 346 (347)=15 C.W.N. 732=10 Ind. Cas. 948; 15 C.W.N. 722 (732); R., Rat. Unrep. Crim. Cas. 369 (370); Rat. Unrep. Cr. Cas. 597 (598); 25 C. 557 (559); 1 A. L. J. 604 (605)=27 A. 294=A. W. N. (1904) 232.]

THE petitioner in this case, Wazir Jan, was convicted by the Joint Magistrate of Benares of personating a public servant (s. 170 of the Penal Code) and extortion (s. 384) under the following circumstances:—The complainant, Ram Charan, teli, in company with three other persons, on the 7th April, 1887, brought oil, upon which octroi duty was payable, into the city of Benares for sale. The muharrir at the octroi post gave the four men a single pass covering the imports of them all, and this pass was made out in the name of one of them only, Bhawani Prasad. After leaving the octroi post, the four men separated, Bhawani Prasad keeping the pass, and Ram Charan thus having nothing to show that he had paid the duty. Shortly afterwards, the accused, pretending to be a girdawar or patrol on the octroi establishment, came up, accused him of bringing oil into the city without paying duty, and finally extorted from him Re. 1 by threats of imprisonment, though the complainant obtained and showed the pass in proof of payment.

The accused was charged, in the first instance, with the offence punishable under s. 170 of the Penal Code only. In consequence, however, of a question being raised by his pleader as to whether an octroi patrol was a "public servant" within the meaning of ss. 21 and 170 of the Penal Code, the Joint Magistrate, after all the evidence had been taken, added a charge of extortion under s. 384. A conviction was recorded upon each charge, and the Joint Magistrate passed sentence in the following terms:—"I sentence him [60] under s. 170 of the Penal Code to nine months' rigorous imprisonment, and under s. 384 to nine months' rigorous imprisonment; the sentences will run concurrently."

The accused appealed to the Sessions Judge of Benares, who affirmed the convictions. With regard to the sentences, the Sessions Judge observed:—"I am not aware that "concurrent sentences" are mentioned in the Criminal Procedure Code. And if my recollection is correct, instances have occurred in which jail authorities have treated two "concurrent" as two independent sentences, and detained a prisoner twice the term that the Court intended, or, at all events, in excess of the real period of imprisonment adjudged. The order I pass is that both convictions are upheld, that the sentence of nine months' rigorous imprisonment be regarded as passed under s. 384 of the Penal Code, and that it is unnecessary to record any sentence in respect of the conviction under s. 170 of the said Code."

The prisoner applied to the High Court for revision of this order, the principal ground stated in the petition being that the Joint Magistrate had acted illegally in adding the charge under s. 384 of the Penal Code, and that the sentence passed in respect of that charge should, therefore, be set aside.

Mr. J. D. Gordon, for the petitioner.

The Government Pleader (Munshi Ram Prasad), for the Crown.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts found by both the lower Courts on the evidence before them are sufficient to substantiate the offence of personating a public servant within the meaning of s. 170 of the Indian Penal Code, and also the offence of extortion punishable under s. 384 of that Code, and in respect of these findings I see no reason to differ with the Courts below. But Mr. Gordon, in supporting the petition, argues that the charge originally referred only to s. 170 of the Indian Penal Code, and that the charge under s. 384 was added so late that it has prejudiced the petitioner. I cannot accept this contention, because the terms of s. 227 of the Criminal Procedure Code, read even with the two following sections, are sufficiently wide to permit the Magistrate to amend the charge in the manner in which it was amended in this case. In this case the facts and the evidence on which the conviction [61] proceeded would not vary by reason of such alteration or addition, and there was, therefore, no prejudice to the petitioner by reason of the charge having been amended. I might almost go further and say that even if there had been an irregularity, under the circumstances of this case, I should have regarded it as one covered by s. 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

I agree with the learned Sessions Judge in the view that the evidence was sufficient to convict the petitioner under both s. 170 and s. 384 of CRIMINAL. the Indian Penal Code. But the learned Judge in convicting the prisoner under both sections has passed a sentence of nine months' rigorous imprisonment only under s. 384 of the Indian Penal Code, and he goes on to observe "that it is unnecessary to record any sentence in respect of the conviction under s. 170 of the said Code." The Court of first instance, that is, the Magistrate, had sentenced the accused to nine months rigorous imprisonment for each of the two offences and directed the sentences to "run concurrently."

7 A.W.N. This state of things raises the following three questions of law which it is necessary for me to decide:—

(1) Whether the Magistrate was right in convicting the accused both under s. 170 and s. 384 of the Indian Penal Code.

(2) Whether the Magistrate was right in passing separate sentences with the direction that they were to "run concurrently."

(3) Whether the learned Sessions Judge was right in declining to pass any sentence in respect of the conviction under s. 170 of the Penal Code.

None of these questions is altogether free from difficulty, specially as the case-law upon these and other cognate questions does not seem to have put the matter at rest, and the decision of them requires consideration both of the substantive and the adjective rules of the criminal law, that is, of the provisions of the Indian Penal Code and of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Viewed in this light, the first point as enunciated by me is a question of the rules of criminal procedure which must of course be considered with due regard to the behests of the substantive criminal law, that is, the Indian Penal Code. Now there is nothing [62] either in s. 170 or in s. 384 of that Code which can be understood to lay down the rule that a person guilty of one offence may not at the same time be guilty of the other, and both sections by using the word "shall" indicate the imperative mandate of the Legislature that persons guilty of those offences are to be punished, a direction of the law which is in keeping with the general principles of jurisprudence. There is, indeed, another section of the same Code which has a bearing upon such matters, and that section is s. 71, which governs the whole Code and regulates the limit of punishment in case in which the greater offence is made up of two or more minor offences. The section, however, is not a rule of adjective law or procedure, but a rule of substantive law regulating the measure of punishment, and it cannot, therefore, affect the question of conviction, which relates to the province of procedure.

The Code of Criminal Procedure, therefore, is the law which must be referred to. S. 35 of that Code distinctly provides that separate sentences may be passed in cases of conviction for several offences at one trial, and the provisions of s. 235 of that Code are in keeping with the earlier section; and illustration (g) of the latter section shows that in one and the same trial there may be separate convictions for separate offences, though such convictions may arise from facts of the same transaction and proceed upon the same evidence. Indeed, para. III of s. 235 of the Criminal Procedure Code distinctly contemplates the trial of the accused for separate offences where the acts complained of, when combined, would constitute a different offence.

These provisions leave no doubt in my mind that in a case such as this the Magistrate was right in trying the accused both under s. 170 and s. 384 of the Indian Penal Code, and in convicting the accused for both offences. The question as to the measure of punishment is a different matter from the question of conviction and rests upon other considerations both of law and fact. There is, however, a note in Mr. Justice Prinsep's commentary on the Code of Criminal Procedure (8th ed., p. 33), under s. 35, which states that the Calcutta High Court has held that when there are in an indictment two separate offences supported by distinct and separate evidence, a separate sentence should be passed [63] for each offence, the punishment under the second sentence to take effect on the expiry of the first, and that if, however, there are two or more offences supported by the same evidence, or very nearly so, a verdict of guilty should be entered on the offence covered by the greater portion of the evidence as the gravest in the eye of the law, and a verdict of not guilty on the other charges. The case in which this rule was laid down does not appear in the published reports, and the reasons on which the ruling proceeded are not, therefore, available to me. But I confess, with due respect, that I am unable to accept the rule so laid down. I have already said that the question of conviction is distinguishable from the question relating to the measure of punishment, that is, the sentence to be passed. The latter may, indeed, be affected by s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code, or by s. 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure : in the former case by a rule of substantive law, in the latter by a rule of adjective law. But I am unable to see how the mere circumstance that a series of acts which constitute a minor as also a graver offence, when proved against an accused person who has been charged with and tried for both the offences, can result in a finding of " not guilty " of the minor offences any more than of the graver offence. So far as I am aware, there is nothing in the Code of Criminal Procedure to justify such a course, and s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code cannot be understood to regulate convictions, though of course it governs the question of sentence as a matter of substantive criminal law. The view expressed by the Madras High Court, in their proceedings of the 4th July, 1867 (Weir, p. 43), is that when a prisoner is tried on several heads of charge, the most convenient course, with reference to appeals, is to enter up findings on all the counts, though when the several heads of charge are all founded on one continuous transaction, punishment can only be awarded on one. It seems to me that where certain acts constitute more than one offence, whether such offences do or do not fall under the purview of s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code, and the accused is charged and tried for more than one offence and the evidence establishes those offences, the Court is bound to convict him of those offences, though in awarding punishment the provisions of s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code and of s. 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure [64] would of course have to be duly kept in view. I have already said that the question of conviction is a question of adjective law or procedure, and that when an offence provided for by the substantive law is proved, a conviction must follow in the absence of express provisions to the contrary in the law of procedure itself. I am not aware of any such provision in our Code of Criminal Procedure, and the nearest approximation to such a rule are the provisions of s. 240 of that Code, which lay down that when more charges than one are made against the same person and a conviction has been had on one or more of them, the prosecution may, with the consent of the Court, withdraw the remaining charge or charges, or the Court may stay their trial. That section, however, does not apply to this case, and I hold that the Magistrate was right, upon the evidence before him, in convicting the accused both under s. 170 and s. 384 of the Indian Penal Code.

This leads me to the second question, namely, whether the Magistrate acted rightly in passing what he calls concurrent sentences of nine months' rigorous imprisonment. I am of opinion that there is no authority in the law to justify such a course. Indeed, the provisions of s. 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure render such a course illegal. The first paragraph of that section provides that "when a person is convicted, at one trial, of two or more distinct offences, the Court may sentence him, for such offences, to the several punishments prescribed therefor which such Court is competent to inflict: such punishments, when consisting of imprisonment or transportation, to commence the one after the expiration of the other in such order as the Court may direct." In this case the sentences passed by the Magistrate consisted of imprisonment, and such sentences could not, therefore, be made to "run concurrently" as directed by the Magistrate, the phrase, "in such order as the Court may direct," not being susceptible of such interpretation as the Magistrate has apparently placed upon it. I hold therefore, that the order of the Magistrate, so far as it directed that the two sentences were to run concurrently, was illegal.

I have now to consider the third question, namely, whether the learned Sessions Judge was right in law in declining to pass any sentence in respect of the conviction under s. 170 of the Indian [65] Penal Code. I am of opinion that such an omission was illegal. Just as the maxim ubi jus ibi remedium is a rule of jurisprudence, so it is a principle of the criminal law that where there is an offence there must be a punishment, the general rule being in either case affected by exceptional provisions of the law, whether provided by statute or by some other legal authority, disturbing the uniformity of the application of general maxims. No such provision or authority is to be found in our criminal law, whether belonging to the domain of substantive law or of adjective law. Indeed, the provisions of s. 170 of the Indian Penal Code itself are imperative, and they leave no room for doubting that whoever commits the offence prescribed by that section must undergo punishment according to the behests of that section, read, of course, as it must be read, with the general rule, contained in s. 71 of that Code. Upon the point, I think, the ruling of the Madras High Court, in their proceedings of the 15th January, 1869 (1), is applicable in principle. There it was ruled by that Court that when a prisoner is convicted of several offences, a separate sentence should be passed in each case; and though there the trials seem to have been separate, the principle that there should be a separate sentence for each conviction was not disturbed. More to the point is the ruling of a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court in Reg. v. Anvarkhan (2), where it was held that it is competent to a Magistrate to pass a separate sentence in respect of each of the two charges of house-breaking in order to commit theft, and of theft in a human dwelling, of which a prisoner is found guilty, provided the aggregate punishment awarded on the two charges does not exceed the punishment which the case warrants for the greater of the two offences of which the accused has been convicted, and provided, further, such aggregate punishment does not exceed the jurisdiction of the Court passing the sentence. This also is the effect of the ruling of Turner, J., in Empress v. Budh Singh (3), where that learned Judge pointed out that "the law does not prohibit the Court from passing sentence in respect of each offence established, but it declares that the offender must not receive for such offence collectively a punishment more severe than [66] might have been awarded for any one of them, or for the offence formed by their combination." Again, much to the same effect is the ruling of the Bombay Court in Reg. v. Murar Trikam (1), where it was held that when more than one offence is proved, it is not proper to convict only of one and to acquit of the other, although the offences may be cognate. This view of the law is much the same as that held in Reg. v. Gulam Abbas (2), and again, by the same Court, in a later case, Reg. v. Tukaya bin Tamana (3), but the view is not altogether consistent with the ruling of the Madras Court in the case of Noujan (4) and of this Court in Queen v. Mungroo (5). The ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Empress v. Jubdur Kazi (6) appears to throw doubt on the view which I have taken, but that ruling, like the others, refers to the provisions of the old Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1872), which have been reproduced in s. 235 of the present Criminal Procedure Code, with the omission of such provisions relating to the measure of punishment as were alien to procedure and properly belonged to the province of substantive law.

In Empress v. Ajudhia (7) my brother Straight, dealing with the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872, expressed the view that "where in the course of one and the same transaction an accused person appears to have perpetrated several acts, directed to one end and object, which together amount to a more serious offence than each of them taken individually by itself would constitute, although for purposes of trial it may be convenient to vary the form of charge and to designate not only the principal but the subsidiary crimes alleged to have been committed, yet, in the interests of simplicity and convenience, it is best to concentrate the conviction and sentence on the graver offence proved." Proceeding upon this view, my learned brother, in dealing with that case, convicted the accused of house-breaking by night in order to commit theft under s. 457 and directed an acquittal upon the charge of theft in a dwelling-house under s. 380 of the Indian Penal Code. This view is no doubt in accord with the ruling of the Madras High Court in case of Noujan (4) to which I have already referred, for there it was [67] held that the law forbids "two punishments for an offence so compounded that one substantive offence is the aim of the other and evidentiary matter of the intent necessary to constitute that other." Similar is the principle upon which my brother Straight's ruling proceeds in the case of Queen-Empress v. Ram Partab (8), where the two offences were those of being a member of an unlawful assembly causing riot, and inflicting grievous hurt. This ruling was, however, dissented from by my brother Brodhurst in Queen-Empress v. Dunder Singh (9), and by the learned Chief Justice and my brother Brodhurst in Queen-Empress v. Bisheshar (10), which, so far as I know, is the latest ruling of this Court on the subject.

Having considered the various cases to which I have referred, I cannot help thinking, with due respect, that the main reason why such conflict of decision has arisen is confusion between the rules of law regulating the conviction and those which regulate the measure of punishment. An act or a series of acts which in the eye of the substantive criminal law constitute an offence, punishment wherefor is imperatively demanded by the law, must, when duly proved against the accused, result in a conviction; and whenever there is conviction, it follows, as a natural sequence of legal thought, that there must be a punishment, for otherwise the definition of "offence" in s. 40 of the Indian Penal Code would be scarcely intelligible. I am not aware of any rule of our law that an offence when charged and proved against the accused is to result either in a verdict of not guilty or to pass unpunished, whether such an offence is or is not accompanied by another offence, and whether such latter offence does or does not overlap or include the former. I have already said enough to indicate that, in my opinion, s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code has no bearing upon the question of convictions, but relates only to the measure of punishment for offences falling under the purview of that clause. I have also said enough to indicate that, according to my view of the law, neither s. 35 nor s. 235 of the Criminal Procedure Code stands in the way of separate convictions and separate sentences for each offence of which the accused is found guilty in the same trial, though, as a matter of substantive law, s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code affects [68] the measure, or, rather the limit, of punishment, and, as a matter of adjective law, s. 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code has a bearing upon the same question, with reference to the powers of the Court awarding the sentence, and with reference to the right of appeal.

Applying these views to the present case, I am of opinion that there is no rule of our criminal law which would enable the Court, after finding the accused guilty of an offence, to refrain from passing a sentence on him as punishment for such offence, and therefore the learned Sessions Judge was wrong in law in omitting in this case to pass a sentence upon the accused after having found him guilty under s. 170 of the Indian Penal Code.

It now remains for me to consider whether, in the exercise of the revisional powers of this Court, I should disturb the amount of sentence passed upon the accused. The decision of this question again is partly dependent upon considerations of law, though it relates only to the measure of the punishment to be awarded. The question of law is whether, under the circumstances of this case, the offence of personating a public servant under s. 170 was such as would be included in the offence of extortion as defined in s. 383 and made punishable under s. 384 of the Indian Penal Code. The first paragraph of s. 71 provides that "where any thing which is an offence is made up of parts, any of which parts is itself an offence, the offender shall not be punished with the punishment of more than one of such his offences, unless it be so expressly provided." This rule is illustrated in the Code itself by illustration (a) to the section, and it is clear that it does not apply to the present case, because the offence of personating a public servant under s. 170 is not any part of the offence of extortion to which ss. 383 and 384 relate. Nor is the second paragraph of s. 71 applicable, because neither of the two offences with which this case is concerned falls under several definitions. The question, then, is whether the case falls under the third part of s. 71—in other words, whether the present case is one "where several acts, of which one or more than one would by itself or themselves constitute an offence, constitute, when combined, a different offence;" because in such cases the section provides that "the offender shall not be punished with a more severe punishment [69] than the Court which tries him could award for any one of such offences."

Now I am aware that it has been held in some cases that for the decision of this question the identity of the evidence produced in support of the prosecution is the criterion, but I confess I am unable to adopt this view. S. 71, as I have already said more than once, is a rule of substantive law, and, as such, must be understood to refer to substantive provisions and not to matters of evidence. The phrase "constitute an offence" as it occurs in the section must be understood to refer to the definitions of the offences as enunciated in the Code itself, irrespective of the identity or non-identity of the evidence whereby the several acts are proved. In this view of the law, the offence of personating a public servant under s. 170 cannot be dealt with as a constituent element of the offence of extortion as defined in s. 383 of the Code, even though, as in this case, the evidence shows that but for the former offence the latter offence could not have been successfully committed. In other words, the evidence in this case shows that but for personating a public servant, the accused could not practically have had the means of putting any person in fear of injury, which is an essential element of extortion; but I hold that this circumstance does not bring the two offences within the purview of the latter part of s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code. The reason for this view is that the offence under s. 170 was complete as soon as the accused falsely pretended to be a public servant as an octroi officer, and in such an assumed character called upon Ram Charan, teli, to show proof of the payment of octroi duty, and threatened him with injury. The offence thus being complete in itself, it could not merge into the offence of extortion under s. 383, of which offence personation as a public servant forms no necessary ingredient. Indeed, the offence of extortion as defined in that section may be practised, and is often practised, by private individuals assuming no pretended authority as public servants, and the mere circumstance that in this case personating as a public servant was utilized as a means of extorting money will not merge the two offences into one or entitle the accused to escape conviction under both offences. In other words, I hold that it is not to the identity or non-identity of the evidence, nor merely to the individual facts of each case as to [70] the practicability of the offence, but to the definitions of offences as to the elements of the corpus delicti, that we must look for deciding the question as to the applicability of the latter part of s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code for purposes of assessing punishment. And inasmuch as the accused in this case has been found guilty both under s. 170 and s. 384 of the Indian Penal Code, separate sentences should have been awarded, irrespective of the provisions of s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code, but with due regard to the provisions of s. 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The provisions of that section, however, do not affect this case, as the Magistrate who tried the accused was a Magistrate of the first class, and, as such, empowered to pass the sentences which he did.

For these reasons, I uphold both the convictions of the accused, that is, his convictions under s. 170 and s. 384 of the Indian Penal Code, and setting aside so much of the order of the learned Sessions Judge as omits to pass a sentence under s. 170 of the Indian Penal Code, I direct that the record be so amended as to sentence the accused to three months' rigorous imprisonment on the conviction under s. 170 of the Indian Penal Code, and to six months' rigorous imprisonment on the conviction under s. 384 of the Indian Penal Code, the latter sentence to commence after the expiration of the former. And I may add that I have so apportioned the punishment, because the former offence, though the original one, was subsidiary to the latter offence, and although but for the former offence the latter might on the facts of this case have been impracticable, the latter is the graver offence in the eye of the law.

The effect of this amendment of the record does not alter the extent of punishment awarded in this case, as I do not think that the two offences when combined in this manner require a severer punishment. And I have dwelt upon the questions of law at such length because if the two offences of which the accused has been convicted required severer sentences than the aggregate amount of nine months' rigorous imprisonment, I should have felt it my duty, in the exercise of the revisional powers of this Court, to award such punishment on each of the two convictions as would in the aggregate exceed the limit of nine months' rigorous imprisonment.

[71] I wish to add that what I have said as to separate convictions requiring separate sentences must not be understood to lay down any rule as to cases in which the accused is charged with, tried for, and convicted of only one offence, and the facts proved might, if taken piecemeal, constitute minor offences forming ingredients of the graver offence of which the accused has been found guilty. In such cases only one sentence would, of course, be all that is required by the law.

Limitation—Execution of decree—Application for execution withdrawn by decree-holder—Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act), sch. ii, No. 179 (4)—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 373, 374, 647.

S. 647 of the Civil Procedure Code makes ss. 373 and 374 applicable to proceedings in execution of decree. Kifayat Ali v. Ram Singh (1) and Pirjade v. Pirjade (2) followed. Tarachand Megraj v. Kashinath Trimbak (3) and Ramanandan Chetti v. Periatumbi Shervai (4), dissented from.

A first application for execution of a decree was withdrawn by the decree-holder on account of formal defects, the Court returning the application, but without giving permission to the decree-holder to withdraw with leave to take fresh proceedings.

Held that, with reference to the second paragraph of s. 373 read with s. 647 of the Code, the decree-holder was precluded from again applying for execution; but that, even assuming that permission to apply again could be inferred from the action of the Court in returning the application, s. 374 was applicable so as to make a subsequent application presented five years after the decree was barred by limitation, with reference to art. 179 of the Limitation Act.

THIS was a reference to a Division Bench by Mahmood, J. The facts are sufficiently stated in the order of reference, which was as follows:—

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts necessary for the decision of the main question of law raised by the argument of the learned pleader for [72] the appellant are these. The decree sought to be executed was passed on the 22nd May, 1878, and an application for execution thereof was made on the 14th February, 1881, and such application having been made more than one year after the decree, a notice was issued to the judgment-debtor on the 25th June, 1881; but the application was objected to by the judgment-debtor upon the ground that it was not in due form, and the calculation contained therein was erroneous. Thereupon the decree-holder's pleader stated to the Court that the prosecution of the application was not then desired, and that the execution case might be struck off, and the decree, which had been filed with the application, might be returned. The Subordinate Judge thereupon struck off the case and directed that the decree should be returned to the decree-holder, which appears to have been done.

The present litigation has arisen from an application made by the decree-holder on the 14th February, 1884, and it was met by a plea that the previous application of the 14th February, 1881, having been withdrawn on the 24th December, 1883, the present application was barred by limitation. The Court of first instance disallowed the objection, upon the ground that the present application for execution, having been filed within three years from the preceding application, was within limitation. Upon appeal, the learned Judge has upheld the order of the first Court, and the main point raised in second appeal is whether the action of the decree-holder in having the former application struck off on the 24th December, 1883, bars the present application.

The determination of this question seems to depend upon the following points:—

(1) Whether ss. 373 and 374, read with s. 647, of the Civil Procedure Code, are applicable to applications for execution of decree.

(2) If so, whether the withdrawal of the decree-holder from presenting his former application of the 14th February, 1881, renders that application unavailable for the purpose of limitation under cl. (4) of art. 179, sch. ii of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877).

(3) Whether the notice issued to the judgment-debtor on the 25th June, 1881, was, under the circumstances, such notice as [73] cl. (5), art. 179, sch. ii of the Limitation Act contemplates for the purposes of calculating limitation.

Upon the two first points there is a conflict of decisions. Whilst the ruling of the Madras High Court in Ramanandan Chetti v. Periatambi Shervai (1) tends to show that an application for execution, though informal and not prosecuted, but returned for amendment, is sufficient to save limitation, the Bombay High Court held a contrary view in Pirjade v. Pirjade (2) by applying s. 374 read with s. 647 of the Code to applications for execution of decree, and this last case was followed by Oldfield, J., with my concurrence, in Kifayat Ali v. Ram Singh (3). But in a more recent case, Sargent, C. J., in Tarachand Megraj v. Kashinath Trimbak (4), dissented from the rule laid down in Pirjade v. Pirjade (2), and held that the provisions of ss. 373 and 374 were not applicable to applications for execution, notwithstanding s. 647 of the Code, and that, therefore, even an application for execution which has been withdrawn by the decree-holder with permission to apply again was not affected for purposes of limitation under cl. (4), art. 179, sch. ii of the Limitation Act; and in laying down this rule, the learned Chief Justice relied upon the principle of a Full Bench ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Eshan Chunder Bose v. Prannath Nag (5). Under this state of the law I do not think that the questions involved in the two first points are free from difficulty.

Again, so far as the third point is concerned, the ruling of this Court in Behari Lal v. Salik Ram (1) is important; but in that case, there being a difference of opinion between Pearson and Spankie, JJ., the appeal was referred to Oldfield, J., under s. 575 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act X of 1877), and the last-named Judge disposed of the case by agreeing with Pearson, J., but without consulting the two learned Judges who had differed in opinion—a procedure which, according to the latest interpretation of that section in Rohilkhand and Kumaun Bank, Limited v. Row (2) was not in strict accord with the intention of the Legislature in framing that section. Moreover, the ruling in that case impugned an [74] earlier ruling of this Court in Franks v. Nuneh Mal (3), and, under the circumstances, I can scarcely regard the points in this case as definitely settled by the case-law.

I may also add that in some recent cases the Lords of the Privy Council have applied the principles of the rule of res judicata as defined in s. 13 of the Civil Procedure Code to proceedings in execution of decrees, and those cases were referred to by Field, J., in Bandey Karim v. Romesh Chunder Bundopadhya (4); but that learned Judge went on to say:—"We do not, on the present occasion, propose to go into this broad, general, and probably difficult question, whether the principle of res judicata as enunciated in s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies in all its generality to proceedings after decree." It seems to me that, so far as our Civil Procedure Code is concerned, probably the only authority by which the rule of res judicata as contained in s. 13 of the Code can be applied to execution cases is s. 647 of the Code; and if this is so, there seems analogical reason for holding that the provisions of ss. 373 and 374 of the Code would also be applicable to such cases, without interference with the provisions of art. 179, sch. ii of the Limitation Act. But I do not think that I should, sitting here as a single Judge, dispose of these important questions of law, notwithstanding the conflict of decision which I have pointed out, and indeed if I had the power under the Rules of this Court to refer the case to the Full Bench, I should probably have done so. But under the Rules of the 11th June 1887, I can only refer this case to a Division Bench consisting of two Judges, and I do so accordingly.

JUDGMENT

STRAIGHT, J.—This is a second appeal from an order of the Judge of Benares, passed on the execution side, on the 8th September, 1886. The execution proceedings in which it was passed had reference to a decree, dated the 22nd May, 1878, and the application for execution with which it deals was dated the 14th [75] February, 1884. The whole question involved in this appeal is whether that application of the 14th February, 1884, is prohibited by any rule of procedure or of limitation, which the lower Courts have held it is not.

The first application for execution of the decree was made upon the 14th February, 1881, and it is in reference to that application and to what took place upon it, that the questions involved in the discussion that has taken place before us are concerned. It seems that after notice of that application of the 14th February, 1881, had been given to the judgment-debtor, he appeared and objected to the form of the application upon the ground that there had been a miscalculation in the application as to the amount covered by the decree in respect of which execution was sought. And it seems there can be no doubt that there was a miscalculation, because such was admitted to be the case by the pleader for the decree-holder. Accordingly, on the 24th December, 1883, the application having been pending in the Court for that long period of time, an order was made by the Court, the terms of which it is not necessary for me to recapitulate at length, but they have been explicitly translated for my benefit by my brother Mahmood, and they come to this, that the application was struck off at the request of the decree-holder's pleader, and that the copy of decree which had been filed with the application was returned to him. It is to be observed that in that order of the Court it is recited that the decree-holder's vakil stated in terms that "for the present we are not anxious to carry on the execution proceedings, and we therefore apply that the case may be struck off." That being so, I now come to the application with which we are more immediately concerned, viz., that of the 14th February, 1884. And I have to consider whether, having regard to what took place in respect of the application of the 14th February, 1881, we can adopt and act upon and we ought to adopt and act upon the provisions contained in ss. 373 and 374 of the Civil Procedure Code; because, if those provisions are applicable to this case, then undoubtedly the Courts below were wrong in allowing the execution of the decree, and the decree cannot be executed. Now I do not hesitate to say, and in making the remark I am only recapitulating what I have hitherto always desired to lay down in these matters, that I am [76] anxious, as far as I possibly can, to have introduced into the conduct of execution proceedings as much of the regularity and precision of procedure as is applicable to the trial of original suits as is reasonably possible; and s. 647 of the Civil Procedure Code contemplates the adoption by the Courts, as far may be applicable, of the formalities of procedure, so that in the transaction of their miscellaneous business they may have certain well-understood landmarks—if I may so call them—to guide them in the conduct of that branch of their judicial work. Speaking generally, it seems to me that the assimilation of the provisions of ss. 373 and 374 to execution proceedings is highly desirable, and with the profoundest respect for the learned Chief Justice of Bombay, Sargent, C. J., and for the view he expressed in Tara Chand Megraj v. Kashinath Trimbak (1), I fail myself to see how, by importing the provisions of those sections of the Code into execution proceedings, any violence will be done to the terms or the operation of art. 179 of the Limitation Law. It seems to me that while on the one hand it is perfectly possible to have an application for execution made in accordance with law which will render the terms of art. 179 of the Limitation Act perfectly and properly applicable, so on the other it is equally possible to have such a condition of things as an application for execution made and withdrawn under s. 373, in which state of things the limitation of art. 179 of the Limitation Act will not be applicable, because no application in accordance with law has been made, whereas the special limitation of s. 374 of the Civil Procedure Code will be applicable. Therefore, as I said before, I do not myself see that there will be any conflict between the sections of the Civil Procedure Code to which I have referred and art. 179 of the Limitation Act. Now, looking to the terms of the order of the Court passed in this matter upon the 24th December, 1883, it is obvious not only that the pleader for the decree-holder knew that there were defects in his application, but further, he in explicit terms stated that he did not desire, for the present, to proceed with the execution: and I confess that it would seem to me to be almost a contradiction in terms to say that an application dealt with as this was, was an application for execution in accordance with law, such as would save the course of ordinary limitation running. On [77] the contrary, it seems to me that the state of facts, as they appear from the terms of that order, are such that we are fully warranted in applying s. 373 of the Civil Procedure Code, if it is applicable to what took place in respect of the application of the 14th February, 1881, and I myself have no doubt whatever, reading s. 647 of the Code in conjunction with ss. 373 and 374 of the Code, that those sections are applicable. Moreover, I am fortified in this view by the opinion expressed by my late brother Oldfield and approved by my brother Mahmood in the case of Kifayat Ali v. Ram Singh (1), and I am prepared unhesitatingly to follow that ruling, and accept the principle therein laid down, that s. 373 of the Civil Procedure Code is applicable to execution proceedings, so far as may be. With regard to that case of my brothers Oldfield and Mahmood, I may further say that they therein adopted a ruling of the Bombay High Court, in Pirjade v. Pirjade (2), and it seems to me that the reasoning of Melville, J., as stated in his decision in that case, is of a character to commend itself to one's better judgment, and I approve the grounds on which he proceeded. While he seems to me conclusively to point out why there need be no conflict or hostility between the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code and the Limitation Act, the learned Chief Justice of the Bombay High Court, Sargent, C. J., although he seems to indicate that there may be some such conflict, does not point out what that conflict is.

Adopting the view of the two judgments I have mentioned, how does it meet the circumstances of this case, and what portion of s. 373 of the Code fits into the particular circumstances of the case?

As regards the first paragraph of that section, it is clear that it has no applicability at all, because no leave or sanction was given by the Court to the withdrawal of the application of the 14th February, 1881, with leave to institute fresh proceedings upon the same basis. But paragraph 2 of s. 373 of the Code undoubtedly does apply to the circumstances, in my opinion. The application was withdrawn at the instance of the pleader for the decree-holder, and with the distinct intimation that "for the present we are not anxious to carry on the execution proceedings;" but no permission was given to withdraw with leave to take fresh proceedings. I am [78] of opinion, and disposed to think, that the prohibition contained in the latter portion of that section's second paragraph has application; that it was not open to the decree-holder to make the application which he has now made.

But further than that, even if one can assume here for a moment that permission is to be inferred from the action of the Court in returning the petition for execution to decree-holder, s. 374 of the Code, with its specific and special limitation steps in, and the present application of the 14th February, 1884, would be barred, because it was not made within three years from the date of the decree, the application of the 14th February, 1881, having become a nullity by reason of the withdrawal of the petition.

So it must be looked upon that there was an unbroken interval of time from the date of the decree, 22nd May, 1878, till the 14th February, 1884, when the application, now the subject-matter of appeal, was presented before the Subordinate Judge. That being so, it seems to me that this present application is undoubtedly barred, and that the decree-holder is not entitled to pray in aid the proceedings which commenced in 1881 and terminated in 1883. What I mean to say is this, that all that took place with regard to the proceedings commencing on the 14th February, 1881, and ending on the 24th December, 1883, must be struck out, and they cannot be regarded as constituting an application on which the decree-holder can rely. This being the view that I take of the matter, it seems to me that this appeal ought to be decreed, and I, therefore, decree the appeal and, reversing the orders of the Courts below, hold that the application of the decree-holder for execution should be dismissed, and the judgment-debtors are entitled to have their costs in all the proceedings.

(1) 7 A. 359.

MAHMOOD, J.—I am of the same opinion, and as my learned brother has already stated the various aspects of the questions of law which induced me to refrain from deciding the case myself, sitting as a single Judge, and to refer it to a Division Bench consisting of two Judges, I need not say much. I have only to say that it seems to me that, upon general principles, all rules of procedure or adjective law which provide pleas in bar to the action are rules of convenience which should be applicable as much to all [79] miscellaneous proceedings (be they in the nature of applications for execution or any other class of applications) as they are applicable to regular suits. To take as an example the plea of res judicata: it is based upon the maxim "Nemo debet bis vexari pro una et eadem causa," which is a maxim of wider application and has application to regular as well as miscellaneous proceedings. For, why should a judgment-debtor be harassed twice, unless there is a reason admitting of explanation that the second application is not in fact a harassing twice? Such as the decree not being paid off at all or only partially satisfied, in which case the doctrine of res judicata will not apply, for reasons into which I need not enter in detail for the purposes of this case. But where no such explanation is given the doctrine will apply; as in the two cases to which I alluded in my order of reference it has been laid down that res judicata is applicable to orders made in execution proceedings. But this is no longer an open question for the Courts in India, after the expression of opinion of their Lordships of the Privy Council that the law of res judicata is applicable to execution proceedings. I have said so much about the rule of res judicata because, so far as I can see, the operation of other pleas in bar of an application or a suit, such as ss. 373 and 374 of the Civil Procedure Code contemplate, and upon which sections my brother has already fully dwelt, fall under the same category as the plea of res judicata, because they are all pleas in limine barring the action. My learned brother has already said that the operation of those two sections is almost imperatively required, not only by the express terms of s. 647 of the Civil Procedure Code, but also by the general principles of convenience and regularity of proceedings. There is, of course, a conflict of decisions, to which my referring order alludes, and it simply comes to this, that the learned Judges who decided the case of Pirjade v. Pirjade (1), and which was followed by Mr. Justice Oldfield and myself in the case of Kifayat Ali v. Ram Singh (2), took one view of the matter—a view approved by my learned brother Straight—and the Madras case of Ramanandan Chetti v. Periatambi (3) and the present Chief Justice of Bombay took the opposite view. It was, indeed, out of respect due to the learned Chief Justice of Bombay, and also to the view taken by the Madras Court, that I did not undertake [80] the responsibility of deciding the case myself. I have, however, no longer any doubts left now. If it is a true doctrine, regulating the principle upon which the rules of procedure should proceed, that those rules aim at facilitating the administration of justice by promoting the convenience of the parties by preventing recurrence and repetition of points already adjudicated upon, there is no reason why all the principles contained in Chapter XXII of the Civil Procedure Code should not be applied to execution proceedings. Indeed, as one who has acted as a Court of first instance in the mufasal for some time, I have applied the provisions contained in that chapter to proceedings in execution. And if that chapter were not applicable to such proceedings, there would scarcely be any provisions to enable the parties to a decree to enter into any compromise. I have added these few remarks simply because the case has taken up the time of two Judges instead of one. I entirely concur in the order of my learned brother Straight.

KIRPA DAYAL (Petitioner) v. RANI KISHORI AND OTHERS (Objectors).
[3rd November, 1885.]

Temporary injunction—Civil Procedure Code, s. 492—“Wrongfully” sold in execution of decree.

An objection made under s. 278 of the Civil Procedure Code to the attachment in execution of a decree of a mortgage bond of which the objector claimed to be the assignee from the judgment-debtors under an instrument dated prior to the attachment was disallowed; and the objector then brought two suits against the decree-holder and the judgment-debtors, in which he claimed (a) a declaration of his right to the bond, and (b) to recover a sum of money from the judgment-debtors on the basis of the assignment. The first Court dismissed both suits, on the ground that the alleged assignment was a collusive transaction entered into after the attachment between the objector and the judgment-debtors for the purpose of defeating the attachment. Pending an appeal to the High Court, the objector applied to that Court for a temporary injunction under s. 492 of the Code, restraining the decree-holder from bringing the bond to sale in execution of the decree.

Held that although in such cases the provisions of s. 492 should be applied with the greatest care, one of the objects of the Legislature in passing that section was to guard as far as possible against multiplicity of suits, and as [81] many complications probably resulting in further litigation were likely to arise if the decree-holder were allowed to proceed with the execution-sale, and no practical injury to anyone would be caused by restraining her from so doing until the decision of the appeal, a temporary injunction should be granted, subject to security being given by the applicant.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—This is an application for an interim injunction under s. 492 of the Civil Procedure Code. The following are the circumstances under which it has been preferred:—Sah Kirpa Dayal, the applicant before me, is the alleged assignee by an instrument of the 17th April, 1881, of, among other things, the rights as mortgagee of the three persons, Chunni Lal, Manik Ram and Kishen Das, under a mortgage executed on the 20th June, 1876, by one Laik Singh, for Rs. 7,000. On the 5th May, 1881, Musammatt Rani Kishori instituted a suit for the recovery of Rs. 22,926-10-9 from Chunni Lal, Manik Ram and Kishen Das, and, on the 20th September following, obtained a decree from the Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri. While this suit was pending Musammatt Rani Kishori, on the 17th May, 1881, obtained an interim attachment of the bond for Rs. 7,000 as then being in the hands of the three defendants, and subsequently, on the 13th June, a further attachment directed to Sah Kirpa Dayal, the now applicant, into whose possession it had passed, and the attachment was perfected on the 29th of the same month. Objections were then filed by Sah Kirpa Dayal, but were disposed of adversely to him, and he then instituted two suits, one against his three assignors and Musammatt Rani Kishori to have the instrument of the 17th April, 1881, and his right thereto declared valid, the other to recover Rs. 19,284-3-6 from his three assignors upon the basis of the assignment—Musammatt Rani Kishori upon her own application being joined as a party. Both these suits were filed in the Court of the Judge of Mainpuri, who, on the 21st August, 1882, at the instance of Sah Kirpa Dayal, issued an injunction to restrain Musammatt Rani Kishori from bringing the instrument of the 17th [82] April, 1881, to sale in execution of her decree of the 20th September, 1881. This order was upheld in appeal by this Court. The two suits of Sah Kirpa Dayal were subsequently tried together by the Judge of Mainpuri, who, on the 7th of June last, found that the alleged assignment of the 17th April, 1881, was in fact made after the attachment issued at the instance of Musammatt Rani Kishori on the 17th May, 1881, in collusion between the three assignors and Sah Kirpa Dayal with the object of defeating such attachment, and he dismissed both the suits brought by the latter. Sah Kirpa Dayal filed an appeal in this Court from the decision of the Judge on the 28th July last, and on the 29th of the same month preferred the application which I now have to dispose of. It is not without some hesitation that I have come to the conclusion to grant it, my chief difficulty being caused by the word “wrongfully” in s. 492 of the Code under which it is presented. It seems to me that we cannot be too careful as to the mode in which we permit the machinery of the Courts to be used for the purpose of enabling a plaintiff in one suit to delay a decree-holder in another from obtaining the fruits of his judgment by executing his decree in ordinary course against the property of his judgment-debtor. At the same time it is of course most desirable to guard as far as possible against a multiplication of suits, and I presume that this was one of the objects the Legislature had in view in passing s. 492 in its present shape. I cannot but feel that if Musammatt Rani Kishori is allowed to proceed with the sale of the rights and interest of her judgment-debtors under the mortgage of the 20th of June, 1876, many complications are likely to arise which would probably result in further litigation in some shape or another, whereas if she is restrained from doing so until after the appeal in this Court has been disposed of, no practical injury that I can see will result to any one. I am considerably influenced in taking this view by the circumstance that my brothers Brodhurst and Tyrrell sanctioned the injunction granted by the Judge of Mainpuri, when the suit was in its original stage, as also by the fact that in First Appeal No. 113 of 1881, a not dissimilar case (1), my brother Oldfield adopted a similar course to that which I propose to follow. Upon the applicant Sah [83] Kirpa Dayal executing a bond with two sureties for Rs. 10,000, by way of security, let an interim injunction issue to the Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri, directing him not to hold the sale of the instrument for Rs. 7,000 executed by Laik Singh and dated the 20th June, 1876, until he has received notice from this Court that this injunction has been dissolved.

The costs of this application will be costs in the cause (2) (3).

Execution of decree—Sale in execution pending appeal from decree—Application for confirmation of sale after reversal of decree—Court not competent to grant confirmation—Civil Procedure Code, s. 312.

Where a sale in execution of a decree has taken place pending an appeal, and the decree has subsequently been reversed, the Court executing the decree cannot, after such reversal, grant confirmation of the sale. Basappa bin Malappa Aki v. Dundaya bin Shivlingaya (4), referred to.

THIS was an appeal from an order of the Munsif of Cawnpore granting confirmation of a sale in execution of a decree held by the respondent against the appellant. The sale took place on the 10 August, 1886, pending an appeal to the High Court from the decree. The appeal to the High Court was allowed and the decree reversed on the 5th November, 1886, before the purchaser (who was the decree-holder), made his application (dated the 20th March, 1887) for confirmation of the sale. The Munsif was of opinion that he had no power to refuse such confirmation. He therefore allowed the application, observing:—"I cannot help remarking that this is rather a hard case for the judgment-debtor. The decree in execution of which this sale took place has now been set aside by the Hon'ble the High Court. The law as it at present stands does not allow us to interfere with a sale of this nature, [84] which is otherwise regular; and however inadequate the price may be of a house sold in auction, we have no power to interfere if the application is not based upon the ground of material irregularity in publishing or conducting the sale."

The judgment-debtor appealed to the High Court.

Mr. G. E. A. Ross, for the appellant.

(4) 2 B. 540.

Babu Dwarka Nath Banerji and Munshi Ram Prasad, for the respondent.

STRAIGHT, J.—This appeal relates to an application made to the Munsif of Cawnpore for confirmation of a sale which took place on the 10th August, 1886. I have not before me the date of the decree in execution of which the sale was held, whereat the respondent, decree-holder, purchased; but it is sufficient for the purposes of this case to state that the sale of the 10th August, 1886, took place while an appeal from that decree was pending in this Court, which appeal was heard on the 5th November, 1886, and the result of that appeal was that the decree obtained by the respondent against the appellant was reversed and his suit was dismissed. The decree-holder, notwithstanding this dismissal of his suit in appeal, on the 20th March, 1887, applied for confirmation of the sale at which he had purchased on the 10th August, 1886, and that confirmation has been granted by the Munsif.

It is from that order of the Munsif that the appeal is now preferred, and the single and simple position taken up for the judgment-debtor is that the Munsif should not have confirmed the sale, because, the decree having been set aside before application had been made for confirmation of the sale, the warrant for the sale was at an end.

I have no doubt that this is a sound contention. The Civil Procedure Code contemplates that, before a sale shall become absolute for the purpose of laying the foundation for the grant of a sale certificate, it must be confirmed, that is to say, the Court executing the decree must be satisfied before confirming not only that the sale was a good sale in advertence to the language of s. 311 of the Code, but that there was before him a subsisting decree with the execution of which he ought to proceed by granting confirmation. In the present instance the Munsif had direct notice on [85] the 30th March, 1887, when he made the order the subject of this appeal, that the decree in execution of which the sale of the 10th August, 1886, had taken place had been set aside. I do not think that a Court executing a decree ought to make an order under such circumstance confirming a sale.

This view of the matter is borne out and supported by a ruling of the Bombay High Court, Basappa bin Malappa Aki v. Dundaya bin Shivlingaya (1), which is directly in point to the facts of the present case, and with the reasoning contained in the judgment of the learned Judge who determined that case I entirely agree; and adopting his view, I decree this appeal with costs, and setting aside the order of the Munsif, direct that the application for confirmation of the sale of the 10th March 1886, be dismissed with costs.

BRODHURST, J.—I concur.

Munshi Ram Prasad, for the respondents.

[86] EDGE, C. J., and TYRRELL, J.—This is an appeal by Syed Mansab Ali, one of the defendants, from the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Banda, dated the 31st July, 1886. The action was brought on the 24th November, 1885, upon a registered hypothecation bond, dated the 5th January, 1868, executed by the defendant Syed Mansab Ali in favour of the plaintiff Gulab Chand and one Beni Prasad, who was the agent of the plaintiffs' firm of Babu Lal and Shankar Lal of Banda. The defendants Yad Ali, Karam Ali, the sons of Mir Syed Ali, deceased, and Musammat Khair-ul-nissa, the widow of Mir Syed Ali, were made defendants, as they laid claim to the hypothecated property, alleging that it was purchased by Mir Syed Ali for himself, although in the name of his eldest son, the defendant Syed Mansab Ali. The defendants Baldeo, Hazari and Chote are the representatives of Beni Prasad mentioned in the hypothecation bond in suit. The defendants Baldeo, Hazari and Chote admitted, by their written statement filed on the 21st December, 1885, that in the transaction in question Beni Prasad was merely the agent of the plaintiffs' firm, and that the money secured by the bond was the money of the plaintiffs' firm. In the bond in question Beni Prasad is described as the gomashtha of the firm of Babu Lal and Shankar Lal at Banda. The plaintiff claimed as against the defendants Syed Mansab Ali, Yad Ali, Karam Ali and Musammat Khair-ul-nissa, payment of Rs. 2,300 principal money and Rs. 10,483-11 as interest from the 5th January, 1868, to the 20th November, 1885, further interest during suit and until payment, and costs, and in default of payment of foreclosure and possession. The defendant Syed Mansab Ali in the first and second paragraphs of his written statement raised a defence which depended on the construction of the bond : that defence has not been supported by any argument on appeal before us. We agree with the judgment of the Subordinate Judge on that point. Mansab Ali also pleaded that Beni Prasad was a creditor in fact under the bond to the extent of one-half. That contention was not pressed before the Subordinate Judge and has not been raised before us. He also pleaded payment and an adjustment of the account. The defendants Yad Ali, Karam Ali, and Musammat Khair-ul-nissa pleaded that the hypothecated property was purchased by Mir Syed Ali with his own moneys ; that the [87] defendant Syed Mansab Ali only managed the cultivation and collections and the Court business ; that Mir Syed Ali was the real owner of the property, and that Syed Mansab Ali had no power to mortgage the share of the pleading defendants. They also pleaded an arbitration and award of 1863, and that the Settlement Officer had affirmed in 1875 their right to have their names entered in the register as proprietors.

The Subordinate Judge found on all the substantial issues in favour of the plaintiffs and made a decree in their favour as against the defendants Syed Mansab Ali, Yad Ali, Karam Ali, and Musammat Khair-ul-nissa. From that decree the defendant Mansab Ali has brought the present appeal, and from it the defendants Yad Ali, Karam Ali, and Musammat Khair-ul-nissa have brought a separate appeal. The two appeals came on together to be heard by us.

On the question as to whether the defendant Syed Mansab Ali was the purchaser on his own behalf, and, at the date of the hypothecation sued on, the sole proprietor of the property hypothecated by that bond, we find in favour of the plaintiffs, agreeing substantially with the reasons and conclusions of the Subordinate Judge. The sale-deed of the 3rd January, 1860, is evidence of a sale to the defendant Syed Mansab Ali as the sole vendee. This deed might not be conclusive evidence on the point. The proceedings of the Collector's Court of Hamirpur of the 12th March, 1860, of the holding of which notice must have been previously given, refer to the defendant Syed Mansab Ali as the purchaser of the 10 annas 8 pies share in question. Dewan, one of the vendors of the 3rd January, 1860, has proved that the sale was made to the defendant Syed Mansab Ali alone, that there was no other purchaser, and that Syed Mansab Ali paid the price and got possession. The mortgage-deed of the 22nd June, 1866, the conditional sale-deed of the same date, and the sale-deed of the 11th December, 1869, show that the defendant Syed Mansab Ali was dealing with the property in question as the sole vendee and owner of it, and this subsequently to the alleged award of the 10th July, 1863. The witnesses Pershad and Gauri Shankar prove that for several years the defendant Syed Mansab Ali was the person who was in possession of the property in question.

[88] The evidence of the defendant's witness Jagannath, where he says that Mir Syed Ali gave the purchase-money to Basant, is contradicted by Dewan, one of the vendors, who says that it was Syed Mansab Ali who paid the price. We believe the witness Dewan. The evidence of the defendant's witnesses, Jagannath, Dhamna and Umrao, as to the persons who made the collections is at variance with the written statement of the defendants Yad Ali, Karam Ali and Musammat Khair-ul-nissa, in which they say that Syed Mansab Ali managed the cultivation and collections and the Court business, and is contradicted by the evidence of Gauri Shankar, and inferentially by that of Dewan and Pershad. The defendants have relied upon the report of the Tahsildar of pargana Mahoba of the 13th October, 1875, and the order passed on the 6th November, 1875 (documents Nos. 147 and 148). The observation which we make as to these documents is that there is nothing to show that the plaintiffs were aware of the application referred to in them, and that it is more than probable that that application was collusively made with the object of providing evidence to defeat the rights of the plaintiffs which had accrued four years previously, that is to say, in 1871. The defendants tendered in evidence before us a document alleged to be a copy of an award made on the 10th July, 1863. We rejected this evidence on the ground that it was not proved to our satisfaction that any such award was made, and that the absence of the original, if made, was not satisfactorily accounted for. The story as to the loss of the original document and that of the other instrument referred to in the Subordinate Judge's judgment, and the finding of the pieces, appeared to us to be too suspicious to be acted upon by us. No arbitration agreement was produced, although Sarfaraz Husain, a witness for the defendants, had stated that it remained with the Kazi. Besides, no such agreement to refer or award is alluded to in the deed of agreement, dated the 1st November, 1878, executed by the defendants Syed Mansab Ali, Yad Ali and Karam Ali, by which disputes as to property, including the property in question, were referred to arbitration. The evidence of the defendant's witnesses as to what was the subject and scope of the alleged arbitration and the nature of the alleged award we have rejected on the ground that the alleged agreement to refer and the alleged award have not been produced, and the absence of [89] those documents has not been satisfactorily accounted for. As to the defence of payment, we agree entirely with the finding of the Subordinate Judge and his reasons. Further, if the evidence as to the payment is to be credited, the defendant Mansab Ali within two years after the execution of the bond made payments which were more than sufficient to discharge the principal and interest then due. No receipt has been produced, and although the bond provides that all payments on account should be endorsed upon it, and that no unendorsed credits should be claimed by Syed Mansab Ali, no payments have been endorsed on the instrument. If the payments had been made, it is inexplicable that the mortgagor would have allowed the mortgagees to retain possession of the bond from 1870 to the present day. As to the paper No. 43, the Court below properly rejected it as evidence, as we also have done.

Finding as we do, for the reasons which we have already stated, that the property hypothecated by the deed of the 5th January, 1868, was the separate property of Syed Mansab Ali, and that the principal and interest made payable by that deed are still due and unpaid, it remains to be considered to what extent the claim of the plaintiffs is to be decreed.

It is clear that the plaintiffs are entitled to the principal, together with interest at the agreed rate of Rs. 2-2 per mensem for three years and six months from the date of the execution of the bond, the 5th January, 1868, up to the 30th of June, 1871. It is not disputed that this at least is the legal construction of the bond and the result of our findings on the facts. The plaintiffs, however, claim to be entitled in addition to interest from and subsequent to the 30th June, 1871. They contend that by the bond itself such additional interest is expressly made payable, or that we should infer from the wording of the bond that it was the intention of the parties that interest should be payable until the principal should have been repaid, or that the plaintiffs are entitled to damages for the non-payment on the 30th June, 1871, of the principal and interest then due, and that such damages may be awarded for the period of six years immediately prior to the commencement of this action. This latter contention was based on the further contention that the non-payment of the principal and interest on the agreed date constituted a continuing breach, giving a continually renewed cause of [90] action from day to day from that date up to the commencement of the action. As we read the authorities, interest as interest cannot be allowed on money lent in India on a hypothecation bond, or on a deed of conditional sale, unless it appears from the bond or deed that it was the intention of the parties that interest should be payable, and then only for the period during which it so appears that it was intended that interest should be payable. The principal authorities on this point are collected in the notes at pages 113 and 114 of Macpherson's Law of Mortgage in British India, 7th ed. In the case of Cook v. Fowler (1) it was decided in the House of Lords, (so far as the law in England is concerned) that in a contract for the payment of money borrowed for a fixed period on a certain day, with interest at a certain rate down to that day, a further contract for the continuance of the same rate of interest after that day until actual payment is not "to be implied, unless there is something to justify it upon the words of the particular instrument; and that although in cases of this class interest for the delay of payment post diem ought to be given, it is on the principle, not of implied contract, but of damages for a breach of contract." See Lord Selborne's judgment in that case.

The mortgage-deed in question, so far as it bears upon this question, is as translated in the following words:—"I therefore declare and write that I shall without any objection discharge and pay in full the principal with interest at the rate of Rs. 2-2-0 per cent. per mensem within three years and six months from the date of the execution of this bond up to the 30th June, 1871. All the payments made by me, the executant, to the said mortgagees at each harvest and in each year shall first be applied to the payment of interest, and the balance, if any, shall be carried towards the satisfaction of the principal. I shall cause the payments I make to be endorsed on this document, and if I, the declarant, claim any payment not entered on the back of this document, such claim shall be false and untenable. If the mortgage-money together with interest be not paid in full within the stipulated time, then under this document the mortgage on the property hypothecated by me shall be foreclosed, and the mortgagees shall be at liberty to take proprietary possession of my the executant's share." There is [91] here obviously no express agreement to pay interest post diem, and we are of opinion that no such agreement can be implied from this deed. As we read the deed, the expressed intention of the parties was that if on the 30th of June, 1871, the principal and interest then due were not paid, the mortgagees should be entitled to foreclose for the principal and interest due and unpaid on the 30th of June, 1871, and not for any interest post diem. In our opinion, the wording of the deed negatives any such implication as that contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs. Whether or not the plaintiffs are entitled to have damages awarded to them for the non-payment of the principal and interest on the 30th June, 1871, must depend on whether or not s. 23 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, applies to this case. The damages are claimed in respect of the breach of a contract in writing registered within the meaning of art. 116 of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, and, unless s. 23 applies, the period of limitation is six years from the date of the breach (see arts. 116 and 115 of the second schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1877). It cannot be said that there were here successive breaches within the meaning of art. 115. The contract was to pay the amount due on the 30th June, 1871, if not previously paid, and on the failure to pay on the day appointed the breach of the contract was committed. There are many contracts of which there may be successive breaches, as for instance contracts by which a party to the contract agrees to do or to forbear doing two or more different things: in such contracts the contracting party may commit several breaches by not doing those things which he has contracted to do, or by doing those things which he has contracted not to do. The contract under consideration was to do one thing; that was to pay the amount due on or before the 30th June, 1871, and on the non-payment of the money on the day appointed the breach of the contract was committed. It cannot, in our opinion, be said that there was here a continuing breach. A covenant for title is an instance of a contract of which, according to the English law, there may be continuing breaches. So is a covenant to maintain a building, in repair. There is a breach of the covenant for title so long as an adverse title exists, and there is a breach of a covenant to maintain a building in repair so long as the building is out of repair. To take another [92] example from the English law, the period of limitation prima facie begins to run on a promissory note payable on demand from the date of the note, the debt being payable without any demand, and the non-payment of the note is not, according to English law, a continuing breach which extends the period of limitation. The Indian Limitation Act specifically provides for the period of limitation for bringing an action on a promissory note payable on demand, but this fact does not make the illustration from the English law the less apposite. We are clearly of opinion that the breach of agreement here took place on the 30th of June, 1871, and that there was no continuing breach within the meaning of s. 23 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877. Taking this view of the law, we must hold that the claim of the plaintiffs to compensation for breach of the agreement is barred by art. 116 of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, and must be disallowed. The result is that a decree as against the defendant Syed Mansab Ali will be drawn up in accordance with s. 86 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, but limiting the amount to be paid to be Rs. 2,300 principal money and interest thereon at the agreed rate of Rs. 2-2-0 per mensem for three years and one-half, that is, from the 5th January, 1868, up to the 30th of June, 1871, with proportionate costs and interest at the rate of Rs. 12 per centum per annum during the pendency of the suit, and at the rate of Rs. 6 per centum from the date of the decree until payment or the expiration of six months from the date of the decree, whichever shall first happen, and to this extent the appeal of the defendant Syed Mansab Ali is allowed with proportionate costs to him to be allowed in account.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[93] Before Mr. Justice Straight and Mr. Justice Brodhurst.

THE UNCOVENANTED SERVICE BANK, LIMITED (Plaintiff). v. GRANT (Defendant.)* [10th November 1887.]Limitation—Acknowledgment in writing—Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act) s. 19, explanation I.

In a suit upon a bond brought against the defendant as a principal debtor, an acknowledgment of liability as a surety only is sufficient to save limitation, with reference to s. 19, explanation I, of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877).

THIS was a suit brought by the Uncovenanted Service Bank, Limited, against C. W. Stapleton, Mrs. M. S. Stapleton, and Lieutenant-Colonel C. W. Grant, for recovery of Rs. 1,088-9-0, principal and interest due upon a bond dated the 17th April, 1879. As regards the two first-named defendants the suit was not pressed, the plaintiff (Bank) having been unable to ascertain their place of residence and to serve summonses upon them. The plea of the defendant (Colonel Grant) was that he had "executed the bond as a surety only," to which extent he admitted the claim, and he prayed "that in passing the decree in this suit the Court will be pleased to make a provision that execution shall be taken only against the principal debtors first, and in case of their failure to satisfy it the decree may be executed against him."

The suit was instituted on the 9th June, 1885. The third paragraph of the plaint was as follows:—"That the claim of the plaintiff is within limitation, inasmuch as the defendants subsequently, and before the expiry of the period of limitation, acknowledged the said debt by their acknowledgments hereto attached."

So far as regards the defendant, Colonel Grant, the acknowledgments here referred to were contained in three letters written by him to the Manager of the Bank, and dated respectively the 13th July, 1881, the 6th June, 1882, and the 22nd February, 1883. The first of these letters was as follows:—"Your letter of the 19th instant just came to hand. I was under the impression that the amount of Rs. 1,000, for which I went in security for Mr. Stapleton, had been paid up long ago. Of course I do not dispute my liability for the balance remaining, Rs. 698-8-0, but as I have not received any notice of Mr. Stapleton having been a defaulter, I [94] must ask you to give me a few days' grace to enable me to write to him, to find out whether he wishes to let me in for the whole sum, or whether he has any sort of plan to suggest." The letter of the 6th June, 1882, contained expressions to the effect that the writer did not "deny his liability," but thought "that Mr. Stapleton and other sureties should pay up something." The letter of the 22nd February, 1883, contained these expressions:—"You appear to have twisted the meaning of my letter. I wish to see Mr. Stapleton, whether he is going to meet his engagement like an honest man or his going to let me in. I have no intention of withdrawing from the position I have taken up, as I wish Mr. Stapleton's conduct in the matter to be known to the public."

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Agra) was of opinion, upon the construction of the bond in suit, that Colonel Grant was liable as a surety only; and that the action of the plaintiff (Bank) in not pressing the suit against the principal debtors was equivalent to a release or discharge of those debtors which, under s. 134 of the Contract Act, operated as a discharge of the surety. The Court accordingly dismissed the suit.

On appeal by the plaintiff (Bank), the District Judge of Agra gave judgment as follows:—

"This is a suit on a bond dated the 17th April, 1879. Colonel Grant, respondent, says he was a surety only. According to the terms of the bond he was a principal. Admitting that could properly be permitted to adduce evidence in contradiction of the bond to show he was not a principal but a surety, there is no evidence which shows that there was any arrangement made between him and the appellant, in whose favour the bond was executed, to the effect that he, respondent, was to be treated only as a surety. There may have been an understanding between the respondent and Mr. Stapleton, who was a co-executant of the bond that the latter was to be primarily responsible as principal; but if such an arrangement was made, it is not shown that the appellant consented to it.

"A point has, however, been raised on behalf of the respondent which appears to me to be fatal to the appellant. This suit was brought after the ordinary period of limitation had expired. [95] Limitation has been saved by written acknowledgments given by the respondent. They are contained in his letters to the appellant dated the 13th July, 1881, the 6th June, 1882, and the 22nd February, 1883. In these letters he acknowledged liability only as a surety. His pleader argues that the appellant, who relies on the letters to save limitation, is bound by the restriction implied by their terms, and that he cannot succeed against the respondent as a principal when he only acknowledged liability as a surety.

"Having referred to such authorities as are at hand, I find that, according to the rulings of English Courts of law, the plea urged by the respondent's pleader is valid. There is in particular a case in which it was ruled that a promise by a debtor in respect of a debt for which he was jointly liable with others to pay his proportion of the debt renewed his liability only to the extent of his proportion: Lechmere v. Fletcher (1); and there is another case in which a promise by a surety to make up what the principal debtor should fail to pay was held to renew the debt for the deficiency only, after application to the debtor: Humphreys v. Jones (2).

"The rulings referred to were given on the principle that where an action is brought after ordinary limitation has run, and the creditor is obliged to rely on a renewed promise, he can enforce the promise only to the extent to which the debtor has limited it, and a conditional acknowledgment operates only subject to the condition. I am not aware of any rulings by High Courts in India laying down a different principle. I therefore hold that in this suit the appellant can only deal with the respondent as a surety.

"It follows that the appellant cannot succeed in his appeal: for having sued the respondent along with two other defendants as principals, he got the lower Court to pass an order exempting the other two from being parties. That is to say, he withdrew from his suit against the other two. He did not ask the Court for permission to withdraw with liberty to bring a fresh suit, nor did the Court's order permit withdrawal with liberty to bring a fresh suit. The withdrawal without permission to bring a fresh suit involved the discharge of the other two executants of the bond alleged by the appellant to be principals. Their discharge discharges the respondent, according to the principle of s. 134 of Act IX of [96] 1872. I consider, therefore, that the appellant is not entitled to a decree against the respondent, and I dismiss this appeal with costs."

(1) 1 C. & M. 623.

(2) 14 M. & W. 1.

The plaintiff (Bank) appealed to the High Court from the District Judge's decree.

Maulvi Abdul Majid and Munshi Hanuman Prasad, for the appellant.

Mr. G.T. Spankie and Lala Durga Charan, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—It is sufficient for the purpose of determining the questions raised in this appeal to say that the learned Judge in the Court below has held that the defendant-respondent was a principal debtor under the bond of the 17th April, 1879, and in that capacity liable to the present suit. The contention on behalf of the plaintiff (Bank) is that the Judge, having formed this opinion as to the character filled by him in respect of that instrument, has erroneously held that the three letters of the 13th July, 1881, 6th June, 1882, and the 22nd February, 1883, did not constitute an acknowledgment so as to save time running against the plaintiff (Bank). I am of opinion that the contention for the plaintiff-appellant is a good one, and that these three letters and each of them does constitute such an acknowledgment as is contemplated by s. 19 of the Limitation law, more particularly having reference to the language of the explanation I of that section. Incidentally I may observe that the language of the explanation I, is exceedingly wide, and that it covers cases which would not be covered by the ordinary rules applicable in the English Courts to acknowledgments which have been set up by the parties for the purpose of saving limitation. I think that those letters were acknowledgments of the right of the plaintiff (Bank) to the amount of the bond-debt due to them, and that the mere circumstance that the defendant therein mentioned that his liability was of a conditional character only did not make them any the less acknowledgments. They were, in my opinion, sufficient to save time to the plaintiffs and make their present suit unobjectionable upon the score of limitation. This being so, the appeal is decreed, the judgment of the Judge reversed, and the case will be restored to his file of pending appeals and disposed of upon the merits. Costs hitherto incurred will be costs in the cause.

BRODHURST, J.—I concur.

THE facts of this case were as follows:—In March, 1876, a suit was brought by the Mussoorie Bank, Limited, in the Court of Small Causes at Dehra Dun, against A. C. Raynor and Caroline Raynor, the executors of Mrs. M. A. Raynor, to recover a sum of money due to the Bank by the deceased. On the 18th April, 1876, the suit was decreed on confession of judgment. On the 25th May, 1876, upon application by the decree-holders, the Court attached thirty shares in the Delhi and London Bank standing in Mrs. Raynor's name, by an order under s. 236 of Act VIII of 1859, the Civil Procedure Code then in force. An objection to this attachment was filed by the defendant A. C. Raynor under s. 246 of the same Act, praying for the release of twenty-four of the shares upon the allegation that he was entitled to them in his own right under the will of Captain Raynor, the husband of the deceased Mrs. Raynor; that Mrs. Raynor had under that will a life-interest only in her husband's property with a power of appointment among her children; and that the shares were therefore not liable to attachment and sale in satisfaction of her debt. This objection was disallowed; and in March, 1877, a regular suit was brought [98] by A. C. Raynor in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Dehra Dun, in which he claimed a declaration of his right to, and possession of, the twenty-four shares and to have the summary order dismissing his objection set aside. On the 10th May, 1878, the suit was dismissed, the Subordinate Judge being of opinion that Mrs. Raynor took an absolute interest under Captain Raynor's will, and that consequently the twenty-four shares, as forming part of her estate, were attachable in execution of the Mussoorie Bank's decree for her debt. On the 22nd August, 1878, the High Court, on appeal by A. C. Raynor, reversed the Subordinate Judge's decree, holding that, under Captain Raynor's will, Mrs. Raynor held the estate not absolutely, but for life, as trustee for her children, with a power of appointment among them (3). The costs due to Raynor under this decree were Rs. 1,177-14-9.

At various dates from the 8th May to the 9th December, 1878, applications were made, on behalf of the Bank, for the arrest of Raynor in execution of a decree against him passed by the High Court on the 2nd January, 1878, under which Rs. 2,959-8 were due from him to the Bank. In pursuance of orders passed on these applications Raynor was several times arrested, but on making various payments in part satisfaction, was released. On the 12th December, 1878, Raynor having applied for execution of the High Court's decree of the 22nd August, the Subordinate Judge passed an order attaching the certificates of the twenty-four shares in the possession of the manager of the Mussoorie Bank. On the 13th January, 1879, the High Court refused leave to the Bank to appeal from the decree of the 22nd August to Her Majesty in Council. On the 10th February, the Manager, in pursuance of an order of the Subordinate Judge, produced the certificates in Court. They were handed over on the same date to Mr. H. B. Goodall, Barrister-at-Law, who had acted throughout as counsel for Raynor. This was done in pursuance of a written agreement entered into between Raynor and Goodall on the 17th January, whereby Raynor agreed to transfer to Goodall all his rights and interests in the twenty-four shares, in consideration of Goodall's paying off the Mussoorie Bank's decree of the 2nd January, 1878, and paying to Raynor Rs. 1,000 in cash. Upon the certificates being handed to Goodall [99] on the 10th February as already mentioned, Raynor executed in his favour a deed whereby he formally transferred the shares in pursuance of the agreement. On the 26th February, upon the application of Raynor, the Court of Small Causes released the shares from the attachment placed on them by its order of the 25th May, 1876.

On the 14th August, 1879, the Privy Council gave the Mussoorie Bank special leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council from the High Court's decree of the 22nd August, 1878. Judgment was given in the appeal on the 21st March, 1882, the effect of the decree being to set aside, the decision of the High Court and to dismiss the regular suit instituted by Raynor in the Subordinate Judge's Court in March, 1877 (1). The Mussoorie Bank thereupon, on the 22nd June, 1882, applied to the Court of Small Causes to proceed with the execution of the decree of the 18th April, 1876, but apparently took no further steps in that Court, which, on the 9th March, 1885, passed an order striking off the case. Meanwhile, on the 24th July, 1882, the Bank presented an application to the Subordinate Judge in Raynor's regular suit for execution of the decree of Her Majesty in Council, by restoring the certificates of the twenty-four shares which had been given up on the 10th February, 1879, under the High Court's decree of the 22nd August, 1878. On the 12th December, 1882, Raynor, who had been ordered "to produce the shares in Court," filed a petition in which he set forth the transfer of the shares to Goodall on the 10th February, 1879, and stated that in consequence of Goodall being in England, he could not at that time produce the shares, and prayed for an adjournment of six months to enable him to sue Goodall for their recovery. This application was rejected, and Raynor was arrested in execution of the Privy Council's decree; but the bank failed to obtain satisfaction, and on the 3rd March, 1884, applied to the Subordinate Judge to make Goodall a party to the execution proceedings. On the 1st April, 1884, the Subordinate Judge issued a notice to Goodall, who was then in England, in the following terms:—

"In pursuance of an order passed this day in the above suit, you are hereby required to appear in this Court, either in person or by [100] a duly authorized pleader, on or before the 15th July, 1884, and show cause why you should not be called upon to restore the twenty-four Delhi and London Bank, Limited, shares, numbered 7371 to 7394, made over to you by the plaintiff."

Notwithstanding this notice, Goodall at some time in June or July, 1884, transferred the twenty-four shares through a broker. On the 25th November, 1884, an order was passed by the Subordinate Judge on the Bank's application of the 3rd March previous, directing that Goodall's name should be placed on the record, so that the Privy Council's decree might be executed against him. An application by Goodall to the High Court for revision of this order under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code was rejected on the 9th May, 1885, on the ground that the order was passed under s. 372 of the Code and was appealable under s. 588 (21) (1).

On the 7th December, 1885, Goodall having, by the preceding orders, been made a party to the execution proceedings, the Bank applied for execution of the decree against him by attachment and sale of his house at Mussoorie, "if he fails to restore the twenty-four Delhi and London Bank shares and their dividends taken by him which are the subject of this suit." On the 28th January, 1886, an order was passed by the Subordinate Judge, purporting to be made under s. 259 of the Civil Procedure Code, and directing that the house should be sold, unless within six months the shares should be handed over. Upon the same date the house was attached by an order under s. 274 of the Code. On the 3rd May, 1886, a petition was presented by Goodall, in which he objected to the attachment and prayed for its removal; and at length, after repeated adjournments, the Subordinate Judge, on the 28th February, 1887, gave judgment dismissing the petition and ordering the sale [101] to proceed, if the shares were not made over by Goodall within a further period of six months.

The Court's order was in the following terms:—"He is ordered to produce the shares called for, Nos. 7371 to 7394, Delhi and London Bank, within six months from this date. Should Mr. Goodall prefer it, he is hereby allowed to hand over to the Court, or to the Mussoorie Bank, Delhi and London Bank shares of a value equivalent to the twenty-four shares in question as given above or again Mr. Goodall is permitted to pay in a sum of money into Court, or to the Mussoorie Bank, equivalent to the value of the twenty-four shares at the prevailing market rate. In addition, Mr. Goodall must pay all the interest which has fallen due on the twenty-four shares from the date on which he got possession up to such date on which he obeys the above order in any one of the ways specified. An enquiry will have to be made in order to ascertain what amount of interest be due, and, if necessary, a commission will issue for that purpose. In case Mr. Goodall fails to obey the Court's orders within the specified period of six months, the property, under s. 259 of the Code, will, on the application of the Mussoorie Bank, decree-holder, be sold, and the proceeds dealt with as provided for by that section. Mr. Goodall must also pay all costs of these proceedings."

From this order Goodall appealed to the High Court. The sixth of the grounds taken in the memorandum of appeal was "that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in holding that the appellant purchased the shares pendente lite, and in making appellant a party to the execution proceedings under s. 372 of the Civil Procedure Code."

Mr. A. Strachey, for the appellant.

(1) Raynor v. The Mussoorie Bank, Limited, 7 A. 691, where the Subordinate Judge's order of the 25th November, 1884, is set forth. The report of that case contains mistakes which may conveniently be corrected here. The title of the case should be Goodall v. The Mussoorie Bank, Limited, Raynor not having been a party. Both in the judgment and in the statement of facts it is made to appear that the Subordinate Judge's order under revision was passed on Raynor's application of the 12th December, 1882, and the judgment proceeds to a considerable extent upon the supposition that the case was "a controversy between two judgment-debtors inter se" and that the decree-holder was not a party to it. In point of fact the order was, as above stated, passed on the application of the decree-holder, the Mussoorie Bank, of the 3rd March, 1884, against Goodall only; and Raynor's application of the 12th December, 1882, was rejected, and not granted, by an order dated the 14th of the same month.

[STRAIGHT, J.—Confine yourself to your sixth ground of appeal. I do not see what jurisdiction the Subordinate Judge had to make the order of the 25th November, 1884, making the appellant a party to the suit after decree.]

There was no jurisdiction to make such an order: Attorney-General v. Corporation of Birmingham (1), Gocool Chunder Gossamee v. The Administrator-General of Bengal (2), per Pontifex, J. [102] See Order XVII, Rules 1 and 3 under the Judicature Act, Rules of 1883. The appellant did not purchase "pending the suit."

The other side will rely on s. 647 of the Code, but that section does not mean that the procedure in suits before decree is to be applied indiscriminately after decree. It was intended to provide a procedure for miscellaneous matters, such as probate, similar to that of suits: Amir Hasan v. Ahmad Ali (3), Naigappa v. Gangawa (4), in the matter of the petition of Jodoo Monee Dossee (5). The only way in which s. 647 could have been applied was to make the appellant a party while the appeal was pending before Her Majesty in Council by application to the Judicial Committee, or, if the appellant had purchased during the proceedings in execution of the Privy Council decree, those proceedings might have been treated as analogous to a suit. Further, the proper person, if any, to be made a party under s. 372 was not Goodall, but his transferee. At the time when the order of the 25th November, 1884, was passed, the appellant had parted with all his interest in the share [He was stopped].

Mr. J. E. Howard, for the respondent (the Mussoorie Bank). This plea is too late. The order of the 25th November, 1884, as pointed out by Tyrrell, J., might have been appealed under s. 588 (21) of the Code. No appeal having been preferred, the order has become final and cannot now be questioned.

Mr. A. Strachey, for the appellant, in reply. The order of the 25th November, 1884, was of an interlocutory character, and the order now under appeal is in the nature of a final decree—s. 2 of the Code—in appeal from which all interlocutory orders, appealable or otherwise, may be objected to: Civil Procedure Code, s. 591, Har Narain Singh v. Kharag Singh (6) Googlee Sahoo v. Premlal Sahoo (7). The objection goes to the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge to make the order now under appeal, and it may be made at any time.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—This is an appeal from an order passed by the Subordinate Judge of Dehra Dun on the 28th February, 1887. That order professes to be passed in execution of a Privy Council [103] decree dated the 21st March, 1882, and I may, for the purpose of making it quite intelligible why I have adopted the view of this case that I have, state a few dates and facts. Some time prior to August, 1878, a gentleman of the name of Raynor brought a suit against the Mussoorie Bank in respect of an attachment that had been made of twenty-four shares in the London and Delhi Bank. That suit was instituted in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Dehra Dun, and it was ultimately dismissed by that Court. Then an appeal was preferred to this Court, and Sir Robert Stuart, Chief Justice, and Pearson, J., who heard that appeal, reversed the decision of the Subordinate Judge, and decreed the plaintiff's suit on the 22nd August, 1878.

The Bank then applied to the two learned Judges of this Court who had heard the appeal for leave to appeal from their decree to their Lordships of the Privy Council, and on the 13th January, 1879, that application was refused. The Bank incidentally observed, I suppose for the purpose of affording information to the parties, that it was open to them to go direct to their Lordships of the Privy Council and obtain special leave. That course was adopted by the Mussoorie Bank, and on the 14th August, 1879, they obtained such leave from their Lordships of the Privy Council, and their appeal was admitted. Between the date when this Court refused leave and the date when special leave was granted by the Privy Council, twelve out of the twenty-four shares in the London and Delhi Bank which were the subject-matter of the action were transferred by Raynor to Mr. Goodall, the appellant before us. Whether that was a transfer pendente lite is a matter about which, I am not called upon to express any opinion, and I express none, though upon further consideration since yesterday, and in order to correct any erroneous impression that may have been gathered from some remarks made by me, I am by no means clear that the doctrine of lis pendens will apply to the circumstances of this case. The Privy Council order decreeing the appeal and dismissing the suit was made on the 21st March, 1882, and in the ordinary course it was forwarded to this Court for transmission to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Dehra Dun for execution. On the 24th July, 1882, an application for execution was made, and among the matters asked by the decree-holder was that the Court would cause [104] the shares unduly realized by Raynor in execution of the High Court's decree to be restored. Upon that application an order was made by the Subordinate Judge directing Raynor to produce the shares, and he failing to do so, an order was made for his arrest, and, as I understand it, he was arrested. From that time until the month of March, 1884, no further steps seem to have been actively taken for the purpose of executing the decree; but on the 3rd March, 1884, the Bank filed a petition in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, praying that Goodall, the appellant before us, might be brought on as the representative of Raynor. On the 1st April, 1884, the Court issued a notice to Goodall, the terms of which are most significant, and they in substance were as follows, namely, that Goodall was to show cause why he should not be called upon to restore the shares. Now that was the notice to Goodall, and was the only intimation he ever received from the Court of the Subordinate Judge as to what was required from him, and yet upon a notice of that kind, and in reference to a certain affidavit which Goodall sent from England to the Court of the Subordinate Judge, that Court, on the 25th November, 1884, made Goodall a party to the decree in the character of a judgment-debtor. Having put him on the record in that character and after certain proceedings had been held, the Subordinate Judge subsequently passed the order of which complaint is now made on the 28th February, 1887, by which, treating Goodall as a judgment-debtor and as a person amenable to the execution of the decree, they directed him either to hand over the shares or to pay their equivalent, and went on to order that, in default of doing so, under the provisions of s. 259, certain property belonging to him would be sold to satisfy decree.

At the commencement of the argument yesterday, which was so concisely put before us by Mr. Strachey for the appellant, I suggested to him the propriety of confining himself to the single question of the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge to pass such an order by reason of his want of jurisdiction to have passed the order of the 25th November, 1884, making Goodall a party to the decree. That is the only question that has been discussed, that is the only question which I propose to decide, and, as I am in favour of the [105] appellant upon that point, his appeal will succeed, and the order of the Judge will be set aside.

Before, however, closing the remarks I have to make in regard to this case, I desire to point out why it is that I think the order of the Judge is without jurisdiction. Mr. Howard for the respondent yesterday suggested that as the order of the 25th November, 1884, had not been appealed as it might have been, it had, by reason of the absence of any such appeal, become final, and it was not open to Mr. Strachey in the present proceeding to question the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge to make either that order or any other order passed in regard to Goodall, who by that order had been joined as a judgment-debtor.

I dissent from that contention of Mr. Howard, and I have no hesitation in holding that in an appeal of the kind before me, where the objection goes to the very root of the matter and to the authority of the Court to make the order in the sense that it had no jurisdiction at all, I am entitled to entertain it, and if it has force, to give effect to it. In my opinion the Subordinate Judge had no power under the law to bring in a party after the decree and make him a judgment-debtor for the purpose of applying the provisions applicable to the execution of the decree. It is said that taking s. 647 of the Code and reading it in conjunction with s. 372, it is competent for a Court executing a decree to do on the execution side what a Court on the original side may do under the latter section; that is to say, it may, after decree, bring in any person who, by assignment, creation, or devolution of any interest pending the suit, has become interested in the subject-matter thereof. It is noticeable that s. 647 is specific in its terms. It says that the procedure herein prescribed shall be followed "as far as it can be made applicable" in all proceedings in any Court of civil jurisdiction other than suits and appeals. But it is impossible to my mind to make s. 372 applicable to execution proceedings, because by its own language it negatives any such applicability to execution proceedings. The words used there are "assignment, &c., pending the suit." What the meaning of the words "pending the suit" is to my mind perfectly clear, namely, during the progress of the suit and before the passing of the decree, and in that interpretation I am [106] borne out by the observations of Pontifex, J., in Gocool Chander Gossamee v. The Administrator-General of Bengal (1). Moreover, in reference to a somewhat analogous rule under the Judicature Act, I find a decision of Jessel, M. R., concurred in by James and Brett, L. JJ., in Attorney-General v. Corporation of Birmingham (2), where Jessel, M. R., remarks:—"A statement of claim or bill cannot be amended after final judgment. If it becomes necessary to enforce that judgment against persons who have acquired a title after it was made, an action must be brought for that purpose."

Here it is to be observed that in the wording of s. 372 the language is almost identical with the rule cited by Jessel, M. R., and it shows what is to be done in reference to the continuing of a suit, i.e., a trial of a case when the subject-matter with which the suit is concerned has passed away to another person. It is not pretended here that Goodall acquired any interest prior to the date of the decree; on the contrary, it was subsequent to the decree that he acquired such interest [see Raynor v. The Mussoorie Bank (3)]. That being so, I am of opinion that ss. 372 and 647 had no application to the case; that Goodall was improperly made a judgment-debtor, and so improperly being made a judgment-debtor, the provisions of s. 259, which are sought to be enforced against him, are in no way applicable. The result is that the appeal is decreed with costs, quoad the Mussoorie Bank, and the order of the Subordinate Judge set aside. As to the respondent Raynor it is by consent dismissed with costs (1).

BALWANT SINGH (Plaintiff) v. SUBHAN ALI AND ANOTHER (Defendants).*
[12th November, 1887.]

Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz—“Pattidars”—“Chakdars.”

Held that the terms of a wajib-ul-arz conferring a right of pre-emption upon “pattidars” did not apply to a chakdar holding a share in the same chak as the vendor.

[R., 3 O. C. 110 (117).]

THIS was a suit for pre-emption based on the wajib-ul-arz of a village, which gave a right of pre-emption to “pattidars” in cases of transfer. The clause of the wajib-ul-arz relating to pre-emption was as follows:—“If any pattidar wishes to sell or mortgage a part or whole of his property, at first he will have to offer it to his brother or brother’s son or a member of the same family on a proper consideration. In case of their refusal he will transfer to the other co-sharers, and they will have to pay the same price as offered by the stranger; and in case of the latter’s refusal he will have power to mortgage or sell it to any one he likes.”

The facts of the case are set out in the following judgment of the lower appellate Court (District Judge of Allahabad) dismissing the suit:—

“This is a claim of pre-emptive right. The plaintiff-appellant and the vendor are ‘chakdars’ holding shares in the same chak. The question at issue is whether the right of pre-emption under the wajib-ul-arz extends to chakdars or not.

“I have no hesitation in deciding that it does not.

“The terms of the pre-emption clause clearly restrict its operation to ‘pattidars,’ and it is well understood that the object of the provision is in all cases to exclude strangers, and a chakdar would not ordinarily be one of the co-parcenary community, nor is it asserted that the applicant is so.

“It is, however, ingeniously contended that a chakdar, inasmuch as he is a proprietor paying revenue is as much a sharer in the mahal as a pattidar, and that the circumstance of his owning a certain area of land instead of a fractional share does not affect his status as a sharer in the mahal.

“[108] A ruling, Niamat Ali v. Asmat Bibi (2), has been referred to, to show that the expression ‘hakiyat’ has been held to mean any land * Second Appeal, No. 1390 of 1886, from a decree of F. E. Elliot, Esq., District Judge of Allahabad, dated the 4th June, 1886, confirming a decree of Pandit Indar Narain, Munsif of Allahabad, dated the 11th December, 1885.

(2) 7 A. 626.

held under a proprietary title, such as a grove, &c., and not merely a fractional share; and it is argued that a 'chak' thus comes within its scope, and therefore within the pre-emption clause, in which the word 'hakiyat' is used.

"The fallacy of this argument is patent. The 'chakdar' is a proprietor in the mahal no doubt, but he is not a pattidar or co-sharer of the mahal. The word 'hakiyat' may no doubt include a 'chak,' but that is not the point, which is, whether a 'chakdar' can claim the right to pre-emption, and not whether, if an acknowledged pattidar should sell a 'chak,' a right of pre-emption could be raised by another pattidar, to which latter case the ruling might apply. To the present case it does not.

"The fact that the chakdars are entered in the khewat and wajib-ul-arz does not advantage the appellant as it is contended on his behalf that it does. In the khewat they are necessarily entered, as they pay a quota of the Government demand and own proprietary rights, but they are even in that distinguished and separated from the pattidars.

"In the wajib-ul-arz they are similarly dealt with in the category of inferior proprietors.

"The difference between a 'pattidar' and a 'chakdar' is apparent in the fact that the former is jointly responsible with his fellow pattidars for the payment of the Government demand assessed on the mahal, and in the undivided part of a mahal has rights in each biswa, but no separate rights in any particular biswa, whereas the latter is responsible for his own quota of the revenue only, and owns a certain area which is all his own, while he has no right outside it.

"Neither party has produced any evidence to prove whether the chakdars were admitted to enjoyment for payment of the Government demand, but there can be no doubt that they were not.

"Failing the contention that a 'chakdar' is as much a sharer in the mahal as a 'pattidar,' and therefore has a good claim to [109] the right of pre-emption, it is argued that 'chakdars' have at least the same right among themselves within the limits of their 'chak' that the pattidars have in the whole mahal. This again is an ingenious but untenable proposition.

"The pre-emptive clause applies to pattidars only; there is no provision for its extension to chakdars even within the limits of their chak. This appears to me to be too obvious to require further remark.

"The appeal is dismissed with costs."

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court, on the ground that the terms of the wajib-ul-arz were applicable to chakdars.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

*Before Sir John Edge, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Tyrrell.*AHMAD ALI KHAN (Plaintiff) v. HUSAIN ALI KHAN (Defendant).*
[25th November, 1887.]*Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act), sch. ii, Nos. 60. 127—"Joint family property"—
"Exclusion" from such property.*

A Muhammadan family consisting of three brothers and their uncle jointly owned certain immoveable property which the uncle managed. Two of the brothers effected a settlement of accounts with the uncle, with reference to the profits of the estate; the share of three brothers was appropriated; and the money representing that share was deposited with the uncle. Subsequently the two who had effected the settlement withdrew their portion of the common share, and the third brother sued the uncle to recover a sum of money as his one-third portion. He alleged that he had been deceived by the defendant into supposing that his portion was included in the amount withdrawn by his brothers; but he did not base his suit, upon any allegation of fraud. It was contended that art. 127, sch. ii of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) applied to the suit, limitation running from a date whereon the defendant had denied all liability in respect of the plaintiff's demand.

[110] Held that the amount claimed could not, under the circumstances, be regarded as joint family property; that the defendant's denial of the plaintiff's right to recover that amount was not an exclusion of the plaintiff from such property, and that, consequently, art. 127 did not apply to the suit.

THE facts of this case were as follows:—The plaintiff Ahmad Ali Khan, his two brothers Asghar Ali Khan, and Khurshaid Ali Khan, and his uncle, the defendant Husain Ali Khan, held certain immoveable property jointly. This property was managed by the defendant. An agreement for partition of the estate having, in 1873, fallen through, on the 21st May, 1875, a settlement of accounts was effected between the plaintiff's two brothers and the defendant, with reference to the profits of the preceding thirteen years. Whether or not the plaintiff was an active party to that settlement was a matter of dispute. Upon the settlement of accounts, the plaintiff received Rs. 5,419 in cash, and a large sum of money (of disputed amount) was deposited by his brothers with the defendant. On the same date as the settlement of accounts and receipt of the Rs. 5,419, namely, the 21st May, 1875, the plaintiff joined with his brothers in executing in favour of the defendant a deed of acquittance, whereby they acknowledged having received all the money which was due to them by him for their share of the profits of the family property.

In 1876 the plaintiff brought a suit against his brothers Asghar Ali Khan and Khurshaid Ali Khan, in which the defendant Husain Ali Khan was subsequently added as a defendant by order of the Court. In that suit the plaintiff alleged that the money which on the taking of accounts in 1875 was ascertained to be the share of the three brothers was a sum of Rs. 88,531; that this amount less the Rs. 5,419 which he acknowledged having received had been deposited with Husain Ali Khan by his brothers; that they had dishonestly removed it from Husain Ali Khan's custody and deposited it elsewhere in their own separate account, and that out of it he was entitled to recover Rs. 24,091, being the balance of Rs. 29,570, which he alleged to be his one-third share of the * First Appeal, No. 216 of 1885, from a decree of Maulvi Muhammad Maksud Ali Khan, Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur, dated the 17th August, 1885.

Rs. 88,531. The defendant, Husain Ali Khan, pleaded in a written statement, dated the 18th August, 1877, that the accounts of thirteen years had been taken with the plaintiff's knowledge, that a deed of acquittance had been given by him, and that Rs. 83,111 [111] odd which remained after payment to the plaintiff of Rs. 5,419 had been deposited with him by the plaintiff's two brothers, and had been withdrawn by one of them in June, 1875, and nothing remained in his hands on deposit. On appeal the High Court decided that the plaintiff was not entitled to share in the amount deposited with the defendant and afterwards withdrawn by Asghar Ali Khan and Khurshaid Ali Khan, and accordingly dismissed the suit.

On the 15th May, 1884, the plaintiff brought the present suit against Hussain Ali Khan. In his plaint he alleged that his brothers and the defendant, on the 21st May, 1875, had adjusted the account of the joint estate and found that Rs. 1,12,200 were due to the plaintiff and his brothers from the defendant in respect of the profits of the estate. He alleged also that a deed of acquittance was drawn out, which he, not being acquainted with the real facts, signed at the request of his brothers and the defendant. In para. 6 of the plaint he said:—"After the adjustment of account, the aforesaid amount was placed in deposit with the defendant; and two-thirds of it, namely Rs. 74,800, were realized by the plaintiff's brothers as their share from the defendant; and by deducting Rs. 5,419, the balance is due to the plaintiff." He proceeded to allege that a misunderstanding took place between the defendant and his brothers, and the defendant seeing them ready to file a suit, gained over the plaintiff, who, according to his own account, was "a simpleton" and an inexperienced person, and that the defendant, by making use of the plaintiff's signature to some blank papers, caused a groundless suit in the name of the plaintiff to be brought against the plaintiff's brothers to the effect that they had his share in the money which they had realized, and that it should be paid to him by them. He further alleged that after that suit was determined the defendant put off from time to time paying the money to him, and at last he took measures to obtain his right; and he stated in para. 11 that his cause of action arose on the 25th October, 1883. He alleged in para. 12 that he was deceived by the defendant, but he did not base his action on any allegation of fraud. In para. 13 he stated:—"As the plaintiff has no proper means for enquiring into the facts prior to the amicable settlement of 1875, and he finds it useless to repu-[112] diate the adjustment of account and the matters irrelevant thereto, he is compelled to confine himself to one out of several reliefs, and he prays to obtain a decree for Rs. 31,981, being his share in the remaining amount held in deposit, with costs and future interest against the defendant. Suit valued at Rs. 31,981. All the papers relating to the case will be filed at the first hearing of the case."

In reply the defendant raised a number of pleas which it is unnecessary for the purposes of this report to mention. Para. 3 of the written statement was as follows:—"The allegation that at the adjustment of accounts the profits of the joint estate amounting to Rs. 1,12,000 were found due to the plaintiff and his brothers, and that they were deposited with the defendant, is quite false and contrary to the plaintiff's own repeated declarations. After the adjustment and settlement of the accounts, Rs. 88,531-11-9 only were found due to the plaintiff and his brothers, and with the exception of Rs. 5,419, which the plaintiff's brothers themselves got to be paid to the plaintiff, the whole of the balance of Rs 83,111-11-9 which was deposited with the defendant by the plaintiff's brothers was paid to them by him, as has been invariably admitted by the plaintiff." Para. 5 was as follows:—"The suit is fit to be dismissed for this reason also, that the defendant had, on the 18th August, 1877, in distinct words totally denied his responsibility to the plaintiff, and computing the period of limitation from the said date, this suit is certainly beyond time; because, whatever may be the nature of the plaintiff's demand, the cause of action in respect thereof had accrued on that date."

The Court of first instance held that the plaintiff's cause of action accrued on the 18th August, 1877, the date of the defendant's written statement in the former suit, and that the suit was barred by limitation. The Court at the same time considered the case upon the merits, and coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff had not proved the allegations contained in his plaint dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court. In reference to the question of limitation, it was contended that either art. 60 or art. 127 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) was applicable, and that, upon either supposition the suit was within time. In regard to art. [113] 60, it was argued that the deposit was admitted by the defendant in para. 3 of his written statement, and that there was no evidence of any demand prior to the 25th October, 1883, the date mentioned in para. 11 of the plaint. In regard to art. 127, it was argued that the amount claimed was "joint family property," that the plaintiff not having been a party to the settlement of accounts of the 21st May, 1875, nothing had been done which, so far as he was concerned, deprived the property of its joint family character or altered the nature of his title to it, and that his "exclusion" from his share, within the meaning of art. 127, accrued on the 18th August, 1877, when the defendant first denied all liability in respect of the share.

Mr. C. H. Hill, Mr. A. Strachey, and Pandit Sundar Lal, for the appellant.

The Hon. T. Conlan, Maulvi Abdul Majid, Munshi Hanuman Prasad, and Pandit Moti Lal Nehru, for the respondent.

EDGE, C. J. (after stating the facts, and holding that the conclusions of the Court of first instance upon the merits were substantially correct, continued):—The question of limitation has been argued in two ways before us. It has been argued that art. 60 of the 2nd schedule of the Limitation Act applies to this case on the basis that it has been proved that there was a deposit within the meaning of that article, and that we must infer an agreement to pay on demand, and that there was proof that the first demand was made on the 25th October, 1883. I see no evidence of deposit within the meaning of that article or at all, so far as the plaintiff is concerned. As I have said, it is very probable that these parties intended to defraud, and did probably in that transaction of May, 1875, defraud the plaintiff. But that is not his case now. The plaintiff relies of course on para. 3 of the defendant's written statement, but that paragraph would not assist the plaintiff, even if it were not absolutely at variance with the finding of this Court in the previous action. That paragraph makes no admission that any money was deposited by the plaintiff or by the plaintiff's brothers on the plaintiff's behalf with the defendant.

The other question which has been argued with regard to limitation is based on art. 127 of the 2nd sch. of the Limitation [114] Act. It is contended that art. 127 applies to this case, and that the plaintiff in the present action is a person excluded from joint family property who is suing now to enforce a right to share therein. There are two or three answers to that contention. In the first place, according to the plaintiff's own case, the account was settled, the share of the three brothers was appropriated, and the money representing that share was deposited with the defendant, and the plaintiff's two brothers subsequently drew out their portion of the common share of the three. That is the plaintiff's case. How the balance now claimed could be said, under those circumstances, to be joint family property, I fail to see. If the plaintiff's case was a true one, according to his plaint, that balance would represent the moneys which had come to him out of the joint family property; but having once so come to him, and having been separately appropriated and enjoyed by him, I fail to see anything of joint family property in it. It was the result of his having enjoyed the family property, and the fact of his having received it and then deposited it in the hands of the manager of the joint property would cause it to cease to retain the status of a joint family property, just as much as if it had been deposited in the hands of a third person not connected with the estate. I may say that I do not think that art. 127 applies at all to a cause like this. There has never been, so far as we know, a denial of the plaintiff's right to share in the family property. What has been denied is the plaintiff's right to recover the specific money. I cannot see how it can be said that he was excluded. If he has been excluded from the proceeds of his share, he was excluded either by fraud on the part of the defendant and his brothers, which is not the case which he attempts to make out here, or he was excluded in this sense, that he did not exercise his right of asking for the money from his agent. In any way looking at this case as launched before this Court on behalf of the plaintiff, we fail to see from the plaintiff's own case how art. 127 can possibly apply.

Under these circumstances, I come to the conclusion that the judgment and the decree of the Court below was a proper one, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

TYRRELL, J.—I concur.

In 1876 a Magistrate passed an order under s. 518 of Act X of 1875 (Criminal Procedure Code), directing the Saraogis of Etah to take one of their annual religious processions along a particular route and at a particular hour. In 1886, in which year there was no fresh promulgation of the order, the Saraogis took their procession along another route and at a different hour, and for so doing some of them were convicted and sentenced under s. 188 of the Penal Code.

SIONAL.10 A. 115=
8 A.W.N.
(1888) 25.Mr. J. Simeon, for the petitioners.Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudri and Babu Ratan Chand, for the respondents.

MAHMOOD, J.—This case has come up before me at the instance of the petitioners for interference in revision under s. 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The facts, out of which the dispute has arisen, may briefly be stated to be the following:—

In the town of Etah the Hindu population seems to be divided into two sections holding religious views antagonistic to each other. One of these sections, and probably, as I am informed, forming the majority of the population, are Vaishnavites, that is, the worshippers of Vishnu, who is one of the gods of the Hindu Trinity. The other sect, who are stated to be the minority of the population, are Saraogis or Jains, who repudiate entirely the sanctity of the Hindu Trinity of the Godhead and the authority of the minor gods and goddesses, and who also repudiate the sanctity of the Vedas, the Puranas, and other holy scriptures of the Hindu religion. Indeed, they are a section of the Buddhists holding doctrines which also prevail in other parts of India. These conflicting doctrines have before now produced disturbances of the peace in connection with religious processions. It is stated by Mr. Simeon on behalf of the petitioners, and I myself am aware of the fact as a matter of the religious history of this part of the country (of which fact I can [116] take judicial notice under the latter part of s. 57 of the Evidence Act I of 1872) that the Hindus belonging to the Vaishnav creed look with horror upon the appearance of the idol of Parasnath, whom the Saraogis worship, and, indeed, regard it as a sin to look at the idol. It was no doubt in consequence of this circumstance that, on the 2nd September, 1876, the Magistrate, acting under the authority which s. 518 of the Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1872) conferred upon him, promulgated an order whereby it was determined that the Saraogis were to take the procession of Rath-Jatra, or Parasnath-ka-Mela, as the ritual is called there, by a particular route and at a particular time. The object of making the night as the time when the Rath, or chariot, was to proceed was to obviate as much as possible the Vaishnav section of the Hindu community from looking upon the image.

It appears that for some years after the 2nd September, 1876, the route and the time of the procession of this annual ceremony were duly observed, and that no occasion arose for any dispute between the two sections of the community, and it was not till 1886 that any quarrel arose in respect of the matter.

It appears that in September, 1886, when the Saraogis contemplated the performance of the ceremony of Rath-Jatra, or religious procession of the chariot of Parsanath, which in many respects and incidents is analogous to the procession of the chariot of Jagarnath—a Vishnava Hindu deity—they applied to the Magistrate for certain police arrangements, no doubt expecting possible disturbances by the Vaishnav section of the community. Thereupon the Magistrate, by an order of the 13th September, 1886, which may perhaps be taken to have been passed under s. 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1882), issued no specific directions to the petitioners Saraogis, but directed the District Superintendent of Police to make the usual arrangements. The procession took place on the 14th September, 1886, in the forenoon of the day, and it proceeded by a route and at a time not prescribed by the Magistrate's order of the 2nd September, 1876, which pointed out night to be the time when the Rath was to be paraded.

Upon this state of things a complaint was made by Mr. Simeon's clients, the Vaishnav Hindus, charging Mr. Chaudhari's clients, the [117] Saraogis, with having committed the offence mentioned in s. 188 of the Indian Penal Code, and it resulted in a conviction of the accused and sentence of fine by the Magistrate, who held that the action of the Saraogis amounted to a disobedience of the Magistrate's order of the 2nd September, 1876. The Saraogis, who are represented before me by Mr. Chaudhri, appealed from such conviction to the learned Sessions Judge, who, by his order of the 2nd July, 1887, directed a further enquiry as to whether or not the original order of the 2nd September, 1876, was re-promulgated in 1886. It was found by the Magistrate upon evidence, and in that conclusion the learned Sessions Judge agreed, that the order of 1876 was not re-promulgated in 1886. The learned Judge, therefore, held that at the time when the procession of the Rath-Jatra took place on the 14th September, 1886, the Saraogis in varying the time and the route of the procession were not disobeying any subsisting order of the Magistrate, and that, therefore, they were not guilty of offence under s. 188 of the Indian Penal Code.

I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that in interpreting statutes of a penal character it is important to see that the powers conferred upon the Magistrates are duly exercised with reference to the rendering unlawful of acts that would otherwise be lawful. Under the old Code, Act X of 1872, s. 518 gave to Magistrates the power to issue orders in cases of obstruction, danger to human life, or riots, and the explanation to the section clearly shows that the Legislature in conferring this power intended it only to be applied to emergent matters. That section, however, did not prescribe any limitation or duration as to the duration of the order remaining in force; but a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Gopi Mohun Mullick v. Taramoni Chowdhurani (1) concurred in holding upon general principles of the interpretation of such statutes that the Magistrate was not empowered to pass an order under s. 518 of Act X of 1872, which would have more than a temporary operation, and that the grant of what is in effect an order for a perpetual injunction was beyond such magisterial jurisdiction. I follow the principles of that ruling, and I cannot help thinking that s. 144 of the present Code, in modifying the [118] law contained in the corresponding s. 518 of the old Code, takes into account what Garth, C. J., said in the Full Bench case to which I have referred, and I say this because I find that whilst s. 518 of the old Code was silent as to the duration of a Magistrate's order passed for the purposes mentioned, the present Code in the last paragraph of s. 144 contains express provisions, saying that "no order under this section shall remain in force for more than two months from the making thereof, unless in cases of danger to human life, health or safety, or a likelihood of a riot or an affray, the Local Government, by notification in the official Gazette, otherwise directs." This, then, is the present law, and I think also was virtually the older law, though, of course, no duration was named in the older Code.

Applying these views to this case, it is clear that the order of the 2nd September, 1876, was not promulgated again in 1886 by the Magistrate, and that no conviction could take place because of any disobedience of the order of September, 1876, an order which cannot be held as having subsisted ten years. Mr. Simeon on behalf of the petitioners has, indeed, contended that the language of the order of the 13th September, 1886, was to incorporate all the terms, conditions, and particular directions of the order of the 2nd September, 1876. I have heard the original order of September, 1886, and cannot accept this contention. The words of the order contain no specific directions either as to the time of the procession or the route through which it was to pass, and I cannot take the expression "as usual" to imply that the order of the 2nd September, 1876, was incorporated there in its entirety. And because the order of the 13th September, 1886, was silent as to this matter, no offence was committed by the Saraogis in carrying the procession by a route and at a time other than that prescribed by the Magistrate's order of 1876 as they did on the 14th September 1886.

I hold, therefore, that the learned Sessions Judge has rightly acquitted the Saraogis, and that no interference in revision is required by this Court. The application is dismissed. Application rejected.

Jurisdiction, presumption of—Maxim. Omnia praesumuntur rite et solemniter esse acta—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 103, 283, 647—High Court's power of revision—Civil Procedure Code, s. 622.

The consideration of an objection under s. 278 of the Civil Procedure Code, having first been entertained and adjourned by an Additional Subordinate Judge, subsequently came before the Subordinate Judge, who struck off the case for default. No order under s. 25 transferring the case to the Subordinate Judge was on the record, nor was it otherwise shown how he obtained jurisdiction to deal with it.

Held that the High Court, in the exercise of its revisional powers under s. 622 of the Code, should not presume that the Subordinate Judge had taken up the case without jurisdiction; that the proper remedy of the petitioner was an application under s. 103, read with s. 647, or suit under s. 283; and that the High Court should not interfere in revision.

THE facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Mahmood, J.

Pandit Sunder Lal, for the petitioner.

Mr. G. T. Spankie, for the respondent.

MAHMOOD, J.—This is an application presented to this Court invoking its interference, as a Court of revision, by exercise of the authority conferred upon it by s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code. The facts from which this application has arisen may briefly be recapitulated to be the following:—

One Musammat Kastura Kuar obtained a money decree against one Musammat Jelaba Kuar on the 16th July, 1884, and in execution of the decree, the property to which this litigation relates, was attached on the 30th November, 1886, as the property of the judgment-debtor. These proceedings of attachment admittedly took place in the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Ghazipur, and it was in that Court that the present petitioner, Babu Sheo Prasad, filed an application on the 30th March, 1887, objecting to the attachment mainly upon the ground that the judgment-debtor was not the owner of the property attached. Indeed, Pandit Sunder Lal, on behalf of the petitioner, concedes that the application was of the character contemplated by s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[120] It appears, then, the Rai Cheda Lal was the Additional Subordinate Judge of Ghazipur, and we find that, on the 10th May, 1887, he adjourned the hearing of the application. Another adjournment was made by his order of the 4th June, 1887, and then the case appears to have come on for hearing, not before the Additional Subordinate Judge, Rai Cheda Lal, but before Pandit Kashi Narain, who is the Subordinate Judge of the District, and by his order of the 14th June, 1887, the hearing of the application was once more adjourned. The order says that the pleaders for the parties having departed, the case was to come on for hearing the next day, i.e. the 15th June, 1887. What happened then is best represented by the order of the learned Subordinate Judge himself, and it runs as follows:—

“The case came on to-day again, and the pleaders have departed. Ordered that the case should be struck off for default.” This order, dated the 15th June, is the one of which revision is prayed for in this application.

The application originally came on before the learned Chief Justice, who, by his order of the 9th August, 1887, directed notice to be issued to the opposite party to “show cause why the order of Pandit Kashi Narain, dated the 15th June, 1887, should not be set aside on the ground that it was made without jurisdiction, and why the case should not be restored to the list of the Additional Subordinate Judge for disposal.”

In obedience to this order Mr. Spankie has appeared to show cause on behalf of the opposite party, and the learned counsel has, among other things, relied upon a preliminary contention which aims at showing that in the due exercise of its revisional powers this Court should not interfere. In the first place, the learned counsel contends that the rule contained in the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite et solemniter esse acta applied to this case, and that, until the contrary is shown, the order by the learned Subordinate Judge, Pandit Kashi Narain, of the 15th June, 1887, should be deemed to be an order passed with jurisdiction and in the manner the law contemplates.

To this argument the reply which Pandit Sundar Lal, on behalf of the petitioner, could make was that the only manner in which [121] the case could be within the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge was that a Court of appeal exercising its functions had transferred it under s. 25 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that the mere circumstance of the absence of such order from the record of the present case removed the presumption, and, indeed, proved, as the learned pleader contends, that the Subordinate Judge, Pandit Kashi Narain, had no jurisdiction to dispose of the case. The learned pleader has also argued that even if it be taken for granted that the learned Subordinate Judge and the Additional Subordinate Judge had concurrent jurisdiction over the matter, the circumstance that Rai Cheda Lal, the Additional Subordinate Judge, was seized of the case, would render the concurrent jurisdiction of the learned Subordinate Judge, Pandit Kashi Narain ineffective in taking over a case and making orders thereon, of which case the Additional Subordinate Judge was already seized. In supporting this argument the learned pleader has used the analogy of the concurrent jurisdictions of the various Judges of this Court, and he has contended that as one Judge seized of a case cannot thereafter be deprived of it by another Judge, so even if the Additional Subordinate Judge and the Subordinate Judge did possess concurrent jurisdiction, one could not be deprived of his legal powers to adjudicate upon a case he was seized of.

So far as the latter part of this contention is concerned, I do not think it necessary to determine the point because, although the argument has been very ably put before me by Pandit Sundar Lal, I cannot help feeling that the answer Mr. Spankie relies upon renders its decision unnecessary in this case. Mr. Spankie's contention is that the want of jurisdiction upon which the whole argument proceeds must not be presumed. I think this is a sound argument, because it seems to me that the want of jurisdiction may arise owing to numerous classes of facts which are to be determined by the lower Courts, and not by Courts of revision. There may be want of jurisdiction owing to territorial limits of jurisdiction, owing to the nature of the class of litigation, owing, perhaps, to an order such as s. 25 of the Civil Procedure Code contemplates, owing perhaps, to the appointment of the Judge not being duly and lawfully made, owing to the cause of action having accrued at a place other than that where the litigation commenced, [122] and owing to other numerous matters, such as the defendant's living in a foreign jurisdiction. In regard to the manner in which I understand the word "jurisdiction," I need only say that I have already given expression to my views in Dhan Singh v. Basant Singh, (1) and that I still adhere to those views.

But the question is whether I, sitting here as a Court of revision, should enter into the various hypotheses and possibilities which may result in one answer or other as to the question of jurisdiction. Mr. Spankie contends that this Court should not exercise, under the circumstances, the discretionary powers it possesses under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code. Apart from the questions of fact which may have a bearing upon the question of jurisdiction, the learned counsel contends that the ordinary remedies which were open to the present petitioner have not been adopted by him, and that, therefore, this Court should not interfere in revision. The learned counsel contends with great force that the order of the 15th June, 1887, now sought to be revised, was such as could have been passed under s. 102, read with s. 647, of the Civil Procedure Code, and that, indeed, the usual remedy open was to apply under s. 103 of the Civil Procedure Code for the restoration of the case and due adjudication thereupon. Further, the learned counsel argues that another remedy was open to the petitioner before asking this Court to revise the order complained of, and that remedy was a regular suit such as s. 283 of the Civil Procedure Code contemplates.

I am of opinion that this contention has force. The principles upon which the visitatorial functions of the Courts of revision, such as in this case, should be exercised were fully considered by Mr. Justice West in the case of Shiva Nathaji v. Joma Kashinath (2), in which, at the end of the judgment, certain conclusions are specifically enumerated. I have always entertained the greatest respect for the rulings of that eminent Judge, and I have more than once stated that this particular judgment was one deserving of the highest respect from the Indian Courts, and I adopted it in Sundar Das v. Mansa Ram (3), in which my brother Brodburst concurred. The general effect of these rulings, as far as this case is concerned, [123] is to lay down general principles that the especial and extraordinary remedy by invoking the revisional powers of this Court should not be exercised unless as a last resource for an aggrieved litigant. In this case the ordinary remedies have not been adopted by the petitioner, and I do not think it is necessary for me, as a court of revision, to go into the detail whether or not such facts exist as to justify the conclusion that the lower Court did not exercise jurisdiction.

Pandit Sundar Lal in an elaborate and able argument has, indeed, contended, as a matter directed to induce me to exercise the revisional powers of this Court, that the simplest course would be for me not only to decide matters of fact which would suggest one decision or other as to jurisdiction, but also to decide, even if there was jurisdiction, whether or not sufficient reasons existed for striking off the case in default. All I need say to this argument is that I do not think that the Legislature intended this Court, as a court of revision, to exercise any such functions. I therefore decline to interfere in revision and dismiss the application with costs.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Straight and Mr. Justice Brodhurst.

CHAJJU (Defendant) v. SHEO SAHAI (Plaintiff)* [29th November, 1887.]

Pre-emption—Rival suits—Each pre-emptor made defendant in the other's suit—Suits, tried together, but decided by separate decrees—Decree allowing pre-emption in one case only on condition of default by other pre-emptor—Finality of decree in superior pre-emptor's suit—Appeal by inferior pre-emptor in his own suit—Appellate Court not competent to alter decree so as to affect superior pre-emptor's right.

In two rival suits for pre-emption each pre-emptor was made a defendant in the other's suit. The suits were tried together upon the same evidence and were disposed of by a single judgment, but by separate decrees. In one of the suits the pre-emptor obtained a decree in the terms of s. 214 of the Civil Procedure Code. In the other, the pre-emptor obtained a decree, subject to the condition that, in the event of the first pre-emptor failing to execute his decree, the second pre-emptor should be entitled to execute it. The decree in the first suit was not appealed, and became final. The second pre-emptor appealed from the decree in his own suit, upon the grounds that the amount ordered to be paid was excessive, and that the first pre-emptor had lost his right, and the decree in the second suit should not have been made subject to the condition above stated.

[124] Held that the appellant, if he desired to get rid of the decision regarding the first pre-emptor's preferential right, should have appealed against the first pre-emptor's decree, but that that decree having become final, the questions between the two pre-emptors could not be reopened on appeal from the second pre-emptor's decree.

MAHMOOD, J.—This is a case in which the question raised seems to be one of sufficient importance to be referred to a Division Bench.

The facts are that three persons, Sikandar, Aladad, and Durjan, executed a sale of their 10 biswansis share in favour of two persons, Sheo Sahai and Harjas, on the 6th June, 1884, for a sum represented in the sale-deed as Rs. 4000. Thereupon Chajju, the present defendant, appellant, instituted a suit to enforce his right of pre-emption on the 3rd June, 1885, and to this suit he impleaded the vendors and the vendees, and subsequently the name of Sheo Sahai, plaintiff, respondent, was also added. This suit was numbered 130 in the register of the first Court.

Similarly Sheo Sahai, plaintiff, respondent, instituted another suit to enforce his right of pre-emption in respect of the same sale, dated the 6th June, 1884, and to that suit he impleaded the vendors and the vendees and the rival pre-emptor, Chajju, plaintiff in the suit No. 130. This suit was instituted two days after the earlier suit, i.e., on the 5th June, 1885, and was numbered 131 in the register of suits.

Both these suits appear to have been tried together and upon the same evidence, and resulted in two decrees of even date, namely, the 1st March, 1886. In the judgment of the first Court it was held that Chajju, plaintiff in the suit No. 130, had a right of pre-emption superior to that of Sheo Sahai, plaintiff in suit No. 131. Therefore the first Court passed a decree enforcing the right of Chajju to the property in suit upon payment of Rs. 4,000 as the consideration money in suit No. 130. In the other suit, No. 131, in which Sheo Sahai was the plaintiff, the first Court decreed his claim, but rendered the decree subject to the condition that, in the event of the plaintiff Chajju in the other case failing to [125] execute his decree, Sheo Sahai was entitled to execute it. Chajju, plaintiff in suit No. 130, did not appeal, nor did Sheo Sahai or any other defendant to that action appeal against the decree in that suit. But Sheo Sahai, plaintiff in the suit No. 131, being dissatisfied with the decree passed in his favour, appealed to the lower appellate Court principally upon the ground that the amount of consideration was excessive, and that the pre-emptor Chajju, plaintiff in the other suit, had lost the right of pre-emption, and as such, did not stand as an impediment to the exercise of his right of pre-emption.

Upon this appeal from the decree in suit No. 131, the learned Judge modified the decree of the first Court by reducing the purchase money to Rs. 701, and holding that Chajju had no right of pre-emption, because he was in collusion with the vendees of the sale of the 6th June, 1884.

In second appeal it is contended by Mr. Sundar Lal that the judgment and the decree of the lower appellate Court is erroneous, because the decree before him was the decree in suit No. 131, and the decree in the suit No. 130, not having been appealed against, became final, and as such binding upon the parties, the rival pre-emptors, namely, Chajju and Sheo Sahai, and that the lower appellate Court in adjudicating upon the decree in suit No. 131 practically set aside the finality of the decree in suit No. 130. Mr. Chaudhri on the other side contends that the effect of the decree of the lower appellate Court must be held to be limited to modifying the decree in suit No. 131, and the fact that the effect of it may be inconsistent with the decree in suit No. 130 does not vitiate the validity of the lower appellate Court's decree in this case.

In the case of Kashi Nath v. Mukta Prasad (1), I have expressed my view as to the array of parties in cases where in respect of one and the same sale rival suits to enforce the right of pre-emption are instituted. But the question raised in this case is one not covered by that ruling, and it is one which I consider sufficiently important to refer to a Division Bench. I therefore, under the proviso to Rule 1 of 11th June, 1877, refer the case accordingly.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the appellant.

[126] Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri, for the respondent.

STRAIGHT and BRODHURST, JJ.—The facts of this case are very fully and clearly stated in the referring order of our brother Mahmood. The only argument addressed to us was based upon the sixth plea taken in the memorandum of appeal, namely, that the decree passed in favour of the defendant-appellant; in suit No. 130 having become final by reason of no appeal being preferred from it, the matters in issue between him and the plaintiff No. 131, respondent before us and defendant in suit 130, had been heard and finally determined, and could not be again tried and determined in the appeal from the decree passed in suit 131. We are upon consideration constrained to hold that this contention is a sound one and must prevail. It is true that the first Court tried the two suits 130 and 131 together, and disposed of them by a single judgment; but separate decrees were prepared, each of which was appealable by the party or parties aggrieved thereby, and, failing such appeal, finally settled the question between the plaintiff on the one side and the defendant on the other. In suit 130 as between the plaintiff Chajju and the defendant Sheo Sahai, the decree determined the issues as to the former's preferential right over the latter, and the amount to be paid and directed the period within which it was to be paid, in accordance with the provisions of s. 214 of the Civil Procedure Code. This decree still stands, and the Rs. 4000 having been paid in by Chajju, the decree-holder, within the specified time, he has now become entitled to possession of the property. It was from this decree that Sheo Sahai, the respondent before us, should have appealed, if he desired to get rid of the decision in regard to the plaintiff Chajju's right to pre-empt, and not having done so, it was not competent for the Judge in the appeal from the decree in suit 131 to re-open the questions between those two persons.

In so far, therefore, as his decision dwelt with those matters and his decree affects Chajju, this appeal must be and it is decreed with costs, and the respondent's appeal to the lower appellate Court quoad Chajju dismissed with costs.

MAMOOD, J.—The facts of the case, as they have been put before me by the learned pleaders of the parties, are the following:—

The present appellant, Musammam Pran Kuar, judgment-debtor, executed a hypothecation bond in favour of Sahu Durga Prasad, the decree-holder-respondent before me, who, having sued upon the bond, obtained a decree on the 7th July, 1881. It is also admitted that the decree was put into execution, and the property hypothecated in the bond, the lien created whereby was given effect to by the decree, has already been brought to sale in execution of the decree.

The present litigation has arisen out of an application made by the decree-holder for the execution of the above-mentioned decree, not against the hypothecated property, but against the other property of the judgment-debtor, the appellant before me, and personally against her. To this application objections were taken by the appellant, in which the main contention urged by her was that neither was she personally liable nor her property other than that hypothecated could be sold in execution. This contention was accepted by the Court of first instance, which disallowed the application, but upon appeal to the lower appellate Court, the learned Judge of that Court reversed the first Court's order in a judgment which runs [128] as follows:—"The prayer for relief distinctly asks that if the hypothecated property be not sufficient, decree may be satisfied from the other property of the debtor. Now decree was given according to the claim. One would suppose that the Munsif had never seen the file. I accept the appeal and cancel the order of the Munsif with costs. Decree can be executed against the other property of the judgment-debtor, but as to her person I say nothing".

From this order this second appeal has been preferred, and Mr. Ratan Chand for the appellant contends that the only point on which he relies in support of the appeal is that the terms of the decree of the 7th July, 1881, cannot bear the interpretation which the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has put upon it. The original decree is framed in the Hindustani language, and I have carefully read its terms. The effect, as I understand, of the original Hindustani may be represented in English in the following terms:—"It is ordered and decreed that Rs. 946-5, the money claimed, and Rs. 97-14-6 costs, making a total of Rs. 1,044-3-6, together with future interest at annas eight per cent. per mensem, be decreed ex parte against the defendant. If the defendant within a period of six months pays up the amount decreed, then the decree will become inoperative; otherwise it will be executed, and the hypothecated property having been brought to sale, the decretal amount will be paid from the proceeds thereof; and it is also ordered that the defendant pay to the plaintiff the sum of Rs. 99-14-6 in respect of costs of this Court to which she has been rendered liable.

Mr. Ratan Chand argues that these terms of the decree are limited to the liability of the hypothecated property, and do not render the judgment-debtor liable personally to any execution that can be taken out under the decree. I am of opinion that this contention is sound, but only to a partial extent. In the case of Raghubar Dayal v. Ilahi Bakhsh (1), Mr. Justice Oldfield and myself had to consider a similar question of the interpretation of a decree, and in that case both of us concurred in holding that a decree that was worded similarly to this so far as the present point is concerned, [129] was limited to the liability of the hypothecated property, though it decreed a personal obligation, so far as order as to costs was concerned. This is a case in which a similar question arises, and I still adhere to the views expressed in that case. These views are in accord with those expressed by Mr. Justice West in the recent case of Sheik Budan v. Ramachandra Bhunjaya (2), and I am not prepared to alter the views which were adopted in the former ruling.

Mr. Kashi Prasad in resisting the appeal argues that the first part of the decree declares the liability for the whole amount to be borne by the hypothecated property, and also personally by the judgment-debtor. For this contention he relies upon a Full Bench ruling of this Court in the case of Debi Charan v. Pirbhudin Ram (3). In regard to that ruling, all I need say for the purposes of this case is that the decree considered there was differently framed, and the ruling is inapplicable to the present case.

The interpretation of the decree, as I understand it, is that it limits the liability for the principal sum of the money claimed to the hypothecated property, but that the order as to costs is an order which could be executed to the extent of such costs against the judgment-debtor. I therefore decree the appeal, and, setting aside the order of the lower appellate Court, direct that the execution of the decree against the judgment-debtor appellant personally be limited to the order as to costs which the decree contains; but as this view of the case was not taken by the Courts below, the proper course for me is to remand the case to the Court of first instance under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code for being dealt with according to law with reference to the observations I have made.

Costs will abide the result.

Lala Juala Prasad, Munshi Hanuman Prasad, and Munshi Sukh Ram, for the appellants.

Munshi Kashi Prasad, for the respondent.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts of this case are very simple. The appellants decree-holders are zamindars of the village in which the land to which this litigation relates is situate, and that land was hypothecated by Musammat Katwari, judgment-debtor respondent, to the appellants on the 24th February, 1876. The money due upon that mortgage not having been paid, a suit was brought thereunder resulting in the claim being decreed on the 24th February, 1882. The decree specifically directs that the land now in question should be sold in enforcement of the lien.

By an application made on the 9th February, 1884, the decree of the 24th February, 1882, was sought to be put into execution by the decree-holders appellants, but such execution was resisted by the judgment-debtor, Musammat Katwari, upon the ground that the land which she held was an occupancy tenure which could not be transferred under s. 9 of the Rent Act, and this plea having been accepted by the lower Courts, the application for execution has been disallowed.

From the order so disallowing the application this second appeal has been preferred, and I am of opinion that it should prevail. There is no question that the land held by the respondent, Musammat Katwari, is an occupancy tenure, such as that contemplated by s. 9, and within the prohibition of that section against transfer. The nature of such tenures with special reference to the question of transferability was fully discussed by me in Gopal Pandey v. Parsotam Das (1), though, I being in the minority, the majority of the Full Bench held that the hypothecation by an occupancy tenant of his right of occupancy was not a transfer within the meaning of s. 9 of the Rent Act of 1873, which Act would govern the hypothecation of the 24th February, 1876, whereon the decree was obtained by the appellants on the 24th February, 1882. From the opinion expressed by the majority of the Full Bench in that case I still dissent with profound respect, the more so because I find it difficult to reconcile the ratio decidendi of that ruling with a more recent Full Bench ruling, Ganga Din v. Dhurandhar Singh (2), in which they held that an usufructuary mortgage was a transfer, and the prohibition of s. 9 of the Rent Act applied to such a case.

But it is not open to me to consider in this case the question as to the validity of the hypothecation of the 24th February, 1876, or the correctness of the decree of the 24th February, 1882, because that decree having been passed, the proceedings which have given rise to this appeal were taken only in execution of the decree, and as such, this Court, as much as the Courts below, is bound to give effect to that decree. Mr. Kashi Prasad, however, contends on behalf of the respondent that the specific provisions of s. 9 of the Rent Act having prohibited transfer of such occupancy holdings, the lower Courts were right in not giving effect to the terms of the decree, and in declining to sell the property by auction in execution of that decree. For this contention the learned pleader relies on Naik Ram Singh v. Murli Dhar (3), where it was held by the Full Bench that the land-holder who had attached an occupancy right of an occupancy tenant in certain land in execution of a decree before Act XII of 1881 came into force was not entitled under s. 2, of that Act to bring such right to sale after that Act came into force, that section not saving the right of the land-holder to bring such right to sale in execution of the decree, and s. 9 of that Act expressly prohibiting the sale of such a right in execution of a decree.

(1) 5 A. 121.

(2) 5 A. 495.

(3) 4 A. 371.

[132] If the Full Bench ruling relied upon were on all fours with this case, I should of course have felt it my duty to have followed it, sitting as a single Judge, but the case is distinguishable from the one before me. In the case before the Full Bench the decree was a simple money decree, so far at least as the property which had been attached in execution thereof and to which that litigation related was concerned. In the present case the decree of the 24th February, 1882, is not a simple money decree. It is a decree which decrees a claim for money, and orders sale by specific enforcement of lien against the land which forms the subject-matter of this dispute. It may be that the decree was erroneously passed, but the Court executing that decree has no power to go behind it and to decline to execute it, because such a refusal to execute the decree amounts to nullifying the decree altogether. This view was expressed by me in the case of Bisheshar Rai v. Sukhdeo Rai (1) where the case was very similar to this, and Oldfield, J., concurred with me in holding that when a decree is passed and specifically directs the sale of a tenure which may or may not be transferable, the Court executing the decree is bound to give effect to [133] it and not to question the validity of the decree. I still adhere to the views which I expressed in that case, and following them am constrained to decree this appeal, and setting aside the orders of both the lower Courts, to remand the case to the Court of first instance for executing the decree of the 24th February, 1882, with reference to the observations which I have made. Courts will abide the result. I wish only

(1) The facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Mahmood, J.

Munshi Sukh Ram, for the appellant.

Lala Juala Prasad, for the respondents.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts of this case, so far as it is necessary to state them, are very simple. Sukhdeo Rai and others executed a hypothecation bond on the 10th September, 1874, in favour of Bisheshar Rai and subsequently sold the hypothecated property to Ramjas Rai, who is the respondent in this second appeal. On the 31st March 1882, Bisheshar Rai obtained a decree on his hypothecation bond not only against the obligor, but also against Ramjas Rai. The decree in clear and specific terms decreed the sale of the mortgaged property in satisfaction of the mortgagee's claim. The present dispute has arisen out of Bisheshar Rai's application to put in force the mandate of the Court of the 31st March 1882. He is met by the objection that the property mortgaged is a non-saleable tenure, its sale being made illegal by s. 9 of Act XII of 1881. There is much doubt whether the tenancy here is one at fixed rates, and as such not subject to the prohibition contained in that section. The Courts below have gone behind the decree, and have arrived at the conclusion that the property mortgaged and ordered to be sold was merely an occupancy tenure, and that its sale was prohibited. Such questions could be dealt with only in the suit but the action of the lower Courts amounts to a proceeding which practically nullifies the decree of 1882. The appellant before us complains of this, and rightly, because where a clear and specific order is made by a decree, it is not competent to a Court in its execution department to take notice of any matter except that which relates to execution. We are not concerned here as to what may be properly ordered as to third parties. As between the parties to the decree, there is nothing in s. 244 (c) which justifies such a procedure as that of declaring a decree to be illegal and refusing to carry into execution. I do not think that the law contemplates such procedure when an application for enforcement of decree is made. I would set aside the orders of the lower Court, and direct the first Court to entertain the decree-holder's application for execution, and dispose of the same according to law. The costs of the present appellant in this and the lower Courts to be costs in the cause.

OLDFIELD, J.—I concur.

having been paid, the plaintiff brought a suit against Deoki Prasad for recovery of the amount due, and attached before judgment ten boxes of the indigo produce of the mauza mentioned in the bond, which were then in the hands of the police at the Dadri police station. The present defendant Bansidhar preferred objections to this attachment, alleging that the indigo had been sold to him by Deoki Prasad. Subsequently, how does not exactly appear, he got possession of the ten boxes, forwarded them to Calcutta, and realized by their sale Rs. 3,894-6-9. On the 7th of January, 1885, the plaintiffs got a decree against Deoki Prasad, but by this time their security had been appropriated by the defendant Bansidhar, as has already been stated. By the present suit the plaintiff seeks to recover the amount of Deoki's debt with interest, namely Rs. 4,900, by way of damages from the defendant for his wrongful conversion of the security created by the bond of the 13th June, 1884. The first Court dismissed the claim, but the Judge in appeal decreed it for Rs. 3,894-6-9, the amount realized by the defendant on the sale of the indigo. The defendant appeals to this Court, and the substantial ground upon which the case has been argued before us is, that as, at the time of the bond of the 13th June, 1884, the indigo of mauza Jarah for 1292 fasli was not in existence, no valid pledge in law could be made, because no tangible thing was in [135] existence that was capable of actual or constructive possession. It was also contended that there was no evidence from which the Judge below could infer that at the time the defendant appropriated the indigo he had notice of any lien thereon in favour of the plaintiff. This latter point had best be disposed of first. As to this the Judge observes: "I am clearly of opinion that Bansidhar knew perfectly well of the lien, and I have but little doubt that the sale to Bansidhar was a collusive arrangement executed with a view to defraud the plaintiff." This conclusion he arrives at from a view of all the circumstances, and this being a second appeal, we are bound by this finding of fact, unless there is absolutely no evidence to support it. The learned counsel for the appellant did not emphasize his contention on this head by reference to the proofs on the record; but we have looked to see what they were, and after doing so we are not prepared to say that there were no circumstances in evidence which warranted the Judge in drawing the conclusion he did. It therefore must be taken as a fact found against the defendant that he appropriated and sold the ten boxes of indigo with notice and knowledge of the plaintiff's claim thereto.

Then arises the main point, the nature of which has already been stated, namely, whether the instrument of the 13th June, 1884, created any valid security in favour of the plaintiff. We think that it did and in support of this view we cannot do better than refer to the remarks of Jessel, M. R., in Collyer v. Isaacs (1). "The creditor had a mortgage security on existing chattels and also the benefit of what was in form an assignment of non-existing chattels which might be afterwards brought on the premises. That assignment in fact constitutes only a contract to give him the after-acquired chattels. A man cannot in equity any more than at law assign what has no existence. A man can contract to assign property which is to come into existence in future, and when it has come into existence, equity treating as done that which ought to be done, fastens upon that property and the contract to assign them becomes a complete arrangement." [136] Now we think, applying the principle thus laid down to the instrument of the 13th June, 1884, that it was a contract to assign something that was to come into existence, namely, the produce of the crop for 1292 fasli of mauza Jarah, which according to the authority of Clements v. Matthews (1) would constitute a sufficiently specific description for the purpose of creating a valid assignment in equity. The evidence establishes that the crop in question was grown and the produce of it realised before the defendant purchased it from Deoki Prasad, and putting aside the question whether it was in fact, prior thereto, handed over to the servant of the plaintiff, of which there undoubtedly is proof upon the record, so as to constitute a clear pledge, there was enough to create an equitable interest in the plaintiff in respect thereof. The equitable title so acquired by the plaintiff would no doubt in the absence of notice of that title not avail him against the defendant (see Joseph v. Lyons (2), Hallas v. Robinson (3); but here the defendant is fixed with notice, and it is found that, despite such notice, he appropriated and sold the produce. The defendant therefore was in our opinion a wrongdoer and the plaintiff had a right to damages, as against him, the measure of which would, under ordinary circumstances, where the fair price has been realized and such as subsist here, be the amount he realized by the sale. A somewhat analogous view was adopted by the Calcutta Court in Misri Lal v. Mozhar Hossain (4), and we may add that in this country, where contracts of the kind disclosed in this case, are very largely entered into with regard to the cultivation of indigo, which industry without them would be seriously hampered from a financial point of view, it is in the highest degree important that effect should be given to the obvious intentions of the parties making them, if it can be, without violence to the law or equity our Courts have to administer. We think the Judge below was right therefore in the view that he took, and we dismiss this appeal with costs (5).

Arbitration—Omission to fix time for delivery of award—Extension of time after expiration of period fixed—Effect of acceptance of award by the Court—Effect of arbitrator first tendering and then withdrawing resignation—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 508, 514, 521.

The provision contained in s. 508 of the Civil Procedure Code, requiring the Court to fix a reasonable time for the delivery of the award is not imperative but directory, and non-compliance with it does not make the order of reference abortive and any subsequent arbitration proceedings ineffectual and bad.

* First Appeal, No. 73 of 1885, from a decree of Maulvi Muhammad Saiyad Khan, Subordinate Judge of Agra, dated the 6th April, 1885.

Under s. 514 of the Code the Court may extend the time for making the award after the time fixed therefor has expired.

The last paragraph of s. 521 does not imply that an omission by the Court to fix a positive date within which the award is to be filed is fatal to the validity of the award.

Where an order extending the time for delivery of an award was made after the time fixed therefor had expired, and did not fix any positive date for the filing of the award,—held that the adoption of the award by the Court amounted to an enlargement of the time for delivery of the award to the date on which it was in fact delivered, and to a ratification of what had been done by the arbitrators, and that the parties, having made no objection to the action of the Court, must be taken to have waived any objection to the award.

The mere circumstance of an arbitrator having first tendered and then withdrawn his resignation does not formally divest him of his character as arbitrator. Maharajah Joymungul Singh Bahadoor v. Mohun Ram Marwaree (1) referred to.

[F—18 M. 22 ; Doubted—2 N. L. R. 81 (84).]

The facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Straight, J.

The Hon T. Conlan, Mr. C. H. Hill, Babu Dwarkanath Banerji, Munshi Hanuman Prasad and Pundit Sundar Lal, for the appellant.

Mr. C. Dillon the Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath and Pandit Moti Lal Nehru, for the respondents.

STRAIGHT, J.—The suit to which this appeal relates was instituted by the plaintiffs-respondents on the 8th February, 1884, in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Agra, for the recovery of certain valuable property of various kinds and for money from [138] the defendant-appellant. On the 16th July, 1884, an agreement to refer all matters in difference in the suit to the arbitration of Lalas Bansidhar and Jagannath Prasad, nominated by the plaintiffs, and Lalas Radhe Prasad and Janki Prasad, nominated by the defendant, with Lala Sukhan Lal as umpire, was filed in Court, and on the 17th of July an order of reference was made by the Subordinate Judge, the 19th August, 1884 being fixed therein for the hearing of the case by this Court, or, in other words, such last-mentioned date was that fixed for the delivery of the award. On the 9th August the time for the delivery of the award was enlarged to the 5th November, and again on the 4th November to the 30th of the same month. On the 5th of December there was an application for further extension, and this was granted until the 5th January, 1885. On the 5th January, the umpire having put in a report, a further extension of time was granted until the 19th January, 1885. Subsequently, the arbitrators having met, an award was made by them on the 23rd March, 1885. That award was filed in Court, and to it certain objections were taken by the defendant upon the 2nd April, 1885. The defendant's pleaders were heard in support of those objections ultimately upon the 6th April. The Subordinate Judge, disallowing them, passed a decree in accordance with that award. From that decree the appeal now before us was preferred to this Court upon the 2nd May, 1885.

There are three grounds of appeal which in substance are, first, that the award was not a valid award; second, that one of the arbitrators having refused to act, either a fresh arbitrator should have been appointed in his place or that the order of reference should have been superseded, and that this not having been done, there was no valid award; third, that Janki Prasad was an unwilling arbitrator and acted against his will, and the arbitration proceedings and award were therefore void.

The appeal came before my brother Tyrrell and myself upon the 29th March, 1886, and in reference to the pleas that had been taken, more particularly the plea which had reference to Janki Prasad, one of the arbitrators, the matter was remitted to the Subordinate Judge for him to take evidence and to report to us whether Janki Prasad had acted judicially and voluntarily in the arbi-[139]tration proceedings. That evidence has been taken and is before us, and in addition thereto we have a report from the Subordinate Judge in regard to that evidence. The appeal now comes before us for disposal in reference to the pleas taken in the memorandum of appeal with the light thrown upon them by the materials supplied us by the Subordinate Judge.

Mr. Conlan and Pandit Sundar Lal, who argued the case on behalf of the defendant-appellant, have substantially put their case upon two grounds. First of all, they say there was no valid award, because on the 5th December, when the third extension of time was granted, the prior period of extension had expired, and next, because in the order of the 5th January no date was fixed as the date by or upon which the award was to be delivered. The second ground upon which the award is assailed is that as Janki Prasad had tendered his resignation as arbitrator, and as it is obvious from the evidence that he did not act willingly and freely in the arbitration proceeding, such proceeding was invalid and the award arising out of it void.

Now as to the first of these objections, that has been argued in reference to the terms of ss. 508 and 514 of the Civil Procedure Code, read in conjunction with the last paragraph in s. 521. It is contended by Mr. Conlan as a primary proposition of his argument, that under s. 508 it is the imperative duty of a Court directing an arbitration by its order of reference to fix a time for the delivery of the award. He says that the word "shall" as used therein is not merely directory but mandatory, and that if a Court directs a reference without fixing a date in the order for the delivery of the award, the order of reference falls through and any arbitration proceedings held under that order are ineffectual and bad. Starting with this proposition, Mr. Conlan then contends that under s. 514, when a time has been fixed by the Court for the delivery of the award, it is only competent for such Court to further enlarge the time on some day within the original period fixed for the delivery of the award, or within any subsequent period to which such original period has been extended. He accordingly argues that the Subordinate Judge in the present case, when he made his order of the 5th December, had no jurisdiction to do so, because the 30th November being the last date covered by the preceding [140] order of extension, his power in the matter has ceased and the authority of the arbitrators to deal with the case had lapsed.

Now there can be no doubt that, looking to the whole scope and purpose of the earlier sections of Chapter XXXVII of the Civil Procedure Code relating to arbitrations held under the sanction of a Court of justice, the Court which makes the order of reference is intended to have complete control in the matter. The words in s. 514 are "the Court may if it thinks fit"; it does not require it to act only upon the application of the parties or of either of them, and it is obvious that the Court may of its own motion grant an enlargement of time. No doubt in s. 508 the words are "shall fix such time," &c., but it seems to me that this amounts to no more than the imposition of a public duty on the presiding officer of a Court of justice, and that as the neglect of it, through mistake or error on his part, could not affect the substantiality of the proceedings of the arbitrators or their award, they may reasonably be regarded as not mandatory but directory only. To hold otherwise would, in my opinion, "involve general inconvenience or injustice to innocent persons without promoting the real aim and object of the enactment" (Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, p. 452). If this is the correct view, then the same construction may be placed on s. 514. In this connection I have directed my attention to certain English rulings which seems to me to some extent to be in pari materia. Now there is a provision to be found in the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854 that has received interpretation in the Courts in England which to my mind has some bearing on the point before us. Those decisions have reference to s. 15 of that Act (17 and 18 Vic., c. 125). The first of those cases is Lord v. Lee (1). There the learned Judges, more particularly Mr. Justice Blackburn, who was the senior presiding Judge, went very fully and clearly into the principles governing arbitration proceedings. There an arbitrator appointed by a private agreement in writing, which contained no limit of time, made his award more than three months after he had entered upon the reference. The submission was then made a rule of Court, and a learned Judge to whom application was made in Chambers enlarged the time. The award was taken up by the successful party and he brought [141] an action upon it. That action was tried before Mellor, J., at the sittings in Middlesex after Trinity term, 1867. It appeared that there being matters in difference between the plaintiff and defendant, an agreement of reference was made and signed on the 8th August, 1866. No time for making the award was mentioned in the submission. The arbitrator entered upon the reference at once. On the 17th January, 1867, he made his award, and gave notice the same day that he had made it. On the 7th February the submission was made a rule of Court; and on the 11th March a Judge's order was obtained directing "that the time for the arbitrator to make his award be enlarged till the 15th March instant." The award was taken up on the 14th March and was in favour of the plaintiff. A verdict was directed for the plaintiff for the amount awarded, with leave to move to enter it for the defendant. A rule was obtained accordingly, on the ground that the time for making the award had not been duly nor legally enlarged by the arbitrator, and the Court or Judge had no power to enlarge the time after the award had been made.

It will be seen that in this case no time was fixed in the agreement of arbitration. But the statute law stepped in to fix the time. By s. 15 of the Common Law Procedure Act it was enacted that "the arbitrator... shall make his award under his hand and (unless such document or order respectively shall contain a different limit of time), within three months after he shall have been appointed and shall have entered upon the reference or shall have been called upon to act by notice in writing from any party; but the parties may by consent in writing enlarge the time for making the award; and it shall be lawful for the superior Court for which such document or order is or may be made a rule of Court or of any Judge thereof for good cause to be stated in the rule or order from time to time to enlarge the term for making the award."

Therefore in that case there was the following state of facts:—That there was no mention in the agreement of any time; that under the terms of the statute the time applicable would be three months after the appointment of the arbitrator and his entering upon the reference, that he did not promulgate his award within three months from that date; that he did promulgate it long after [142] the statutory period; that after such award have been so promulgated, the agreement of the parties was made a rule of Court; and that even after that, the Court thought fit and proper to enlarge the period for making the award. In that case Mr. Justice Blackburn, in a judgment which put the matter most clearly, pointed out the principle which was applicable to such cases, and upon which that statute proceeded, and those remarks seem to me applicable to the statute with which we have to deal here. He says: "I feel no doubt that, under the clause in the section which says that 'it shall be lawful for the Court or Judge for good cause, from time to time, to enlarge the time for making the award,' the Judge may at any time give such further time to the arbitrator to make his award as he shall think fit under the circumstances, so as to make it as if the further time had been originally given in the submission. Thus, if the time originally limited was twelve months, and the Judge give six months more, it is the same as if the time had been from the first eighteen months, and the effect is to make any step taken by the arbitrator within eighteen months valid."

Then he proceeds to go on and discusses what the state of things was with reference to arbitration under the common law, and he says:—"So if an arbitrator omits to enlarge the time limited for making his award, but continues to act as if he had enlarged it, even to making his award, although in fact he has no authority, yet he is a person animo agendi, and if the parties afterwards choose to ratify his act by agreeing that the time shall be enlarged or otherwise, though the act was not enforceable, yet, if ratified, it would be just as binding as if done with the original authority. It was argued for the defendant that such an enlargement of the time amounted only to the making of a fresh submission, but that is not so; the act having been done under the professed authority of the previous submission, the enlargement of the time is a ratification in the shape of a continuation of the original authority."

Then he goes on and refers to s. 15 of the Common Law Procedure Act (17 and 18 Vic., c. 125) and says:—"The Common Law Procedure Act, s. 15, after limiting the time to three months, when the submission is silent as to the limit of time, gives the parties themselves power to enlarge the term; and the effect of this [143] enlargement of the term under the statute would be the same as at common law, that is, it makes it as if the extended time had been originally inserted in the submission. The same construction must be given to the clause giving power to the Court or Judge to enlarge the time, and if an enlargement by consent of parties amounts to a ratification of all that has been done in the interval, inasmuch as it amounts to saying that the submission shall be read as if the extended time had been originally inserted, then the award, which had been made in the interval after the three months had expired, and before the order for enlargement was made, as it purported to be made under the authorities of the parties, would be valid; if the authority were subsequently ratified by the parties by enlargement. The same power is given to the Judge, in his discretion, from time to time to enlarge the term, notwithstanding the parties do not consent, and it must have the same effect as an enlargement by consent, namely, amount to a ratification. The evils of an opposite construction are obvious. Suppose the arbitrator inadvertently to have neglected to enlarge the time, and several meetings to have been held in the interval before the omission is discovered: if the subsequent enlargement of the time had only the effect of a new submission, all the witnesses must be recalled, and all the expense must be incurred again. It happens in the present case that the award was made before the oversight was discovered and the order obtained. Surely it is a very salutary enactment which enables a Judge to cure a defect which he thinks a mere defect of form, and which the parties might have cured themselves. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that the section gives power to the Judge to enlarge the term for making the award at any time, and under any circumstances, in which he thinks there is good cause for his intervention, (of course he would not grant an order if he saw that injustice might be done thereby), and the effect of the enlargement is the same as if it had been by the parties; it amounts to a ratification, and is as if the enlarged time had been originally in the submission."

It seems to me that the case, which is supported by another to which I need only give reference namely, May v. Harcourt (1) goes to show that there is nothing unreasonable in the view that we [144] are prepared to take, that the provisions of s. 514 do allow of the Court, at any period of its own motion or on the application of the parties, granting an enlargement, as was done in the present case by the order of the 5th December, 1884.

Then arises the further question as to whether the terms of the order of the 5th January, by which no positive date was fixed within which the award was to be filed, are fatal to the validity of the award. I do not think they are. I think that the same principle of interpretation which I have stated as applicable to s. 508 and the word "shall" therein is applicable, and that the neglect or omission of the Court cannot prejudice the proceedings before the arbitrators or their award. If this be so, then there would be no time appointed within which the award could be filed, which would bring into operation the provision contained in the last paragraph of s. 521. At any rate, whatever defects there may have been in the order of the Subordinate Judge of the 5th January, 1885, they were in my opinion defects that could be cured, and I hold that the adoption by the Subordinate Judge of the award must be taken to amount to an enlargement of the time for the delivery of the award to the date on which it was in fact delivered and to ratification of what had been done by the arbitrators. Moreover, no objection was taken by either of the parties to his acceptance of the award on the ground now urged, and it seems to me not unreasonable to assume that any such objection was waived by them.

The second question which was argued by Mr. Sundar Lal relates exclusively and entirely to the arbitrator Janki Prasad having refused to act, that the Court should have appointed either a new arbitrator in his place or have superseded the arbitration, and further that after his refusal to act he was incompetent to act any further in the matter. Now I have very carefully read through all the evidence that has been taken by the Subordinate Judge upon this particular point. I do not see the slightest ground for supposing that Janki Prasad did not take a complete and full part in all the proceedings of the arbitrators held in respect of the differences between the parties to the suit. It is to be noted that all the other three arbitrators have been called and examined, and I may more particularly [145] notice that Radhe Lal, the first of the two arbitrators nominated by the defendant-appellant before us, deposes in most explicit terms to Janki Prasad's having taken part in the arbitration proceedings, to his having been present at every meeting and to his having taken an intelligent share in the proceedings. Then there is the statement of Sukhan Lal, the umpire, to the effect that he and Janki Prasad examined the account-books together, Janki Prasad, as a mahajan having been selected as an arbitrator more particularly for this part of the work. I have also read very carefully through the various representations that were made to the Court and the umpire for the purpose of obtaining adjournment, and I find nothing to satisfy me that any arbitration meeting was held without the presence of Janki Prasad. It is said by Mr. Sundar Lal that looking to the terms of the order of the Subordinate Judge which was passed upon the 24th January, 1885, Janki Prasad was frightened into coming and attending the arbitration proceedings, and no doubt there are indications that the Subordinate Judge thought that Janki Prasad's excuses for absenting himself were not bona fide, and though he had no power to compel him to serve, it seems to me he was at least erring on the right side in endeavouring to get him to join his colleagues and hold the arbitration. At any rate it is clear that after Janki Prasad sent in his resignation he did meet Sukhan Lal, the umpire, and the three other arbitrators, and had a conversation with them, the result of which was that he reconsidered his determination and withdrew his resignation. In this connection I may refer to the authority of their Lordships of the Privy Council, which lays down in very explicit terms that the mere circumstance that an arbitrator had first tendered and then withdrawn his resignation, did not formally divest him of his character of arbitrator: Maharajah Joymungul Singh Bahadoor v. Mohun Ram Marwaree (1).

In the Court below when the objection that I am now dealing with was taken for the first time, it was not suggested that there had been misconduct on the part of this man Janki Prasad. What was suggested was that he was an unwilling participator in the arbitration proceeding. It is not my business now to determine whether upon the story he tells, if true, he was guilty of such [146] misconduct as would have warranted the Court below in setting aside the award, for I do not believe it, and I prefer the statements of the three arbitrators and the umpire, who very plainly gave an account of all that transpired in the cause of the arbitration proceedings, and certainly leave the impression on my mind that Janki Prasad took a conscious, intelligent, and voluntary part in the proceedings. This disposes of the second objection. I therefore am of opinion that the award was a good award and that we have no right to interfere with the decree which was passed in accordance with that award. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

under each of the ss. 379 or 380 and 454 of the Penal Code for house-breaking in order to the commission of theft and theft, the two offences forming part of the same transaction and being tried together. In such a case, where the prisoner had been three times previously convicted,—held that the better course would have been to commit him to the Court of Session under ss. 454-75 of the Code.

But a Sessions Judge trying such a case under s. 379 or s. 380 and s. 454 would under no circumstances be justified in passing a sentence of ten years' imprisonment under the latter part of s. 454 and of four years' imprisonment under s. 380. The latter portions of ss. 454 and 457 were framed to include the cases of house-trespassers and house-breakers who had not only intended to commit but had actually committed theft.

Queen-Empress v. Ajudhia (1) and Queen-Empress v. Sakharam Bhan (2), referred to.

A Magistrate is not justified in referring under s. 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code orders passed by the Sessions Judge on appeal, except in very special cases. Queen-Empress v. Shere Singh (3), referred to.

[147] THIS was a reference under s. 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code, made under the following circumstances. The Joint Magistrate of Etawah in a case that was before him for hearing, charged one Zor Singh, first, with having on or about the 17th September, 1887, committed house-breaking in order to the commission of theft in the shop of Lala Ram Bania, and with having thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 454 of the Indian Penal Code; and secondly, with having, on or about the 17th September, 1887, committed theft of one anna's worth of cowries in the house of the said Lala Ram Bania, and with having thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 380 of the Indian Penal Code. Zor Singh pleaded guilty to having entered Lala Ram's shop by climbing over the tatti fastened against the door-way, and to having stolen thence the cowries. The Joint Magistrate observed that the accused "has been three times previously convicted and sentenced to seven days' imprisonment, twenty stripes, and two years' imprisonment. I do not think, however, there is any necessity of committing him for trial by the Court of Session, as I have charged him under ss. 454 and 380, Indian Penal Code, two distinct offences having been committed, and separate sentences being legal, [vide Queen-Empress v. Sakharam Bhan (2)]. I deal with the case therefore according to the provisions of s. 35, Criminal Procedure Code. Prisoner's last conviction was under s. 454, Penal Code. I convict him of an offence under s. 454, Penal Code, and sentence him to two years' rigorous imprisonment and thirty stripes; and I convict him of an offence under s. 380, and sentence him to two years' rigorous imprisonment, to include three months' solitary confinement. The second sentence to follow the first." The prisoner preferred an appeal to the Court of Session, and the Sessions Judge, in disposing of it, observed: "It is true, as remarked by the Joint Magistrate, that the Bombay High Court has held separate convictions in such a case to be legal. But in a similar case the Allahabad High Court set aside the sentence under s. 380; Queen-Empress v. Ajudhia (1). I prefer to follow the ruling of our own High Court, and set aside the conviction and sentence under s. 380. The accused pleaded guilty to the first charge, and no ground is shown for interference with the conviction under s. 454. Although the [148] value of the property stolen was trifling, the

- appellant had been three times previously convicted, and the sentence is not too severe.”
- The Magistrate of Etawah submitted a letter to the Registrar of the Court, in which he stated the facts above referred to, expressed the opinion that the sentence, as modified by the Judge, was inadequate, and suggested that as the sentences passed by the Joint Magistrate were in accordance with the ruling of a Bench of the Bombay High Court under the Criminal Procedure Code, Act X of 1882, now in force, they should be restored.
- BRODHURST, J. (after stating the facts, continued).—The judgment reported in I. L. R. 2 All. 644 was delivered by my brother Straight on the 19th January, 1880, when Act X of 1872 was the Code of Criminal Procedure. He did not rule that a conviction and sentence under each of the sections 380 and 457 of the Indian Penal Code for offences arising out of the same transaction was absolutely illegal, but he held that “in the interests of simplicity and convenience it is best to concentrate the conviction and sentence on the graver offence proved.” I notice that a similar view was taken by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in their judgment in the case of the Queen v. Ramcharan Kairi (1). The head-note is as follows:—“The prisoner was convicted by the Magistrate of two separate offences under ss. 456 and 380 of the Penal Code and sentenced for both. On appeal the Sessions Judge, holding that the offence proved was under s. 457, ordered a new trial for offences under ss. 457 and 380. Held that there ought not to be a new trial, but that the conviction and sentence under s. 380 should be set aside.” And Peacock, C.J., in a judgment concurred in by the other learned Judges, observed: “The Magistrate should be cautioned to be more careful in future, and not to split up one single aggravated offence into separate offences.” The judgments above referred to of the Bench of the Bombay High Court were delivered by Birdwood and Jardine, JJ., on the 25th February, 1887, that is, since the present Criminal Procedure Code, Act X of 1882, has been in force, and certain alterations have been made in the Code as pointed out by the above-mentioned learned Judges. Illustration 6 to paragraph I of s. 235 shows that [149] if “A commits house-breaking by day, with intent to commit adultery with B’s wife, A may be separately charged with and convicted of offences under ss. 454 and 497 of the Indian Penal Code.” It admits I think of no doubt that the Joint Magistrate might, with reference to the provisions of ss. 35 and 235 of the Criminal Procedure Code, have tried and convicted Zor Singh for house-breaking in order to commit theft and for theft, and might have sentenced him under the first part of s. 454 of the Penal Code to two years’ rigorous imprisonment for house-breaking and under s. 379 of the same Code to two years’ rigorous imprisonment for theft. Moreover I am of opinion that the sentences as passed were not illegal, but the best course to have adopted would, in my opinion, have been that which is usual in such cases, viz., to have committed the accused for trial to the Court of Session, under ss. 454-75 of the Indian Penal Code. Although I consider that a Magistrate might legally pass a separate sentence of two years’ rigorous imprisonment and fine under each of the sections 379 or 380 and 454 of the Penal Code, I nevertheless think that, were a Sessions Judge trying such a case under the same sections, he would, under no circumstances, be justified in passing a sentence of ten years’ imprisonment under the latter part of s. 454 for house-breaking with intent to commit theft, and, with reference to the provisions in s. 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code, of four years' imprisonment under s. 380 for theft in a building, for it appears to me obvious that this could not have been the intention of the Legislature. The offences punishable under ss. 454 and 457 of the Penal Code are, with the exception that the former is committed by day and the latter by night, precisely the same. The latter part of each section enacts that, if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of imprisonment may be extended from three and five years to ten and fourteen years respectively. An intent to commit theft would not be punishable until after lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking, had been committed. It is evident that the Legislature never meant that a house-trespasser or house-breaker should be liable to seven and nine years' additional imprisonment, merely because he intended to commit theft. The latter portion of each of those sections was obviously framed to include the cases of house-trespassers and house-breakers who [150] had not only intended to commit theft but had actually committed that offence. To sentence a house-trespasser or house-breaker to the enhanced punishment of ten years' imprisonment under the latter part of s. 454 because he intended to commit theft, and to sentence him also under s. 380 to four years' imprisonment or any other punishment for theft in a building, would virtually be to punish him twice for the same offence and would be grossly unjust. Had the Joint Magistrate in the exercise of a wise discretion adopted the course I have above mentioned, that is, had committed Zor Sing under ss. 454-75 of the Penal Code to the Court of Session, there would have been no ground whatever for this reference. I think for the reasons recorded by my brother Straight in Queen-Empress v. Shere Singh (1) that references such as this by a Magistrate against the order passed in appeal by his superior officer, the Sessions Judge, are generally inconvenient and undesirable, and are only justifiable in very special cases; and having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I do not think that any interference in revision is necessary in the present instance.

STRAIGHT, J.—I entirely concur in the view of my brother Brodhurst that this is not a case in which we should interfere. Let the Magistrate be so informed.

sacred by any class of persons), and were each sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 25. It appeared that each of the [151] accused had, on the day of Id, the 30th August, 1887, killed a cow in a place within a few yards of a public road, exposed to public view. The Magistrate found that there were two slaughter-houses in the town of Tilhar where the cows were killed, that it was customary for sacrifices of cows to be made inside the premises of Muhammadans, that the road near which the prisoners had killed cows was frequented by Hindus, who on "seeing a cow being killed or dead by the side of the road must be much disgusted and distressed," but that cows had on previous occasions been sacrificed in the same place without the Hindus making any complaint. The prisoners applied for revision of the Magistrate's order to the Sessions Judge of Shahjahanpur, who referred the case to the High Court under s. 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code, by the following order:—

"The applicants, Amiruddin and Imam Ali are Muhammadans resident in the town of Tilhar. On the day of Id, according to their religious customs, they sacrificed a cow within four or five yards of a public road. They have been convicted under s. 295 of the Penal Code, of having, I presume, 'destroyed an object' (to wit, a cow) 'held sacred' by the Hindus resident at Tilhar.

"Apart from the doubt I hold that the conviction can be sustained under this section, I think it is bad for the following reasons:—

"1. The lower Court admits that there is strong reason to believe that cows have been sacrificed before in this very spot, and without the Hindus preferring any complaint, 'despairing of obtaining any redress.' The practice has therefore the sanction of previous custom or use.

"2. There are no Hindus dwelling immediately proximate to the place where the cow was sacrificed. The surrounding dwellings are those of Muhammadans, and though a Hindu might have had his feelings outraged or his religious prejudices hurt had he passed that way, there is no reason to believe that such was the case.

"3. It is not established that the applicant ever meant to outrage any such feelings or prejudices. It is just possible, in the strained relations that now exist between Hindus and [152] Muhammadans, that he stretched his privilege or custom to its extreme limit; but I cannot think that in sacrificing where previous sacrifices had taken place, he violated any rule of law that would subject him to a criminal prosecution.

"The executive have been given most ample powers, especially in municipal towns like Tilhar, to make rules and regulations for matters like the present. It is to be regretted that certain places were not marked out and proclaimed as fit places for such sacrifices; but I cannot think that under the present circumstances the applicant is shown to have infringed any rule, law, or regulation whatever.

"The doubt of applicant's guilt that the Magistrate held should have gone rather to prompt an acquittal than to reduce the sentence. The record will be submitted to the High Court for orders that to it may seem fit."

The reference came before Straight and Brodhurst, JJ., who directed that it should be laid before a Full Bench.

The Government Pleader (Munshi Ram Prasad), for the Crown.

The prisoners were not represented.

EDGE, C.J.—Two men, Imam ali and Amiruddin, were convicted by the Magistrate of Shahjahanpur under s. 295, Indian Penal Code, for having on the 30th August, 1887, at Tilhar municipality on the side of Muazampur street, destroyed each a cow by the side of a public highway. The Magistrate found that they knew very well that the killing of the cow was considered an insult by their Hindu fellow-subjects, and he fined them Rs. 25 each. The case has come up to us in revision, and the sole question to consider is whether a cow is an "object" within the meaning of s. 295, Indian Penal Code. The earlier words of that section are as follows:—

"Whoever destroys, damages, or defiles any place of worship, or any object held sacred by any class of persons."

If I were to apply the usual principle of construction to this section, I should come to the conclusion that it was intended that the "object" should be one ejusdem generis with a "place of worship," that is, some inanimate object, such as an idol, &c. In my opinion the intention of the Legislature in passing this section was to [153] use the term "object" in that sense, and the Legislature did not intend that the term should apply to animate objects such as cows. If it had been intended that the term "object" here should not be construed as relating to something ejusdem generis with the place of worship, but should have a wider meaning, I should have expected to find in the definition clause the word "object" defined. But there is no such definition. The words 'animal,' 'man,' 'woman,' and 'person' are there defined. It is admitted by the Government Pleader, who appears in support of this application, that the killing of a cow under any circumstances, of course except by accident, would be considered an insult by a strict Hindu. If that be so, any butcher who knew that fact and killed a cow, even in his private slaughter house, or for the matter of that in a public slaughter house, would be guilty of the offence contemplated by s. 295 of the Penal Code.

I, therefore, come to the conclusion that s. 295 of the Penal Code does not apply to this case, and consequently that this conviction must be set aside, and the fines, if realized, be refunded.

STRAIGHT, J.—I entirely concur that a cow is not an object within the meaning of s. 295 of the Indian Penal Code. It seems to me that the words in connection with which it is used, namely, destroys, damages or defiles, preclude the notion that a cow does come within the definition. I think, therefore, that these convictions should be set aside, and the fines, if realized, should be returned.

BRODHURST, J.—In my opinion the killing of a cow as a sacrifice or otherwise is not an offence punishable under s. 295 of the Indian Penal Code.

The words "destroys" and "object," as used in that section, could not, I consider, have been intended by the Legislature to have, under any circumstances, included the killing of a cow. Had it been intended that the killing or maiming or injuring of things animate, such as a cow or a monkey or a peacock or a jay, should have been included as offences punishable under s. 295, language more appropriate than "destroys, damages or defiles" "any object" would have been brought into use; and such words as "or kills, maims or otherwise injures any animal," would have been inserted [154] between the words "any object" and the words "held sacred by any class of persons."

The whole construction of the section as it stands shows, I think, that it refers only to inanimate objects, such as churches, mosques, temples and marble or stone figures representing gods.

Under this view of the law, I would set aside the convictions of Imam Ali and Amiruddin and direct that the fines, if realized, be refunded.

TYRELL, J.—I concur with the learned Chief Justice.

MAHMOOD, J.—I concur so entirely in the exposition of the law to which the learned Chief Justice and my learned brethren have given expression that I consider it unnecessary to say much upon that aspect of the case. The section (295 of the Penal Code) which we are called upon to consider occurs in a penal enactment; and according to the well-recognised rules of interpretation of the language of statutes, words importing a doubtful or ambiguous meaning must be construed strictly and in favour of the subject that is to say, that, unless the meaning of the Legislature is perfectly clear, no penalties are to be imposed upon the subjects of the Crown nor are their liberties to be restricted. This canon of construction has been uniformly applied to the interpretation of a vast multiplicity of statutes in England and also in India, and I do not think any doubts have been thrown upon it. There is also another well-recognised rule of construing statutes to which the learned Chief Justice has already referred, namely, that the operation of words of a general signification is restrained "when they follow closely upon words of a limited meaning, upon words which refer to a particular class of thing or persons, or which necessarily excludes such matters as are of higher dignity. In all these cases general words are confined to things and persons ejusdem generis with those enumerated or of inferior quality" (Wilberforce, p. 179). Now in this case the words "any object" occur in such close proximity to the phrase "any place of worship," which phrase again follows upon the words "destroys damages or defiles," that, as the learned Chief Justice has pointed out, we cannot extend the meaning of the word "object" to animals, and that we must interpret it by the rule of ejusdem generis. This conclusion is further supported by [155] another rule of interpreting statutes, namely, that when words importing a popular meaning are employed in a statute, they ought to be construed in such a sense, unless the Legislature has defined such words in any other sense. Now the word 'object' no doubt has a technical and extensive meaning in philosophy and would include not only an animal but also a human being, and indeed if we go further, the word would in philosophy include also abstract concepts. But such is not the manner in which the popular mind understands the words, nor can we attach any such meaning to the word in interpreting a penal enactment such as s. 295 of the Indian Penal Code. The Code devotes a whole chapter (II) to the explanation of certain general expressions which it employs, and considering that it defines the word "animal" (s. 47) as also the words "man" and "woman" (s. 10), it seems to me that if the word "object" as it occurs in s. 295 of that Code were to be interpreted by us to include a cow or any other animal, there would be no logical reason why we should not include a human being within the meaning of that word. I have no doubt therefore that the words "any object held sacred by any class of persons" must be understood to be limited to inanimate objects.

But there is another aspect of this case in respect of which I wish to give expression to my views consistently with the rule of judicial etiquette which requires that Judges should abstain from taking part in matters of a purely political character. Facts similar to those out of which this prosecution has arisen are not of unfrequent occurrence, and sometimes cause breach of the peace, of which I as one of Her Majesty's Judges feel myself entitled to take notice. As my brother Brodhurst has pointed out, the bovine species is not the only class of animals held sacred by the Hindu population of India, and indeed I may add that even trees, such as the pipal, are included among the objects of worship or veneration by that section of the community—a state of things which only shows how serious, in connection with such matters, is the task of those who as Judges are bound to administer justice in conformity with the laws of the land.

I think it is not beyond my province as a Judge of this Court to take judicial notice of the religious history of the Hindus as [156] also of the Muhammadan ecclesiastical law in so far as they bear upon the facts of this case. So far as I am aware, it appears to me that in the ancient times of the Hindu history just as aswamedha, or the sacrifice of a horse, was allowed as a symbol of imperial domination, so upon other occasions of ritual ceremonies gaumedha, or cow sacrifice, was permitted and almost enjoined by the ancient sages of the Hindu religion. No doubt, with the progress of time, the advance of civilization and the development of utilitarian ideas among the people, both these sacrifices fell into disuse, and the cow as the furnisher of milk and the mother of the bovine species (so universally employed in this country for purposes of agriculture) rose from being an object of utility to the footing of sanctity. The law, however, in dealing with such matters is not concerned with facts as they were in ancient times, but with living facts of modern times, and we as Judges cannot ignore the fact that among the Hindus of the present day the cow is regarded as perhaps the most sacred animal, though this circumstance would not, for the reasons which I have already mentioned, affect the interpretation of the word "object" as it occurs in s. 295 of the Indian Penal Code. I also know that under the Muhammadan ecclesiastical law, on the Id-ul-Zuha (or Id-e-kurban), as the anniversary of the great pilgrimage of Mecca, the sacrifice of a camel, a buffalo, a cow, a sheep, or any other quadruped whose meat is lawful food to the Muslim is enjoined. I am equally aware of the fact that so far as the poorer sections of the Muhammadan population are concerned, the only chance which they practically have of eating meat is to rely upon the cheapness of beef in comparison to mutton or meat of any other kind. It may or may not be so that until somewhat recent times the Hindus and the Muhammadans living as close neighbours were accustomed to be considerate to each other, and respecting each other's feelings, did not recklessly hurt the religious prejudices of each other in such matters. But from the number of cases which come up to this Court in the exercise of its criminal jurisdiction as the highest tribunal in the land, I cannot but conclude that with the change of the times a most unsatisfactory and reprehensible state of things has come into existence which it is the duty of those entrusted with the administration of justice, in the impartial and even-handed form which the law of [157] British India enjoins, to recognise and deal with. Speaking for myself I have had before now considerable difficulty in deciding how Courts of justice are to deal with such matters, how the law stands with reference to cases in which in the most offensive manner the slaughter of a cow is accomplished by a Muhammadan before the eyes of a Hindu fellow-subject, or cases in which a Hindu procession is carried with offensive demonstrations in front of a Muhammadan mosque. Similar difficulty I have felt in connection with the hearings of the law in cases where the Hindu procession of the Ram Lila takes place on the same occasion as the Muhammadan procession of the Moharram. The one is a day of rejoicing with the Hindus as the anniversary of the greatest victory in their history; the other is the anniversary of what has been called "the darkest day of Islam," and as such the occasion of deepest mourning. It may be that on such occasions (as I am afraid is often the case) events may occur which would constitute the corpus delicti of one or other of the various offences relating to religion dealt with in Chapter XV of the Indian Penal Code, and indeed it may be that those events require the application of even severer sections of that Code. There can scarcely be any doubt that the difficulties with which Courts of justice have to deal in such matters arise from the fact that Her Majesty's subjects in India having long been accustomed before the advent of the British rule to oppressive methods, cannot easily accommodate themselves to the new state of things ushered into existence by the British Government, under which religious toleration and individual liberty of the citizen is recognized to an extent which, according to some deep thinkers, was too much in advance of the stage of civilization which the country had attained. Quite recently in Crim. Rev. No. 629 of 1887 (1) I had to deal with a somewhat similar matter. There the dispute was not between Hindus and Muhammadans, but between two sections of the Hindu community, that is, between the Vaishnavas and the Saraogis in connection with a religious procession of the latter to which the former objected. Similarly quarrels arise between the two sections of the Muhammadan community—the Sunnis and the Shiahs—in connection with the uttering of certain words which are most offensive to the religious feelings [158] of the Sunni Muhammadans, and which words might in some circumstances fall under the purview of s. 298 of the Indian Penal Code. I have no doubt that the Legislature in framing Chapter XV of the Indian Penal Code has made a great advance in the direction of the religious toleration which civilized methods of thoughts enjoin, and if difficulties arise in connection with such matters, they are due not to any defect of the law but to the inconsiderate and reckless behaviour of the various sections of a population which does not fully appreciate the blessings of religious toleration and individual liberty which the British rule by framing wise laws has accorded to the people of this country.

Having regard to the facts of this case as they appear from the judgment of the Magistrate and of the learned Sessions Judge, I cannot help feeling that it was imprudent and inconsiderate on the part of the accused to have slaughtered cows on the roadside and in a locality which would be visible to any Hindu passer-by, and I think I may say as a Muhammadan myself that it is difficult for me to conceive that the gentlemanly feelings of any person belonging to the better classes of the community which professes Islamism would, even on the festival of the Id-ul-zuha, permit the sacrifice of a cow in violation of considerations suggested by the religious feelings and prejudices of his Hindu fellow-subjects and neighbours with whom the Mussalmans have for centuries associated on friendly terms as neighbours and fellow-subjects. It is, however, not necessary for me to go further into the particular facts of this case, because, as the learned Chief Justice has pointed out, the question is a pure question of law, and in this view I am bound to hold that s. 295 of the Indian Penal Code does not cover the case, and that the convictions were therefore wrong in law. I may, however, add that the circumstances of the case require that such matters should be dealt with by municipal regulations for which ample provision is made by our law, and that the learned Government Pleader, Munshi Ram Prasad, who appeared on behalf of the Crown to support the convictions, has been unable to show me any section of the Indian Penal Code under which the facts proved in this case would constitute a criminal offence within the meaning of that Code (s. 40). But when I say this I wish to guard myself [159] against being understood to lay down any general rule as to whether acts done by Hindus or Muhammadans offensive to each other's religious feelings would not in certain circumstances constitute an offence under the Code.

I agree in the order proposed by the learned Chief Justice (1).

The trees upon an occupancy holding, whether planted by the tenant himself or not, belong and attach to such holding, and, like it, are not susceptible of transfer by the tenant.

THE first three defendants in this case, Rupram, Jairam and Netram, were occupancy tenants of the plaintiffs, in respect of a plot of land No. 215, upon which there grew a number of mango and other trees. By deed of sale, dated the 20th March, 1884, they sold the trees only to the defendant Bhagirath, who subsequently sued for possession thereof, and, on the 19th May, 1885, obtained a decree on confession of judgment in execution of which he dispossessed them from the whole of the occupancy holding. The plaintiffs-zemindars brought the present suit on the 27th May, 1885, in which they prayed for cancelment of the deed of sale of the 20th March, 1884, and for ejectment of the defendant-vendee.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Kasganj) decreed the claim. On appeal by the defendant-vendee, the Subordinate Judge of Aligarh reversed the Munsif's decree and dismissed the suit. In the course of his judgment he observed:—"The next point is whether the vendors could sell the trees. The evidence satisfactorily [160] proves that the trees belonged to them. The vendors and their ancestors had planted the trees and had always enjoyed their fruits and wood. As the trees were their property, they could sell them to the appellant. Under the rulings of the High Court in Sadar Singh v. Madara (2) and Debi Prasad v. Har Dayal (3) the plaintiffs-zemindars are not entitled under the circumstances of this case to dispossess the defendant from the land or the trees. I hold that the appellant is entitled to remain in possession of the trees and the land under them, so long as he pays the zemindars the rent formerly paid by his vendors."

(1) The only other reported case in which it was necessary to consider the effect of s. 295 of the Penal Code is Hakim v. Empress (Panjab Record, 1884, No. 27) in which it was held by Plowden and Burney, JJ., "that the word 'object' as used in s. 295 of the Penal Code is not limited to inanimate objects, but is wide enough to include animate objects which are held sacred, as well as idols, relics, or the like."

The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

The Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath and Pandit Sundar Lal for the appellants.

Munshi Ram Prasad and Lala Durga Charan, for the respondent.

STRAIGHT and TYRRELL, JJ.—For the purpose of determining this appeal it must be taken to have been found as a fact that the first set of defendants are occupancy tenants of the land on which the trees stand, that such trees were planted by themselves or their ancestors, that only the trees were sold to the second defendant by the sale-deed of the 20th March, 1884, and that by the decree of the 19th May, 1885, obtained by him on confession of judgment against the first set of defendants, he has dispossessed them from their cultivatory holding. Now it has been ruled by this Court in Jagrani Bibi v. Gineshi (1) that a suit for possession of trees is a suit for possession of land within s. 29 of Act IX of 1871, and this principle has been more or less recognised in the Full Bench ruling that standing timber is immoveable property—Umed Ram v. Daulat Ram (2)—by Mahmood, J., in Deoki Nandan v. Dhian Singh (3), and by another Full Bench in Jugal v. Deoki Nandan (4). It was also held by Pearson and Oldfield, JJ., in Ajudhia Nath v. Sital (5), followed by Straight and Tyrrell, JJ., in Ram Narain v. Madho (6) that an occupancy tenant can only make a valid hypothecation of the trees held by him for the term of his tenancy. [161] With his ejectment from the land and the determination of his tenancy such an hypothecation ceases to be enforceable. Again in Jhagaru v. Shamsheer Khan (7) it was held that a tenant who, while cultivating land, had planted trees thereon was not entitled, after he had ceased to cultivate it, to sue for possession of the trees; and in Ram Baran Ram v. Salig Ram Sing (8) the same principle was recognised. Nor is there anything inconsistent with this view in a decision of this Bench as constituted in Khasim Mian v. Banda Husain (9). We think, upon a review of all these authorities, that the trees on an occupancy holding, even whether planted by the tenant himself or not, belong and attach to such occupancy holding, and like it are not susceptible of transfer by the occupancy holder: indeed this is what we take it to have been laid down by the Full Bench in Jugal v. Deoki Nandan (4). To recognise such a sale as that which is the subject of the present suit would be to sanction a transfer by an occupancy tenant who on the facts stated here has in fact been ousted. We do not lose sight of the fact that by local custom having the force of law an occupancy tenant may have a saleable interest in the timber, fruit, and loppings of trees planted by him, but no such custom is pleaded or proved in the present case, and the fact remains that the first set of defendants have sold something to the defendant No. 2, which, as a part of their occupancy holding, they are by law forbidden from transferring. We think therefore that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the sale-deed of the 20th March, 1884, avoided, to eject the defendant No. 2 from their land, and to have their proprietary possession of it restored. We accordingly decree the appeal with costs, and, reversing the decree of the Subordinate Judge, we direct that a decree be prepared declaring the above reliefs in favour of the plaintiffs with costs against all the defendants.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[162] Before Sir John Edge, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Brodhurst.

LACHMAN PRASAD (Defendant) v. JAMNA PRASAD AND OTHERS
(Plaintiffs).* [4th November, 1887.]Practice—Remand—Power of appellate Court to deal with whole appeal after return of findings—Customary easement—Privacy. 10 A. 162 = 7 A.W.N. (1887) 295.

In a second appeal by the defendant, in which the plaintiff filed objections to the decree under s. 561 of the Civil Procedure Code, the High Court, without giving judgment on the appeal, stated (giving reasons) the opinion that the appellant would be entitled to succeed, and at the same time remitted an issue under s. 566 of the Code with reference to the plaintiff's objections. At that time the appeal was apparently not argued out, and the true meaning of the facts as found was obviously not present to the mind of the Court.

Held that upon the return of the findings on remand, the Court could not treat the appeal as already decided and the objections the sole matter for consideration, but must consider both appeal and objections and decide the whole case.

Held, however, that where Judges have heard arguments on some of the issues and have expressed their views thereon and have remitted another issue or issues under s. 566, they are not bound, on the return of findings, to hear the case de novo but may confine counsel to argument upon the findings.

Case in which it was found that the plaintiff was by local custom entitled to an easement of privacy, and in which the Court granted a mandatory order compelling the defendant to permanently close the door or window complained of.

THE plaintiffs and the defendant in this case were the owners of adjoining houses in mohulla Nawabganj in the city of Cawnpore. The suit was brought for the removal of a door or window opened by the defendant in his western wall contiguous to the plaintiffs' house and alleged to invade their privacy; of a drain constructed by the defendant upon the same side of his house, the water from which flowed or dropped upon the plaintiffs' property; a chaja or cornice in the same wall, and another chaja on the northern wall with a spout from which water fell upon a public thoroughfare used by the plaintiffs. The plea of the defendant was, in substance, that the drains and cornices complained of had existed for a long time; that no special damage to the plaintiffs from the drain on the north wall had been shown, and that the door or window on the western wall occupied a place where an aperture had for a long time existed without any complaint being made.

[163] The Court of first instance (Munsif of Cawnpore) decreed the claim, except in regard to the door or window and the drain on the northern side. Upon the issue as to the door, the Court observed:—"This point is very clear. It has been repeatedly held by the honorable High Court that a suit cannot be maintained to oblige the defendant to close doors recently opened in his house on the ground that they overlook the zenana of the plaintiff—vide Mahomed Abdur Rahim v. Birj Sahu (1), Sheikh Golam Ali v. Kazi Mahomed Zehur Alum (2), and Jogul Lal v.

* Second Appeal, No. 1517 of 1885, from a decree of Maulvi Syed Farid-ud-din, Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore, dated the 16th May, 1885, confirming a decree of Babu Bepin Behari Mukerji, Munsif of Cawnpore, dated the 18th September, 1884.

Musammat Jasoda Bebee (1). This issue is accordingly decided against the plaintiffs." In regard to the issue as to the drain on the northern side, the Court held that the plaintiffs could not succeed, having failed to prove special damage, and referred to Karim Bakhsh v. Buhda (2).

From the Munsif's decree the defendant appealed to the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore, the plaintiffs at the same time filing objections to so much of the decree as was adverse to them. The Subordinate Judge concurred with the Munsif on all points. Upon the issue as to the door he said :—"I hold that although the door affects the privacy of the plaintiffs' house, yet as the defendant has set it up in his own wall, the plaintiffs have no right to have it closed. The remedy is in the hands of the plaintiffs. They can raise their wall so high that the door may not affect their privacy."

The defendant appealed to the High Court. The plaintiffs filed objections under s. 561 of the Civil Procedure Code with regard to the door or window and the northern drain.

On the 25th May, 1886, Oldfield and Mahmood, JJ., remitted an issue to the lower appellate Court for a finding as to how and to what extent the door or window affected the privacy of the plaintiffs. In his finding the Subordinate Judge said that the window in dispute overlooked the whole of the plaintiffs' house, and in particular those portions of the house which were reserved for females. Upon the return of this finding, the defendant filed objections under s. 567 of the Civil Procedure Code to the effect that the plaintiffs were not entitled to restrain him from opening and using his window on the ground of interference with their privacy, in the absence of proof of twenty years' uninterrupted user.

[164] On the 11th January, 1887, the following order was passed by Oldfield and Brodhurst, JJ.—

"We are of opinion that the appeal on behalf of the appellant must succeed in respect of the chajja and kasi made by him on the west wall of his house. The only ground on which the Court below ordered their removal is that they are recently made, but they are not shown to interfere with any right of the plaintiffs so that the latter can insist on their removal.

"Dealing with the objections filed by plaintiffs, we are of opinion that they have no force in respect of the complaint as to the drain defendant has made on his north wall.

"There is, however, the objection that the window and door have interfered with the privacy of the plaintiffs and overlooked apartments kept for the occupation of the female members of their family, and the Court below has found that this is so in fact. We think it desirable that an issue be tried whether by local custom there is any right of easement by which the plaintiffs have a right to have the privacy of their apartments maintained by the removal of the door and window. The case is remanded, and ten days will be allowed for objections on return of the finding."

The Subordinate Judge's finding upon this issue was that the existence in the mohalla where the parties lived of a customary easement of privacy was proved. Upon the return of the finding the defendant objected under s. 567 of the Civil Procedure Code, that "no custom has been established in law." The case came on for hearing before Edge, C.J., and Brodhurst, J., on the 4th November, 1887.

Kunwar Shivanath Sinha and Pandit Sundar Lal, for the appellant

Mr. Amiruddin, for the respondents.

EDGE, C.J.—In this case the defendant appealed and the plaintiffs filed objections. The case came on for hearing first before my brother Mahmood and Mr. Justice Oldfield, by whom an order of remand was passed with regard to the issue arising on the objections. On the return of the remand the case came on before my brother Brodhurst and Mr. Justice Oldfield on the 11th January [165] last. On that occasion they expressed an opinion as to the merits of the appeal. They did not give judgment on the appeal, but merely stated that the appellant would be entitled to succeed, giving certain reasons for that view. It appears to me that the appeal can have hardly been argued out before those Judges on the 11th January, as it is obvious that the true meaning of the facts as found was not present to their minds. However, on this occasion we have had the opportunity of hearing Mr. Amiruddin, who has taken care that we shall not overlook the findings. On the 11th January a further remand arising out of the objections originally taken was ordered. The return is now before us. Mr. Amiruddin contends that we have got to decide the whole case, and that we are not entitled to treat the expressions of the Judges on the 11th January as a judgment on the appeal. He has contended that the determination of an appeal when there has been a remand must be on a hearing of the appeal, that is, on a hearing of the whole case, and that this applies equally to an appeal in which there are objections as to an appeal in which there are none. I confess I thought at one part of the argument that we might treat the appeal as already decided and the questions arising on the objections the sole matter for our consideration. The practical difficulty which would arise from separating the appeal and the objections and treating the appeal as having been decided on the 11th of January last leads me to think that Mr. Amiruddin's argument is well founded. A difficulty would arise under s. 579 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides that the decree of the appellate Court shall bear the date on which the judgment was pronounced, and the decree must be signed by the Judge or Judges who passed it. If Pandit Sundar Lal's contention were correct, there would be here two decrees, one of the 11th January of this year, the other a decree of to-day's date. If his contention is correct, we could not adopt the decree of 11th January as our own, as it would not be the decree of this Bench as constituted. I therefore come to the conclusion that the question which has been raised by the appellant and the objections raised by the respondents are to be considered by us. From my ruling on this point it must not be inferred that where Judges have heard arguments on some of the issues and have come to or [166] expressed their views on those issues and have remanded another issue or issues under s. 566, the same Judges should be bound to hear on the return to the remand the case de novo. In such a case I for one would confine counsel to the findings on remand, which, of course, I had not had an opportunity of considering before. The defendant in his appeal asks to have set aside that part of the decree which interferes with the chajja and drain he had made. It is found that no chajja or drain existed previous to the time of the erection of the additional building which the defendant has erected. The chajja extended an appreciable distance over the plaintiffs' land. It is obvious that if the plaintiffs were not entitled to a decree with regard to the chajja and drain, the defendant might in course of time acquire an easement which might seriously interfere with the enjoyment by the plaintiff of his land. I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. As to the objection, the findings on remand show that the plaintiff is entitled to have his right of privacy observed, and to have a mandatory order to compel the appellant to permanently close the door or window complained of. In this respect the decree of the Court below will be varied. I am of opinion that the objections should be allowed with costs.

BRODHURST, J.—On further consideration of this second appeal I no longer hold the opinion that is expressed in the order of remand dated the 11th January last, and I concur in the judgment that has been delivered by the learned Chief Justice.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

PRESENT:

Lord Fitzgerald, Sir B. Peacock, and Sir R. Couch.

[On appeal from the High Court for the North-Western Provinces.]

ZAIN-UL-ABDIN KHAN v. MUHAMMAD ASGHAR ALI KHAN
 AND OTHERS. (3rd December, 1887.)

Sale in execution of decree—Effect of reversal of decree upon sale in execution—Sale to bona fide purchaser, not a party to the decree, distinguished from sale to decree-holder.

A sale, having duly taken place in execution of a decree in force at the time, cannot afterwards be set aside as against a bona fide purchaser, not a party to the [167] decree, on the ground that, on further proceedings, the decree has been, subsequently to the sale, reversed by an appellate Court.

A suit was brought by a judgment-debtor to set aside sales of his property in execution of the decree against him in force at the time of the sales, but afterwards so modified, as the result of an appeal to her Majesty in Council, that, as it finally stood, it would have been satisfied without the sales in question having taken place. He sued both those who were purchasers at some of the sales, being also holders of the decree to satisfy which the sales took place, and those who were bona fide purchasers at other sales, under the same decree, who were no parties to it.

Held, that, as against the latter purchasers, whose position was different from that of the decree-holding purchasers, the suit must be dismissed.

APPEAL from two decrees (11th June, 1883) of the High Court, reversing a decree (16th March, 1882) of the Subordinate Judge of Moradabad.

The question raised in this appeal was whether or not several auction sales of property formerly belonging to the appellant, who was judgment-debtor under the decree in satisfaction of which the sales took place, were to be set aside, on the ground that this decree had been, subsequently to the sales, so far modified by an appellate Court as to make what had been realized at a prior sale of the appellant's property sufficient to cover the amount finally decreed.

The sales were in execution of an ex parte decree (8th April, 1874) obtained by three of the defendants in the present suit for possession of shares in zemindari lands and houses, and for mesne profits and payment of a dower-debt, also for money due on a promissory note, the whole aggregating in value more than a lakh of rupees.

An appeal having been rejected by the High Court (26th August 1875) on the ground that there could be no appeal from such an ex parte decree, an appeal to Her Majesty in Council (1) (22nd November, 1878) resulted in a remand, followed by a decree of the High Court (1st March, 1880) disallowing part of the claim, on grounds, thus expressed in the judgment, having reference to jurisdiction, which affected the right to recover the dower-debt, and upon the promissory note:

[168] "The cause of action cannot be held to have arisen in the district of Moradabad, for the lady was a resident of Jaipur and died there, and the plaintiffs are residents of the foreign State of Jaipur, and the defendant dwells in the foreign State of Jaipur, and has no connection with Moradabad.

"Equally, the Court will not have jurisdiction to try the claim for the dower-debt; this item is claimed as part of the assets left by the lady and divisible among the heirs. As already stated, the lady died at Jaipur and had no connection with the district of Moradabad, and her marriage, and presumably the contract for dower, took place at Rampur."

By the decree (1st March, 1880) which followed this judgment, the former decree (8th April, 1874) was confirmed as to the estates in land and as to the mesne profits for Rs. 3,746 only, with Rs. 4,908 for costs.

Meanwhile, the holders of the decree of 1874 had, in that year, obtained orders for sale in execution of it and brought to sale some of the judgment-debtor's property.

The first sale was on the 17th November, 1874, and comprised a house known as Diwan Kaumal's in Moradabad, for Rs. 5,050, the purchaser being Asghar Ali Khan, one of the present respondents.

This property was not included in the present claim, the plaintiff explaining that this sale might stand good as satisfying what was due under the decree of the 1st March, 1880. Of those sales which the present suit (22nd February, 1881) sought to have set aside, the first was a sale (21st November, 1874) of twelve and a half biswas owned by the plaintiff, appellant, in mauza Alata for Rs. 8,575. The second was a sale (20th November, 1875) of his right, title, and interest in other villages which had realized Rs. 18,900 and Rs. 12,000. Another was a sale (15th November, 1876) of the Bank Kothi in Meerut cantonment. At these sales the decree-holders had purchased some of the property, and they, or purchasers from them, were originally the only defendants. But by an order of the Court of first instance (17th January, 1882) the respondents, Har Sarup, Prasadi Lal, and Jeo Ram, purchasers [169] at the auction-sales who were not parties to the decree of 8th April, 1874, were made defendants.

Issues having raised the question (among others) whether the sales could be set aside on the ground of the subsequent modification of the decree, the subordinate Judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to have them set aside both as against the decree-holders who had brought the property to sale in satisfaction of their decree and had purchased at the sales, and property as against the purchasers who were no parties to the decree.

The latter only were the appellants in the appeal to the High Court which followed, and a Divisional Bench (Straight and Oldfield, JJ.) reversed the above judgments as against them, on the ground that the sales, as against bona fide purchasers, not parties to the decree subsequently modified, were not rendered invalid by the modification taking place (1).

On this appeal,

Mr. T. H. Cowie, Q. C., and Mr. C. W. Arathoon, appeared for the appellant.

Mr. R. V. Doyne and Mr. W. A. Raikes appeared for the respondents.

For the appellants it was argued that the judgment of the first Court had been so far correct that all the sales subsequent to that which had realized enough to satisfy the decree as finally made should be set aside; and that the modification of the decree of the 8th April, 1874, which had taken place on the ground of the absence of jurisdiction, showed that sales realising amounts in excess of what was ultimately allowed by the decree of 1st March, 1880, were unauthorized.

Reference was made to Jadunath Kundu Chowdhry, v. Brijanath Kundu (2), Kanhaye Singh v. Oomadhar Bhatt, (3), Abdool Hye v. Nawab Raj (4).

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

SIR B. PEACOCK gave their Lordship's judgment.

JUDGMENT.

SIR B. PEACOCK.—In this case the plaintiff sued several defendants claiming to set aside certain auction sales which had [170] taken place under a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Moradabad, and for an order that the plaintiffs be put into absolute possession of the properties which were sold and are mentioned in the schedule to the plaint. In the schedule the properties and the purchasers thereof are separately described, and the action may be treated not as a joint action as regards all the property, but as an action against the several defendants as regards the properties of which they were severally purchasers.

Some of the defendants were the decree-holders, and some were persons who came in under them; but all the defendants who are in that position may for the purpose of this judgment be classed under the head of the decree-holders. Others of the defendants were not decree-holders, but merely purchasers under the execution and strangers to the decree upon which the execution issued. The circumstances are peculiar. The plaintiffs in the suit in which the execution was issued sued the present appellant in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Moradabad to recover certain landed property situate in that district, and also mesne profits in respect of that property. They also sued for a large amount in respect of promissory notes which were alleged to be due from the present appellant to the plaintiffs in that suit, and a large amount alleged to be due from the appellant as dower to their mother, whom they represented. The defendant in that suit—the present appellant—objected that there was no jurisdiction on the part of the Subordinate Judge to try the suit, inasmuch as he the then defendant, was not a resident in the district of Moradabad, but a resident in foreign territory, namely, Jaipur. But the Subordinate Judge decided that he had jurisdiction and gave a decree against him, not only for the lands which were situate in the district, and the mesne profits of those lands, but also for the amount which was claimed to be due on the promissory notes and on account of the dower.

That case was appealed to the High Court, but that Court dismissed the appeal upon the ground that the case was not appealable. An appeal was then preferred to Her Majesty in Council against that decision of the High Court, and Her Majesty in Council reversed the decision of the High Court and remanded [171] the case to be tried upon the merits. The High Court, when they tried the case upon the merits, reversed the decision of the Subordinate Judge as regards the amount decreed by the Subordinate Judge in respect of the dower and of the promissory notes, but affirmed his judgment as to the land which was situate within his jurisdiction, and the mesne profits in respect of that land. But before the judgment of the Privy Council, and before the decree of the High Court which reversed a part of the original judgment of the Subordinate Judge, the plaintiffs in that suit who are now some of the defendants, executed their decree, and several sales took place under that execution. Under the first sale a certain amount was realized which would have been sufficient to cover the amount finally allowed by the decree of the High Court upon appeal. A second sale took place under which one of the defendants, Asghar Ali, purchased bond fide, he not being a party to the original decree.

The plaintiff brought his suit on the 22nd of February, 1881, not only against the decree-holders who had purchased under the execution, but as against the bond fide purchaser who was no party to the decree.

Pending the suit certain other defendants were added, as appears at page 2 of the record. The entry on the record is as follows :—"According to the order dated 17th January, 1882, Har Sarup, Parshadi Lal, and Jiwa Ram, auction-purchasers, were joined as defendants." The three defendants who were then joined were no parties to the decree, so that there are two sets of defendants in the suit : the decree-holders who purchased under their own execution ; Asghar Ali, who purchased a portion of the property of the plaintiff, being a bona fide purchaser and a stranger to the decree ; and the three other defendants, who were alleged to be auction-purchasers under the decree and who were no parties to it.

The plaintiff claimed that "the auction sales of the disputed property detailed in the plaint, held on 20th November, 1874, 20th November, 1875, and 15th November, 1876, be declared null and void, and the sale deed in favour of Shaukat Husain Khan, dated 2nd November, 1880, so far as it appertains to the plaintiff's claim, [172] be set aside." Thus he claimed to set aside all the auction sales, not only as against the decree-holders who had purchased, but as against bona fide purchasers who were no parties to the decree. Secondly, he claimed that "plaintiff be put in absolute possession, of the undermentioned property of the value of Rs. 21,450 after dispossession of the defendants."

Amongst other issues, one was whether the auction sale and the purchase, having been made bona fide could be invalidated or set aside by the modification of the decree, and whether the limitation law barred the claim.

It appears to their Lordships that there is a great distinction between the decree-holders who came in and purchased under their own decree, which was afterwards reversed on appeal, and the bona fide purchasers who came in and bought at the sale in execution of the decree to which they were no parties, and at a time when that decree was a valid decree, and when the order for the sale was a valid order.

A great distinction has been made between the case of bona fide purchasers who are no parties to a decree at a sale under execution and the decree-holders themselves. In Bacon's Abridgment, Title "Error," it is laid down, citing old authorities, that "if a man recovers damages, and hath execution by fiери facias, and upon the fiери facias the sheriff sells to a stranger a term for years, and after the judgment is reversed, the party shall be restored only to the money for which the term was sold, and not to the term itself, because the sheriff had sold it by the command of the writ of fiери facias." There are decisions to a similar effect in the High Court at Calcutta. They are collected in a note in Broughton, in his book on the Code of Civil Procedure, fourth edition, note to s. 246, Act VIII of 1859. So in this case, those bona fide purchasers, who were no parties to the decree which was then valid and in force, had nothing to do further than to look to the decree and to the order of sale.

The Subordinate Judge held that the defendants were bound to restore the property; not only the decree-holders who had purchased, but the defendants who had purchased bona fide, not being [173] parties to the decree. In his judgment he says:—"The limitation period of one year has nothing to do with this case. The cause of action having accrued to plaintiff on the 1st March, 1880, the date when the decision was modified, and as he instituted the claim on 22nd February, 1881, it is on no account considered beyond time." Therefore he held that the suit was not barred, but that the plaintiff had a right to recover, not only as against the decree-holders, but as against the bona fide purchasers, who were no parties to the decree under which they purchased, and he decreed the plaintiff's suit. The defendant Asghar Ali and the three added defendants, none of whom was a party to the decree in execution of which the sales were effected, appealed to the High Court.

When the case came before the High Court they reversed that decision. They passed two decrees, one, as regards the three appellants who were the added defendants, and the other as against Asghar Ali; but they are both in similar words. They said:—"Both appeals must be decreed with costs, and the decision of the Subordinate Judge being reversed, the plaintiff's claim will stand dismissed." According to the strict grammatical construction of the decrees the plaintiff's claim was dismissed, not only as regards the defendants who had appealed, but as regards the other who had not appealed. The decrees must, however, be construed as applicable only to the defendants who had appealed and whose appeals were decreed, and not to the defendants who had not appealed, and who were not before the Court and had not objected to the decision of the Subordinate Judge.

Their Lordships therefore will humbly advise Her Majesty that the decrees of the High Court ought to be treated as decrees against the plaintiff only so far as his suit related to the defendants who had appealed to the Court, and that being so treated, they ought to be affirmed; and that the decree of the Subordinate Judge should be reversed so far only as it related to the plaintiff's claim against those defendants. Their Lordships also think that the appellant must pay the costs of the respondents in this appeal.

Their Lordships wish it to be distinctly understood that in affirming the decrees of the High Court they treat them merely as [174] decrees in favour of the defendants who were appellants to the High Court.

Appeal dismissed.

Although all depositions of witnesses in criminal cases should be taken and attested in the presence of the accused, and a few apt words should be used on the face of the deposition to make it apparent that this has been done, there is no provision of the law which makes the attestation of the deposition by the Court in the presence of the accused obligatory.

S. 90 of the Evidence Act therefore does not warrant the presumption that the deposition of a medical witness taken by a committing Magistrate has been taken and attested in the accused's presence, so as to make such deposition admissible in evidence at the trial before the Court of Session under s. 509 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Queen-Empress v. Riding (1) referred to.

[Appr., 18 C. 129 (133).]

The facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Edge, C.J.

Mr. C. Dillon, for the appellants.

The Public Prosecutor (Mr. G. E. A. Ross), for the Crown.

EDGE, C.J.—This is an appeal by Pohp Singh and Jaswant Singh, who were convicted by the Sessions Judge of Agra on the 12th November last, of the murder of Musammatt Khamani, and were by him sentenced to death. The principal evidence for the prosecution was that of Suraj Pal, a Brahman of Dhanola, a Chamar, and of Pancham Singh, a Thakur. Those three witnesses deposed to having seen the prisoners' kicking the deceased woman, who was apparently fifty-five years of age, and to having seen the woman, after she had been kicked and rendered insensible, dragged or carried by the prisoners to a well and thrown into it by them. [175] The circumstances which led up to the commission of the crime, of which I believe the prisoners to be guilty, were that the deceased woman had held portions of some land as mortgagee, that a Raja had put the prisoners in possession of that land, and that on the day in question the prisoners, or one of them, was ploughing the land adversely to the rights of the deceased woman; that she objected to their doing so and made an outcry, upon which Suraj Pal came up, when he was assaulted by the two prisoners, Jaswant Singh striking him on the arm with a lathi and Pohp Singh striking him on the head. The old woman came to his assistance, when she was kicked in the manner described by those witnesses to whom I have referred. It appears to me that the story those witnesses told is the true one, and that the deceased woman, after she had been rendered insensible by the violence of the prisoners, was thrown into the well by them with the result that she died. For the defence there were several witnesses called. The first three of those, namely, Ganga Prasad, Gajraj Singh, and Jarra Singh, know nothing about the transaction. The fourth witness, Than Singh, says that the old woman, upon seeing Suraj Pal assaulted, went to the well and threw herself into it, and that Ganga Prasad's wife accompanied the old woman to the well. We are told that Ganga Prasad's wife was Musammat Daryayi, who is mentioned in the petition of Pohp Singh; she was not called as a witness on either side. The next witness, Ganesh Prasad, says that after the fight Suraj Pal and Pohp Singh went off to the village, leaving the woman sitting in her field, and that she did not fall into the well in his presence. The evidence of these two witnesses is inconsistent, and I must say I do not believe it. The next witness, Sarawan Sing, says that he heard that Musammat Khamani fell into the well, but he did not know how. In the cross-examination he said:—"I saw Khamani falling into the well." Immediately afterwards he said that he heard she had, and that no one was near her at the time. It is obvious that this witness was not telling the truth. Those last three witnesses are the witnesses for the defendant, who appear to have been, according to their evidence, either at or near the place where the occurrence took place at the time. On behalf of Jaswant Singh an alibi was set up, which was supported by Khushal; Surat, and Har [176] Prasad, and also Ganesh Prasad, to whom I have already referred. I believe that Jaswant was present on the occasion in question, and that he was one of the two men who kicked the deceased and threw her into the well, and I do not believe the alibi. On the 14th July, the day on which this took place, Suraj Pal made a complaint at the thana. He then, according to the evidence of Ram Dayal, Sub-Inspector of Jeitpura, charged these two prisoners with having beaten the woman and thrown her into the well. I thoroughly agree with the comments of the Sessions Judge on the conduct of Ram Dayal, and in my opinion the attention of the Government should be called to his conduct in this case. I have not a shadow of doubt in my mind that these two prisoners brought about that woman's death under circumstances which render them liable to be convicted of murder. I think they were properly convicted, and I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed and the sentences confirmed.

In the course of the argument in this case the deposition of Dr. A. Hilson, Civil Surgeon of Agra, was commented on by the counsel for the appellants, and that deposition, as printed in the paper book, was very properly made use of by that counsel in support of his contention that the Doctor's evidence was consistent with the defence of suicide, and he also contended that the deposition was at variance with the depositions of Suraj Pal and the other witnesses for the prosecution. I do not see, myself, that it is at variance with the evidence. However, the reason for which I have referred to the deposition has to do with the form in which that deposition has come before us. On examining the record we find two documents bearing the signature of Saiyad Muhammad Mohsin, who was in fact the Deputy Magistrate who committed the prisoners for trial. Now, one of those is in the vernacular and appears to be, as far as we can judge, a note or translation of the evidence of Dr. Hilson. It apparently bears the signature of Mr. Saiyad Muhammad Mohsin, with the additional letters "D. C.," which, I suppose, means Deputy Collector. Below the signature are the figures 20-9-87, and below them some hieroglyphics. That document does not purport to have been the deposition of Dr. Hilson taken and attested by the Magistrate in the presence of the accused. The concluding paragraph in that document, as [177] translated reads thus:—"The injury could be caused by a fall from a considerable height." The other document to which I refer bears the heading "Deposition of Dr. A. Hilson, Civil Surgeon of Agra, on S.A." That heading is written in black ink. Beneath that heading there is written in blue ink what I suppose was the evidence of Dr. Hilson. This document is described in the list of documents as the deposition of Dr. Hilson. It purports to bear the signature of A. Hilson M.D., Civil Surgeon, and the signature of Saiyad Muhammad Mohsin. The body of the document is not in Mr. Mohsin's writing. Whether the name A. Hilson, at the foot of the document was written by Dr. Hilson, or by the writer of the body of the document, I am unable to tell. It is quite obvious at any rate that the letters "M.D." and the words "Civil Surgeon" in blue ink at the foot of the document are in the same hand-writing as that at the head of the document in black ink. Now the last paragraph of this document as it stood originally read as follows:—"The injury might have been caused by a fall from a considerable height." As it now appears, that paragraph reads thus:—"The injury had been caused by a fall from a considerable height." The latter is the reading which is relied on for the defence—a reading which is consistent with the sentence immediately preceding it, as well as with the reading of the vernacular document to which I have just referred. How, when, or by whom, this alteration was made there is nothing to show. That alteration is not vouched for or initialled in any way. If it be the fact that this document in English is a translation of the original deposition, the heading is misleading; the heading would lead one to infer that it was the original deposition. Whichever it is, there is nothing to show that it was taken or attested by the Magistrate in the presence of the accused. If either of these had been documents essential as evidence for the prosecution in this case, I should have declined to treat them as evidence against the accused under s. 509 of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882. That section is as follows:—"The deposition of a Civil Surgeon or other medical witness taken and attested by a Magistrate in the presence of the accused may be given in evidence in any inquiry, trial, or other proceeding under this Code, although the deponent is not called as a witness. The Court may, if it thinks fit, summon [178] and examine such deponent as to the subject-matter of his deposition." As I have said, there is nothing on the face of either of these documents to show that either was taken or attested by a Magistrate in the presence of the accused. In the case Queen-Empress v. Riding (1), I rejected a document which was tendered as evidence under s. 509. In that case I was asked to presume that it had been taken and attested in the presence of the accused, and was pressed with s. 114, illustration (c), of the Evidence Act. There is a Reporter's note appended to that case. I infer that that note originated in some one having considered that s. 80 of the Evidence Act would apply. I may say that, in my judgment, all depositions of witnesses in criminal cases should be taken and attested by the Magistrate in presence of the accused; but I am not aware of any provisions in these Codes which make the attestation of the deposition by the Magistrate in the presence of the accused obligatory. Unless it is made obligatory by the Codes that such attestation should take place in the presence of the accused, I fail to see how s. 80 of the Evidence Act can be held to apply by any who takes the trouble to read that section with ordinary care. The document may be genuine, and still it may not have been attested by the Magistrate in the presence of the accused. There is no statement on the face of the document as to the circumstances under which the deposition, if it was one, was taken, and as to the concluding words of s. 80, if there is no obligation imposed upon the Magistrate by the Code to attest the deposition in the presence of the accused, the evidence or statement might have been duly taken, although not attested by the Magistrate in the presence of the accused. I may go further and say that in this case there is nothing to show that what I assume for the moment to be the deposition of Dr. Hilson was either taken or attested by the Magistrate in the presence of the accused. S. 509 of the Criminal Procedure Code does not enact that a deposition of a Surgeon shall be taken and attested by the Magistrate in the presence of the accused. What it does provide is that a deposition of a Surgeon, if so taken and attested, may be put in evidence. A Magistrate should take and attest a deposition in the presence of the accused, and should also, by the use of a few apt words on the face of the [179] deposition, make it apparent that he has done so. The second document, to which I have already referred, affords a good example of the danger in the criminal case, involving the life of an accused, of making any such presumption as that which I was asked to make in the case of Queen-Empress v. Riding (1). The file in this case will be returned under seal to the Sessions Judge of Agra, and he will be requested to enquire into the origin of these two documents, and when and by whom they were signed, and when and by whom the alteration in that which is in English was made, and report to this Court accordingly.

TYRRELL, J.—I entirely concur in the dismissal of this appeal and in directing the sentence to be carried out, and I also concur with what has been said by the learned Chief Justice in respect of the deposition of Dr. Hilson, and I fully adopt the ruling of the learned Chief Justice in Queen-Empress v. Riding (1), and his remarks on the same subject which have been made in the present case.

A decree for foreclosure containing a distinct and separate order for costs was afterwards confirmed by an order absolute for foreclosure, and the mortgagee under such order obtained possession. Subsequently he applied for execution of the order for costs.

* First appeal No. 187 of 1887 from an order of Maulvi Mahomed Abdul Basit Khan, Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri, dated the 27th May, 1887.

(1) 9 A., 720.

(2) 14 C. 185.

THE appellants in this case obtained a decree for foreclosure against the respondents on the 9th September, 1886, and it was [180] provided in the decree that in default of payment of the decretal sum due on the mortgage by conditional sale on or before the 9th March, 1887, the defendants should be absolutely debarred of all right to redeem the property. The decree then went on to say:—"And this also is ordered, that the defendants do pay to the plaintiffs Rs. 401-6-0 in respect of the costs of this Court which have been incurred by them." This order was apparently passed under s. 220 of the Civil Procedure Code.

The defendants failed to pay the decretal money within the prescribed period, and accordingly, in execution of the decree, the decree-holders obtained possession of the mortgaged property. Subsequently, they made an application on the 10th May, 1887, in which they claimed to recover the sum awarded to them for costs under the decree of the 9th September, 1886.

The Court executing the decree (Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri) gave judgment as follows, rejecting the application:—

"Certainly no costs will be allowed, because s. 87 of Act IV of 1882 says that if such payment is not so made, the plaintiff may apply to the Court for an order that the defendant be debarred absolutely of all rights to redeem the mortgaged property, and the Court shall then pass such order." The defendants failed to make payment, and the plaintiffs, having taken proceedings under the said clause, obtained possession of the foreclosed property. The plaintiffs have, therefore, no right to recover costs, because two cases are contemplated in the section; one is that the defendants pay the judgment debt together with costs, and the other is that the plaintiffs obtain possession. In the second case, it does not at all appear from the section that the decree-holder shall, notwithstanding delivery of possession, be entitled to costs. My order in the regular suit was also to the following effect:—"The judgment-debtors either pay the whole amount with costs or be debarred of all rights to redeem. The forfeiture of the rights of redemption is the result of not fully carrying out the condition of the first case, including costs. That case is different in which the Court awards costs personally against the judgment-debtor who continues personally responsible. But when such is not the case, and a general order is made under s. 87, the third case does not hold [181] good, that either the right of redemption is barred or payment should be made. There is no case in which the right of redemption is barred for default in paying the principal and interest, and yet costs remain due separately."

The decree-holders appealed to the High Court.

Munshi Hanuman Prasad and Munshi Madho Prasad, for the appellants.

The respondents were not represented.

MAHMOOD, J. (after stating the facts and the conclusions of the lower Court, continued):—I am unable to accept this view of the law. The decree in the case appears to have been framed in the terms of ss. 86 and 87 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) and of s. 94 of the same enactment. It is unnecessary for me to go into the exact effect of these various sections in this case, because the decree of the 9th September, 1886, which I am called upon to interpret, appears to me explicit in terms as to costs.

It is one thing to say that by reason of the money due upon the bai-bil-wafa mortgage the mortgage has ceased to be redeemable, and it is another thing to say that the order as to costs contained in the decree forms a part and parcel of the money due upon such a mortgage. In a suit for foreclosure, the plaintiff may be claiming neither more nor less than what is really and rightly due upon the mortgage and the defendant in resisting the suit would, in order to escape costs, be entitled to show that there was no real dispute or that he had been improperly impleaded. But in a case like the present, in which the suit ended in the decree of the 9th September, 1886, the defendants appear to have disputed the rights of foreclosure and to have failed in such defence. The order as to costs in this case has been dealt with as a separate part of the decree unaffected by the question whether or not the defendants-mortgagors paid the amount due on the bai-bil-wafa mortgage. Such, I think, is the general effect of the view adopted by the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court in Rutnessur Sein v. Jusoda (1), and in the present case it seems to me that the decree itself is explicit, and the order relating to costs should have been allowed to be executed by the lower Courts.

[182] For these reasons I decree the appeal, and as the amount due for costs is a matter relating to accounts, the proper course is to set aside the order of the lower appellate Court and remand the case under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code to be dealt with according to law as stated in this judgment. I order accordingly. Costs will abide the result.

ARJUN SINGH (Opposite party) v. SARFARAZ SINGH (Petitioner).*

Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz—Rival suits—Decree not to allow either claimant to pre-empt part only of the property over which he has a pre-emptive right.

Where two rival pre-emptors, each having an equal right to claim pre-emption under a wajib-ul-arz, bring suits to enforce their rights, in the absence of anything in the wajib-ul-arz to the contrary, the rule of Muhammadan law must be observed, and however the property may be divided by the decree of the Court between the successful pre-emptors, the Court must take care that the whole share must be purchased by both pre-emptors, or on the default of one by the other, or that neither of them should obtain any interest in the property in respect of which the suits were brought.

In two rival suits for pre-emption, the Court gave one claimant a decree in respect of a three annas share, and the other a decree in respect of a two annas six pies share of certain property, each decree being conditional on payment of the price within thirty days. The Court further directed that in case of either pre-emptor making default of payment within the thirty days, the other should be entitled to pre-empt his share on payment of the price thereof within fifteen days of such default. Both pre-emptors made default of payment within the thirty days. One of them, within the further period of fifteen days, paid into Court the price of the share decreed in favour of the other and claimed to pre-empt such share.

Held (affirming the judgment of MAHMOOD, J.) that the claim was inadmissible, since to allow it would have the effect of defeating the rule of law that a pre-emptor must buy the whole and not part only of the property which he is entitled to pre-empt.

(1) 14 C. 185.

THIS was an appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent from a decision of Mahmood, J, sitting as a single Judge. The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgments of the Court.

Mr. J. Simeon, for the appellant.

Munshi Ram Prasad, for the respondents.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts of this case are these:—One Ram Kant Misr was the owner of a 5 annas 6 pies share, which he sold under a sale-deed, dated Pus badi 12, 1290 Fasli (1883) to Ganga [183] Mahton and Har Bakhsh Mahton. Upon this sale two pre-emptive suits were instituted, one by Arjun and the other by Sarfaraz. Both suits were decreed on the 16th August, 1884, which decrees were upheld in appeal on the 31st October, 1885. The effect of those decrees was that whilst the pre-emptor Arjun was held entitled to pre-empt a three annas share in lieu of Rs. 1,308-9-0, the rival pre-emptor Sarfaraz was held entitled to pre-empt the remaining 2 annas 6 pies share on payment of Rs. 1,090-7-0. But it was provided in both the decrees that in case of default of either of the pre-emptors to pay in the amount above specified within a period of thirty days, the other pre-emptor would be entitled to pre-empt the remaining portion of the share decreed to the other pre-emptor on payment of the price thereof within fifteen days of such default.

It is therefore clear that the decrees of Arjun and Sarfaraz related to the entire 5 annas 6 pies share, subject to the restriction therein contained as I have mentioned. Such decrees were in full accord with the rule which applies to decrees for pre-emption in cases of rival pre-emptors, as fully stated in the case of Kashi Nath v. Mukhta Prasad (1), which was approved in Hulasi v. Sheo Prasad (2). It is also clear that each decree awarded pre-emption in respect of the whole subject of sale. Nor can these decrees be understood to have infringed the fundamental rule of pre-emption, namely, that the bargain of sale cannot be split up with reference to the subject-matter of the sale. This latter proposition is the effect of the ruling in Durga Prasad v. Munsu (3) and the cases referred to therein.

What appears to have happened here is that neither Arjun nor Sarfaraz deposited their respective sums of money within the thirty days specified in their respective decrees. The present dispute, however, has arisen because Arjun, the present respondent, having lost the benefit of his decree, is seeking to obtain the benefit of the decree obtained by Sarfaraz by depositing within fifteen days from the date of the default the sum of Rs. 1,090-7-0 as the purchase-money of the 2 annas 6 pies share which had been decreed in favour of Sarfaraz and in respect of which the decree provided [184] that Arjun, the rival pre-emptor, might enforce pre-emption on default of payment by Sarfaraz.

The Court of first instance held that the decree obtained by Sarfaraz could not be executed in this manner in favour of Arjun, who was judgment-debtor of that decree, and that such a partial execution of a pre-emption decree could not be allowed. Upon this ground that Court disallowed the application for execution, which, I may add, was opposed by Sarfaraz also, the holder of the decree under which Arjun claimed. The lower appellate Court, however, has reversed that order, and from that order this second appeal is preferred.

It seems to me clear that the lower appellate Court has misapprehended the case and the rule of law applicable to it. It is admitted that in the decree obtained by Arjun, the vendor, and the vendee, as well as the rival pre-emptor Sarfaraz, were defendants and became judgment-debtors when the claim was decreed. Similarly in the decree obtained by Sarfaraz the vendor and the vendee were defendants, as also Arjun, the rival pre-emptor. Now this being so, the decree of which the decree-holder could avail himself was the decree which he himself obtained, and not the decree which had been passed against him, whatever its terms may have been. The present respondent Arjun allowed his decree for pre-emption to lapse by reason of not having deposited Rs. 1,308-9-0, which that decree required him to do within thirty days, and that decree could not therefore be of any further use to him. Having thus foregone the benefit of his decree, I do not think he is entitled to execute the decree which Sarfaraz had obtained, simply because that decree, with reference to the other decree, allowed Arjun to pre-empt the remaining 2 annas 6 pies share within fifteen days of the default of payment of the purchase-money by Sarfaraz. The effect of the ruling of the lower appellate Court would be to split up the bargain of sale, because if Arjun could pre-empt only the 2 annas 6 pies share as he is seeking to do here, the remaining 3 annas would still be left in the hands of the vendees. The view of the law taken by the lower appellate Court is erroneous, because it is opposed, as I have already said, to the very fundamental principles of the law of pre-emption. Mr. Ram Prasad, on behalf of the respondent, has [185] indeed argued that in dealing with this case as a Court executing the decree, I am bound by the terms of the decrees, and thus I am precluded from applying the general principles of pre-emption at this stage. As to this contention, it is enough to say that, in the first place, the decrees themselves have for their sole aim and end the exclusion of such a splitting up of the bargain of sale as would result from the order of the lower appellate Court, and in the next place that in interpreting those decrees I cannot disregard the general principles of the law of pre-emption.

I hold, therefore, that the respondent Arjun, by foregoing his own decree by default of payment, is precluded from availing himself of the decree obtained by the rival pre-emptor Sarfaraz. In this view of this case this appeal is decreed, and the order of the lower appellate Court being set aside, that of the Court of first instance is restored. The respondent will pay costs in all the Courts.

From this decree Arjun appealed under s. 10 of the Letters Patent.

Munshi Ram Prasad for the appellant.

Mr. J. Simeon, for the respondent.

EDGE, C. J.—This appeal has arisen in the execution of a decree in a pre-emption suit. The share-holder in the village sold to a stranger, so far as is material, a 5 annas 6 pies share. Upon that Arjun Singh, the present appellant, brought his action for pre-emption of the whole share. Sarfaraz Singh, who was equally entitled with Arjun to pre-emption, brought his action claiming to pre-empt the whole. These two actions were tried together by the then Judge of Gorakhpur, and he dealt with them in this way:—he passed a decree in Arjun Singh's favour in respect of 3 annas out of the 5 annas 6 pies on payment within thirty days of the date of the decree of Rs. 1,308-9-0, and in favour of Sarfaraz Singh in respect of the remaining 2 annas 6 pies on payment within a like period of Rs. 1,090-7-0, and by both of the decrees it was provided that in case of default on the part of either of the pre-emptors to pay the amount above specified within a period of thirty days, the other pre-emptor would be entitled [186] to pre-empt the remaining portion of the share decreed to the other pre-emptor on payment of the price thereof within fifteen days of such default. What has taken place is this: the two pre-emptors made default of payment within thirty days. Arjun Singh after the expiration of thirty days, and within the further period of fifteen days, paid into the Court the Rs. 1,090-7-0, the pre-emption price decreed in respect of the  $2\frac{1}{2}$  annas share, and he now claims in execution to have possession of that  $2\frac{1}{2}$  annas share. It appears that by some arrangement to which Arjun Singh was no party, and which is not necessary for me to consider, Sarfaraz Singh, although he made default, got possession of the  $2\frac{1}{2}$  annas share. For the purposes of my judgment it is immaterial whether Sarfaraz Singh got possession of the  $2\frac{1}{2}$  annas share or not. The Subordinate Judge dismissed Arjun Singh's claim to have execution in respect of the  $2\frac{1}{2}$  annas share. The District Judge on appeal allowed that claim. My brother Mahmood, on appeal to this Court, for the reasons given in his judgment, confirmed the order of the Subordinate Judge and set aside the order of the District Judge with costs. From that decree of my brother Mahmood this appeal is brought under s. 10 of the Letters Patent. The case of Kashi Nath v. Mukhta Prasad (1), that of Durga Prasad v. Munsu (2), and that of Hulasi v. Sheo Prasad (3) are clear authorities in this Court, if any such authority was required, to show that the rule of the Muhammadan law which applies in pre-emption cases is that the person claiming pre-emption must claim the whole property sold and not part only if he has, as against the vendee, a pre-emptive right to the whole. Indeed, the case of Hulasi v. Sheo Prasad (3) shows that that rule applies even to the case of a pre-emptor who brings his action after another pre-emptor has already brought an action in respect of the same share. It is contended before us on behalf of Arjun Singh that we should construe the decree in these pre-emption suits as if they gave Arjun Singh a right to get the 2 annas 6 pies share even if he made default in paying the Rs. 1,308-9-0, the decreed pre-emption price in respect of the 3 annas share which was decreed to him. It is contended that such a decree would have been a good one according to the rulings of this Court. For that proposition three cases have been cited. [187] The first of those cases is that of Salig Ram v. Debi Parshad (4), a Full Bench case of this court. That case is no authority for that proposition. That case simply decided that by the settlement administration papers of the village a sharer was entitled to maintain an action for less than the whole share sold. The next case was that of Mahabir Parshad v. Debi Dial (5). In that case this Court held that the appellants there, on payment of Rs. 200, were entitled to obtain a two-thirds share, and that one Duliman should pay into Court within the same time, that was one month, Rs 100 and obtain a one-third share, and that if either of the appellants in that case or Duliman should fail to pay the amount within one month, "the other of them making the further deposit within the time shall be entitled to the share of the defaulter." It is perfectly plain from that judgment that the Court meant that the price of the whole share should be paid, and that not a part only of the price should be paid by some or one of the parties. The last case relied on is unreported. It is Second Appeal from Order No. 4 of 1886 (6). That case is very different from the present case. In that case the person before the Court was not a defaulter; he had in fact paid into Court the amount of money for which, in the result of his appeal, it had been decreed he should obtain a moiety of the share. Now I take it to be the law that in a case such as this, where two rival pre-emptors having each an equal right to claim pre-emption bring their pre-emption suits, and there is nothing in the wajib-ul-arz to the contrary, the rule of Muhammadan law must still be observed, and however the share may be divided by the decree of the court between such successful pre-emptors, the court must take care that the whole share must be purchased by both pre-emptors or on the default of one by the other, or that neither of them should obtain any interest in the share in respect of which the pre-emption suits arose. To hold otherwise would be to enable the shareholders in a village who did not wish to comply with the rule of Muhammadan law to which I have referred, where it applies, as in this case, to obtain possession of a portion of the share and leave the other portion of the share in the hands of the vendor or vendee. I must apply a reasonable construction to the decree of the Judge of Gorakhpur, and I hold that that decree meant, to take the case [188] of Arjun Singh, that if he within a specified time paid the Rs. 1,308-9 in respect of the 3 annas share, he would be entitled, on default made by Sarfaraz Singh, to obtain Sarfaraz Singh's share on payment within the further period of fifteen days of the Rs. 1,090-7-0. I am of opinion that the judgment of my brother Mahmood is a right judgment in law, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BRODHURST, J.—I concur with the learned Chief Justice in dismissing the appeal with costs.

MATA DIN AND OTHERS (Judgment-debtors) v. CHANDI DIN AND OTHERS

Execution of decree—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 246, 247—Cross-decrees—Set-off—Limitation.

Under two decrees of the Sudder Diwani Adawlat passed in 1864, A was entitled to two-thirds and B to one-third of certain immoveable property, with mesne profits in proportion. Each obtained possession of the immoveable property decreed to him. B appealed to the Privy Council from both decrees in respect of the two-thirds awarded to A. In April, 1866, pending the appeal, A applied for an account of the mesne profits due to him after setting off the mesne profits due to B, but as he failed to comply with a condition requiring him to give security for the amount claimed, in case the Privy Council should allow B's appeal, the application was struck off. In January, 1867, B applied for the mesne profits of the one-third decreed to him, and the Court found Rs. 18,000 to be the amount so due, but, on application by A, stayed further execution pending the Privy Council's decision. In 1873 the Privy Council dismissed B's appeal. In 1885, A, in execution of the Privy Council's decree, applied for Rs. 50,000 as mesne profits in respect of the two-thirds. B at the same time applied that the Rs. 18,000 declared in 1867 to be due to him in respect of the one-third might be set off against the amount claimed by A.

Held that the question of the amount due to A up to the date when he acquired possession of the two-thirds and which had never yet been decided should be reopened from the point at which it was left in 1866; that if this amount exceeded the Rs. 18,000 declared in 1867 to be due to B, satisfaction of A's claim to that extent should be entered up and the balance recovered from B; and that this course, if not strictly in accordance with the letter, was in accordance with the spirit, of ss. 246, 247 of the Civil Procedure Code, and at all events should be allowed on principles of natural equity.

Held also that until the amount due to A had been definitely ascertained in the execution department, B's right to maintain his set-off did not arise; that the set-off [189] was therefore not barred by limitation; that the order of January, 1867, was equivalent to a decree for the amount declared thereby as due to B; that when the execution department had determined the amount due to A, that decision also would be a decree, and that s. 246 of the Code could then be applied.

THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of Straight, J. Munshi Hanuman Prasad, for the appellants.
Munshi Ram Prasad, for the respondents.

STRAIGHT, J.—This is a first appeal on the execution side from an order of the Subordinate Judge of Banda refusing an application of the judgment-debtors, appellants, the nature of which I will presently explain. Before doing so it is necessary to state the facts connected with the litigation out of which it arose. In the year 1863 Raghunath and others, the ancestors of the now decree-holders, respondents, brought a suit in the Court of the Judge of Fatehpur against Hatti Dubai and others, now represented by the judgment-debtors, appellants, for a declaration of their right to and possession of certain immoveable property and mesne profits valued at Rs. 76,099-12-1 $\frac{3}{4}$ , and on the 28th July of that year the Judge gave the plaintiffs a decree in full for their claim. The defendants appealed to the Sadr Diwani Adalat, and that Court, on the 26th November, 1864, so far modified the Judge's decree as to hold the defendants entitled to retain one-third of the property with proportional mesne profits, but maintained it as to two-thirds. Hatti Dubai then appealed from this decision to their Lordships of the Privy Council in regard to the two-thirds as to which the Judge's decree had been sustained, while the plaintiffs rested content; and in the result their Lordships, on the 24th March, 1873, affirmed the decree of the Sadr Diwani. For convenience I will call this decree A.

In 1861 Hatti Dubai, ancestor of the judgment-debtors, appellants before us, had also brought a suit against the ancestors of the decree-holders, respondents, for immoveable property and mesne profits valued at Rs. 49,583-10-6 $\frac{1}{2}$ , which was dismissed by the Principal Sadr Amin of Banda on the 27th of June, 1861. He then preferred an appeal to the Sadr Diwani Adalat, and on the 15th of August, 1863, that Court modified the decree of the first [190] Court by giving the then plaintiff one-third of the property claimed. This decree was also appealed by the plaintiff Hatti Dubai to their Lordships of the Privy Council with regard to the two-thirds dismissed, and this appeal was consolidated with that mentioned as preferred from decree A and was disposed of by their Lordships in the manner I have already indicated. Under the decrees affirmed Hatti Dubai had been declared entitled to mesne profits for the years 1860 (1267 fasli) and thenceforward to date of possession, which were left to be determined on execution. This decree I will call decree B.

Now as to the execution proceedings in regard to decree A. The first application was made in September, 1863, and this was struck off on the 28th March 1864. A second application was made in July, 1864, which was also struck off in March, 1865. In September, 1865, the decree-holders were awarded possession of the villages decreed, but an application then pending as to mesne profits was stayed. On the 17th of April, 1866, the decree-holder filed a petition, praying that an account might be taken of the mesne profits due to them under their decree B, and "after setting off the amount due to the other on whichever side whatever surplus is found may be realized by the party entitled to it." It would appear from the petition that the amount of mesne profits claimed by the decree-holders was Rs. 55,066-9-1½, and as the appeals were pending to the Privy Council, they were called upon to file security for that amount as a condition to their application being allowed, so as to provide for restitution in the event of the appeals succeeding, but according to an order of the 12th September, 1866, this they failed to do and their application was struck off.

As to the execution proceedings with regard to decree B, that was first executed on the 31st March, 1864, and the decree-holders were put in possession of the one-third of the property decreed to them. There were also certain proceedings taken under that decree with regard to mesne profits, and from them it seems that the decree-holders had applied to execute their decree for Rs. 24,159-15-9½ mesne profits, but that this had been objected to by the judgment-debtors, decree-holders of decree A, on the ground that the mesne profits recoverable by them under their [191] decree were much larger. Upon this application the Court granted a stay of execution. By a subsequent proceeding of the 26th January, 1867, in regard to decree B, the Court found that Rs. 18,165-12-9½ was the amount to which the decree-holders of decree B were entitled in respect of mesne profits. This closed the execution proceedings of that stage of the matter. As I have already stated, their Lordships of the Privy Council determined the consolidated appeals in regard to both decrees on the 24th March, 1873. On the 25th February, 1885, the decree-holders of decree A applied for execution of the order of their Lordships to this Court, and in the ordinary course it was sent to the Subordinate Judge for execution. The decree-holders of decree B then filed before the Subordinate Judge an application praying to have the amount of the mesne profits to which they were entitled under the decree applied by way of set-off. The Subordinate Judge refused to do so, and his order was appealed to this Court, which, on the 17th of December, 1886, allowed the appeal in a judgment the terms whereof are set out in the decision of the Subordinate Judge which is now before us in appeal. The Subordinate Judge has now in effect found that as only the two-thirds of the property decreed by decree A and dismissed by decree B was made the subject of the appeals to their Lordships of the Privy Council, while as to the one-third decreed to the appellants and never questioned by the respondents in appeal or by cross-objections the decree of the Sadr Diwani Adalat was left untouched, nothing was due to the appellants under the order of their Lordships, and further, that "inasmuch as there is no decree in existence regarding which the provisions of ss. 246 and 247 may be carried out, the Court cannot grant set-off. If both parties had produced their respective decrees as provided by s. 246, then proceedings would have been taken under ss. 246 and 247. As this has not been done, the Court is helpless and can only execute the decree produced before it."

The matter, therefore, seems to stand thus: in 1867, when the appeals by the appellants were pending in the Privy Council, the appellants had obtained possession of the one-third of the villages decreed them and the respondents of their two-thirds, which latter property alone was the subject of the appeal. As to the one-third that had passed beyond the region of controversy, and in any event [192] the appellant was entitled to mesne profits in regard to it, up to the 26th of January, 1867, to the amount of Rs. 18,165-12-9½. But as to this sum it seems clear to me from what appears in the last sentence of the Sadr Amin's decision of that date that he held over granting execution in respect of it pending the decision of the Privy Council appeals. In other words, the Court decreed the decree-holders of decree B execution of their decree for mesne profits until it had been determined by their Lordships whether the decree-holders of decree A were entitled to the two-thirds of the property as to which they claimed their mesne profits, and indeed this was in accordance with the prayer of the petition put in by them asking for such a stay of execution, which was granted by the order of the 11th July, 1866. It seems to me, therefore, that if there was error in the proceedings, which I am not now determining, that was an error of the Court in which both parties acquiesced and indeed by their own action brought about, and of which neither should be allowed to take advantage to the detriment of the other. As admittedly both parties had obtained possession of their shares in the properties at the time of the Privy Council appeals being preferred, in the proportions which by their Lordships' order affirming the decrees of the Sadr Diwani Adalat were found to be the extent of their legal rights, each of them was entitled to an amount of mesne profits against the other up to the date of such possession being given, and as to the appellants that had found to be Rs. 18,165-12-9½, while in regard to the respondents it was alleged to be Rs. 56,066-9-1½, but the accuracy of this sum was not determined and still remains to be decided. In my opinion this latter question ought to be re-opened at the point at which it was left in 1866, and that when it has been ascertained what the respondents are entitled to if it exceeds the Rs. 18,165-12-9½ declared by the order of the 26th of January, 1867, to be the amount of mesne profits due from the respondents to the appellants, satisfaction of the claim of the respondents to that extent should be entered up and the balance be recoverable from the appellants. This is what it appears to me my brothers Oldfield and Brodhurst contemplated being done when they made their order of the 17th of December, 1886, and even if it is a course not strictly in accordance with the letter of s. 246 or 247 of the [193] Civil Procedure Code, which I am far from conceding, it is certainly within their spirit and under any circumstances, on principles of natural equity, ought to be sanctioned. One point only remains. It is said that the set-off the appellants now claim is barred by limitation, as it was not put forward until more than twelve years from the date of the order of their Lordships had elapsed. It is clear that the respondents were the parties who under the order of their Lordships were released from the stay that had been put upon their proceeding, with execution for mesne profits by the order of the 11th of July, 1866, and that they took this view of the matter is shown by their application of the 25th of February, 1885. It was well known to the appellants that the unascertained amount of the claim of the respondents against them was in any event sure to be considerably in excess of the amount to which they had been declared entitled by the order of the 26th of January, 1867, and until steps were taken by the respondents to have it ascertained, it was useless for them to claim a set-off—indeed the order of the 26th of January, 1867, seemed to contemplate their adopting that course. The respondents are now seeking to open up the question of mesne profits which was hung up by the Sadr Amin in 1866 and 1867, and in regard to which they themselves had recognised the right of the appellants to maintain a set-off for the counter mesne profits due to them upon the basis of the order of their Lordships of the Privy Council of March, 1873. Their application for execution, though delayed till almost the last moment, is within time; but until the execution department has ascertained definitely whether the whole of the Rs. 55,066-9-1½ claimed by them in 1866 or what part of it was due, the right of the appellants to maintain their set-off, the amount of which had been ascertained, did not in my opinion arise, and I therefore, cannot hold that any bar of limitation stands in their way. The order of the 26th January, 1867, which they hold, declaring their right to Rs. 18,165-12-9½, is equivalent to a decree for that sum, and in my opinion, when the execution department has in the proceedings out of which this appeal has arisen determined the sum to which the respondents are entitled, that will also be a decree, and thus the provisions of s. 246 of the Civil Procedure Code can be applied.

[194] Such being the view I hold, I decree the appeal with costs, and setting aside the order of the Subordinate Judge, direct him to dispose of the execution proceeding now pending in his Court with advertence to what I have said in the course of this judgment.

ABDUL RAHMAN AND ANOTHER (Plaintiff) v. BEHARI PURI (Defendant).*
[2nd February, 1888.]

Suit to establish right to sell property in execution of decree enforcing hypothecation—Suit against purchasers not parties to decree—Judgment-debtor declared insolvent pending suit—Decree-holder scheduling his decree under Civil Procedure Code, s. 352—Effect of schedule not to make suit unmaintainable.

A suit to establish a right to bring to sale certain moveable property in execution of a decree for enforcement of hypothecation was brought against persons who were not parties to that decree and had purchased in execution of a prior decree. Pending the suit, one of the judgment-debtors under the hypothecation decree was declared an insolvent, and the plaintiff scheduled his decree as a claim under s. 352 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Held, that the scheduling of the decree had not the effect of superseding it or creating another decretal right in addition to and independent of it, and did not make the suit, which was founded on a new and different cause of action against persons who were not parties to the decree unmaintainable.

[D., 14 A. 358 (359) = A.W.N. 892, 36].

THE facts of this case were as follows:—On the 12th March, 1886, one Mata Ghulam obtained against Ram Din and Gulab Kuar a decree upon a hypothecation bond by which two palkigaris were hypothecated. The decree contained an order that the two garis were to be sold in satisfaction of the hypothecation. After this, one Goshain Behari Puri, in execution of a money decree against Ram Din, attached the same two garis and caused them to be advertized for sale, the notification announcing the lien upon the garis under Mata Ghulam's decree. He then purchased Mata Ghulam's decree. At the sale in execution of Behari, * First Appeal No. 126 of 1887 from an order of Pandit Bansī Dhar, Subordinate Judge of Allahabad, dated the 25th June, 1887.

Puri's original decree, one Nahori purchased one of the garis and afterwards sold it to Abdul Rahman. The other was purchased by Sukun. Behari Puri then proceeded to put in force the decree which he had purchased from Mata Ghulam by attachment of the [195] two garis. To this attachment objections were raised by Abdul Rahman and Nahori, upon which, on the 31st July, 1886, the garis were released. Behari Puri thereupon instituted the present suit under s. 283 of the Civil Procedure Code to establish his right to bring the property to sale in execution of Mata Ghulam's decree.

This suit was instituted in the Court of the Munsif of Allahabad. While it was pending, Ram Din, one of the judgment-debtors under the decree obtained by Mata Ghulam, applied to the Subordinate Judge of Allahabad for a declaration of insolvency, and in his application, under s. 345 of the Civil Procedure Code, he mentioned the decree held by the plaintiff among the pecuniary claims against him. The Court issued notice to the plaintiff among other creditors, and on 20th November, 1886, framed a schedule under s. 352 of the Code, in which the decree was entered among the debts of Ram Din.

At the hearing of this suit the Court of first instance held that the suit was unmaintainable, on the ground that, under s. 352 of the Code, the declaration of insolvency was to be deemed a decree in favour of the plaintiff superseding that which he had purchased from Mata Ghulam, and in respect of which the suit was brought, and that the plaintiff could not seek any remedy apart from the insolvency proceedings. The Court accordingly dismissed the suit. On appeal, the Subordinate Judge set aside the decree and remanded the case for retrial under s. 562 of the Code. The defendants appealed to the High Court from the order of remand.

Pandit Sunder Lal, for the appellants.

Munshi Hanuman Prasad and Lala Juala Prasad for the respondent.

BRODHURST and TYRRELL, JJ.—A few facts may be stated in this matter. Two persons, Ram Din and Gulub Kuar, mortgaged certain carriages to one Mata Ghulam, who, on the 12th May, 1886, brought a suit to recover his money and obtained a decree which declared that the carriages in question were charged with the debt and were liable to sale in satisfaction of it. The respondent here is the assignee of that decree from Mata Ghulam. The respondent was himself a decree-holder against the same Ram Din mentioned above for another debt, and in execution of that decree [196] he got one of the carriages sold, and it was bought by persons who transferred it to the present appellants. The respondent in execution of that decree of Mata Ghulam attempted to enforce his charge against one of the carriages, but was defeated by an order of the Court executing the decree made on the 31st July, 1886, and that order has given rise to the present suit which has been brought under the provision of s. 283 of the Civil Procedure Code. The respondent, against whom the order of the 31st July, 1886, was made, has instituted this action to establish the right which he claimed to the carriage in dispute, and he has coupled with this suit a claim for damages in the event of it being found that the defendants have improperly converted the carriage and made it unavailable in satisfaction of his claim.

The Court of first instance held that this action was not maintainable. The lower Appellate Court reversed that finding and remanded the case for decision under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code. There is no doubt that that order was correct in one respect; that there were no materials on the record which would enable the Court of first appeal to determine the case for itself. But in this appeal it is contended by the defendant that the present action is unsustainable, inasmuch as the plaintiff (respondent) has had to take action under s. 352 of the Code, and because Mata Ghulam's decretal debt was scheduled in his favour by the Court exercising insolvency jurisdiction at Allahabad, the insolvent in question being Ram Din, one of the judgment-debtors under Mata Ghulam's decree.

Mr. Sunder Lal has argued with much force that the effect of the respondent scheduling his decretal claim under Mata Ghulam's decree against Ram Din is that Mata Ghulam's decree has been superseded and put out of existence, and that to allow the respondent to maintain the present action would be to put him in the position that, while holding a new decree in supersession of Mata Ghulam's decree, he might obtain another and independent remedy with regard to the same original debt which was the subject of the decree of the 12th May, 1886.

It seems to us that there is more ingenuity than force in this contention. The scheduling of the respondent's claim under s. 352 [197] with reference to Mata Gulam's decree, had not the effect of superseding that decree or of creating another decretal right in addition to it or independent of it, and therefore there does not, out of this circumstance alone, arise any impediment to the maintenance of the present action, which, as we said above, is brought under s. 283 of the Code to establish against persons who are strangers to the decree of the 12th May, 1886, the right which the respondent claims to have in the carriage which was the subject of that decree, but has now passed into the possession and control of strangers to that decree.

It seems to us that the present action is founded upon a new and different cause of action, and being brought against persons who are not parties to Mata Ghulam's decree, there can be no question of the competence of the respondents to maintain his present action. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

A share in a patidari village given by a Hindu proprietor to his wife may become her stridhan, within the contemplation of the Mitakshara, section 11, cl. 1, enabling her to make a valid gift of it.

A transfer from a husband of a share in a village was not formally carried out, otherwise than by its being evidence by mutation of names in the settlement record; and a son, claiming as his father's heir, alleged that his mother's name was only used benami by the father.

Held, that a finding that such mutation was not for the purpose of putting the property into the name of the wife, benami for the husband, but for her own benefit, was substantially correct.

Appeal from a decree (23rd January, 1883) of the High Court reversing a decree (15th July, 1880) of the Subordinate Judge of Aligarh.

The question on this appeal was whether a widow, whose deceased husband had been in his lifetime a lambardar and pat-[198] tidar in the pattidari village of Shahpur Thator, tahsil Iglas, in the Aligarh district, was herself the owner of shares in the village, recorded in her name in the settlement record, or that husband had been, till his death, the actual proprietor, holding them in the name of his wife. He had gradually acquired all the shares in the mouza, which originally consisted of three thokes, and on his application, by petition filed in 1862, all the shares were entered in the name of his wife.

This petition stated that he, Ganesh Singh, in partnership with his wife, Musammat Thakro, was a shareholder of mauza Shahpur Thator, and applied for the striking out of his name as a sharer in that mauza, and the name of Thakro alone should be entered as the proprietor of all the shares, as the administration paper was then being written. Whether the dakhil kharij that followed represented a merely nominal, or an actual, transaction was the question in this suit; which was brought by Ganga Parsad, the son of Ganesh Singh, who died on the 12th October, 1872, leaving Thakro, his widow, by whom he had one son, the said Ganga Parsad, and two daughters. He also left another son Dipchand, by another wife, a minor when this suit was brought. He made a will it was said, five days before his death, leaving all his estate to his sons in equal parts. Upon the assumption that the name of Thakro was entered "ism-farzi" in respect of this mouza, Ganga Parsad, would have had only a moiety. But he claimed to have inherited the whole mouza, alleging that Ganesh Singh had, by effecting mutation of names, as above stated, exempted it from the operation of his will. The plaint stated that Ganesh Singh acquired the whole of the mouza by taking mortgages of shares of other shareholders, and by purchases, partly in his own name, and partly in Thakro's name; and that in 1862 he caused her name to be recorded as owner of the entire property, although the mouza remained in his possession. That after Ganesh's death in 1872, the mouza remained under the plaintiff's management. Also that the deed of gift executed by Thakro on the 6th May, 1878, in favour of her daughters, was false in describing the mouza as her acquired property and stridhan.

The defence insisted on Thakro's having had a beneficial ownership. The defendants' written statement was that Ganesh Singh [199] "had given away his entire share consisting of 679 bighas 2 biswas in the disputed village to his wife Thakro, before the birth of the plaintiff, and put her in proprietary possession. The Musammat herself purchased 636 bighas 13 biswas of the mouza, and thus under two different titles she had been in possession of the entire village for more than 12 years."

On issues framed to question the point, the Subordinate Judge, Saiyed Farid-ud-din Ahmad, Khan Bahadur, found that the whole of the shares were the property of Thakro, and, up to the date of the deed-of-gift by her, had remained in her possession. The first of the three thokes of which the mouza at one time consisted was bought in 1845 in the names of the father and brother respectively of Ganesh Singh, who afterwards obtained dakhil kharij in his own name. The second thoke was let in farm, as a settlement operation, to Ganesh Singh about 1847: and he, in 1848, bought up the rights of the proprietors in his own name. In the same year the rights of other proprietors of shares were bought at auction in the name of Thakro to the extent of 205 bighas 4 biswas. The shares in the third thoke were taken in mortgage in 1847, in the name of Thakro as mortgagee, and afterwards in the same year Ganesh Singh bought up the rights, subject to such mortgage, of seven proprietors, to the extent of 276 bighas 1½ biswas, at a sale in execution of decree. The Subordinate Judge also held that the mouza had become Thakro's stridhan, or separate property, and, as such, was transferable by gift. He also having fixed an issue to this effect, "if the mouza be held to have been owned by Ganesh Singh, is the plaintiff entitled to sue for sole possession thereof, when the other son, Dip Chand, is alive?" Held, on this issue, that the plaintiff could not, consistently with claiming an exclusive title, rely on an exclusive title through Ganesh Singh; inasmuch as the fact, if true, that the mouza remained Ganesh's property till his death, would have brought in Dip Chand as entitled to one-half.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court denying that Thakro had any "exclusive property, or transferable right, in the mouza;" and he again asserted his sole right of inheritance.

The High Court (Straight and Tyrrell, JJ.) held that the plaintiff had made good his appeal "on the ground that the record [200] of his mother's name was of the commonplace ism-farzi character, and that she consequently, and in fact, never had any possession of the property in any way adverse to Ganesh Singh, its owner, or to the plaintiff, who, with his half-brother, Dip Chand, was his heir."

The High Court thereupon decreed that the plaintiff should recover possession of the whole of the property, in which he was declared to be only entitled to a half share, the right of the donee from Thakro being declared null and void, and it being further declared that the decree should not affect the rights and interests of the minor son, Dip Chand.

On this appeal

Mr. J. Graham, Q.C., and Mr. H. Cowell, for the appellants, contended that the beneficial ownership of Thakro had been proved; and that her gift was valid, as having been made of her stridhan. The decree of the High Court was erroneous. Dip Chand's interests, if he had any, could not be protected in the way attempted by the decree, which, on the face of it, showed that the case sought to be made out was an inconsistent one. They relied on prior representations made by the plaintiff himself, and on the evidence generally, as showing that the name of Thakro had not been used merely for that of her husband, but as indicating a real ownership.

Mr. J. D. Mayne, and Mr. J. G. With, for the respondent, relied on the evidence as to the actual management of the land comprised in the shares. This had been throughout in the hands, first of Ganesh Singh and then of his son Ganga Prasad. Thakro had been proprietor in name only; and the judgment of the High Court was right.

The cases referred to on both sides were Nawab Azimut Ali v. Hurdwaree Mull (1) Uman Parshad v. Gandharp Singh (2), Sreeman Chunder Dey v. Gopaul Chunder Chuckerbutty (3), Gopeekrist Gosain v. Gungapersaud Gosain (4).

Counsel for the appellants were not called upon to reply.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by SIR B. PEACOCK.

[201] SIR B. PEACOCK.—This is an appeal by Musammat Thakro and other ladies against Ganga Prasad, the respondent. The appeal is from a decree of the High Court of the North-Western Provinces at Allahabad. The suit was brought by Ganga Prasad against Musammatt Thakro, his mother, and the other ladies, who were the daughters of Musammatt Thakro, in whose favour the mother had executed a deed of conveyance. The plaintiff alleged that his father, Ganesh Singh, "had a large property; that he, on different occasions, by mortgage and private and public purchase, having obtained mauza Shahpur Thator, in his own name, as well as in the name of Musammatt Thakro, plaintiff's mother, himself remained in possession thereof. Subsequently, in 1862 and 1863, the name of the said Musammatt was recorded in respect of the entire property in the said mauza, though the said Ganesh Singh continued in possession of it." He then alleged that on the 12th October, 1872, Ganesh Singh executed a will, and "on the 7th October, 1872, died, and that Musammatt Thakro, plaintiff's mother, continued to live with him (plaintiff), and the village in dispute, like other paternal estates, remained under the management of the plaintiff." Then he proceeded as follows:—"On the 6th May, 1878, the said Musammatt Thakro executed a false deed-of-gift"—by which he meant a deed-of-gift which she had not the power to execute—"of the said mauza in favour of her two daughters, Musammatts Radha and Bhawani, describing the said mauza to be her acquired property and stridhan, and thus effected the plaintiff's dispossession ever since the Musammatt began to live separate, which is the time when the cause of action arose. The village in dispute being the acquired property of the plaintiff's father, who had simply on account of affection caused the name of Musammatt Thakro to be entered, the latter was not, under the Hindu law, competent to transfer the property to her daughters. The plaintiff is in every way entitled to get the property. The plaintiff therefore seeks for the following reliefs: (1) that the plaintiff's right may be declared in respect of the disputed property, and the deed-of-gift executed on the 6th May, 1878, by Musammatt Thakro, defendant, in favour of Musammatts Bhawani and Radha, be declared invalid, void and inoperative, as far as the plaintiff's right is concerned; (2) that both the last-mentioned [202] defendants may be dispossessed of the disputed mauza, and their right as donees declared null and void."

A written statement was put in on behalf of the ladies, and the case being tried by the Subordinate Judge, he raised several issues, the principal one of which was the fourth: "Whether Shahpur, the village in dispute, is wholly or partly the personal property of Ganesh Singh; and he alone remained in possession as long as he lived, and since his death the plaintiff remained in possession thereof till the date of the accrual of the cause of action, and is therefore entitled to possession thereof; or the village in question is wholly or partly the personal property of Musammatt Thakro, the widow of Ganesh Singh, deceased, who has been in possession thereof for more than 12 years, and the defendants are in possession from the date of gift, and the plaintiff's claim is therefore barred by lapse of time and he has no right in the property in dispute." Upon that the Subordinate Judge says:—"Just as the defendants have not proved their assertion, so the plaintiff also has not proved that Ganesh Singh fictitiously transferred that amount of land of the village of Shahpur Thator which was in his name to Musammatt Thakro." The question really was whether, when the mutation of names was made from the name of Ganesh into the name of his wife, it was his intention to transfer the property into the name of his wife benami for him. The Subordinate Judge upon this point says:—"In short, a careful consideration of all the oral and documentary evidence and presumptions and probabilities clearly leads the Court to infer that the whole of the village in dispute is the property of Musammat Thakro, and is not the estate left by Ganesh Singh, and that up to the date of the deed-of-gift in question it remained in her possession." The Subordinate Judge therefore found in substance that the mutation of names in 1862 was not for the purpose of putting the property into the name of the wife benami for the husband, but for her own benefit.

Upon appeal to the High Court that Court came to a different conclusion. They held that the property was put by the husband, into the name of the wife to hold it benami for him, and that consequently the property remained the property of the husband, and [203] that the wife had no power to assign it to her two daughters although it stood in her name.

A considerable part of this property, as shown by the Subordinate Judge in his judgment, was purchased in the name of Ganesh, the husband, and certain other parts in the name of the wife. The wife gave evidence that that portion of the property which was purchased in her name was purchased for her benefit and with her own money. It is unnecessary to decide whether the part of the property which was purchased in the name of the wife was purchased with her money or with that of her husband, because even if the property which was purchased in the name of the wife was the property of the husband as well as that which was purchased in his own name, the question still remains whether, when the husband allowed the mutation of names from his name into the name of his wife, he intended that mutation to operate for his own benefit or for hers.

The wife in her evidence in the cause stated that in the year 1847, when the husband was about to marry a second wife, that portion of the property which had been purchased in the name of the husband was made over to her in consideration of his being about to marry a second wife. and that afterwards the other portions of the property were bought in her name, so as to make the whole her property.

In the Mitakshara, section 11, clause 1, speaking of the nature of stridhan, it is thus stated: "What was given to a woman by the father, the mother, the husband, or a brother, or received by her at the nuptial fire, or presented to her on her husband's marriage to another wife, as also any other separate acquisition, is denominated a woman's property." It is not unusual for a husband, upon his being about to marry a second wife, to make a present to his first wife, and if he does so the property so presented becomes her stridhan according to the doctrine above laid down. The wife says that in the year 1847, when the husband was about to marry a second wife, he did make her a present of the property which had been purchased in his own name. Although the High Court has found that there was no actual proof of that fact, it is not improbable that the husband, when about to marry a second wife, should have stated to his first [204] wife that he would appropriate that part of the property which he had purchased in his own name as a present to her in consideration of his being about to marry the second wife. The statement of the wife is corroborated by the fact that in the year 1862 he caused the property to be changed from his own name into that of his wife. On the 4th March, 1862, he says:—"In partnership with my wife, Musammat Thakro, I am the lambardar and a shareholder of mauza Shahpur Bhatai, pargana Gori. Now, of my own free will, I pray that my name as sharer in the said mauza be expunged, and that of the said Musammat alone be entered as proprietor of both the shares, as the village administration paper is being written now. I have no longer any claim." If when he was about to marry the second wife he told his first wife that he would make her a present of the property and did not carry out the gift by an actual deed, and in 1862 caused a mutation of names declaring that he had then no longer any claim to the property, that would not show that he was causing the mutation in order that the wife might hold it benami for him. There was a complete mutation of names from the husband of all that he possessed in the village of Shahpur into the name of the wife. The subsequent purchases were made in the name of the wife. If he intended the subsequent purchases, though made with his own money, to be made in the name of his wife, the probability is that he intended the whole of Shahpur to be vested in her as her stridhan. The plaintiff claims it as his own property. It is to be remarked that by the second wife his father had another son, Dip Chand. If the property had been transferred in 1862 into the name of Thakro, benami for the father, it would have remained the father's property, and being the father's property would have descended to his two sons. But the plaintiff does not claim it as being the property of the two sons. He claims it as his own property, and as having been put into his mother's name in order that he might become entitled to the benefit of it; not that it was put into his mother's name in order that it might be held by the mother benami for the benefit of the father.

Several documents were put in. There is a copy of a petition by Ganga Parsad against Musammatt Thakro, his mother, and Musammatts Radha, and Bhawani, his sisters." That was dated in [205] 1878, after the mother had executed the conveyance in favour of her daughters. In paragraph 3 he says:—"The appellant's father caused the name of Musammatt Thakro, mother of the appellant, to be entered in respect of the property through some policy. The name of the appellant's mother was entered simply with a view that the children born of the other wife of the appellant's father might not get a share in this property, and that the appellant alone might get it." The father, when he made this transfer of Shahpur into the name of the mother, did not appear to have had any creditors or any particular reason for putting this portion of his property into the name of the mother instead of allowing it to remain in his own name, unless it was for the purpose of giving the mother a benefit. If he had intended to put the property into the hands of the mother in order to conceal it from his creditors, and to make it appear that it was his wife's property instead of his own, the probability is that he would have done the same with regard to his other property, and not only in respect of this particular village.

The representation on the part of the plaintiff shows that whatever the object of his father in making the mutation was, it was not to put the property into the hands of the mother to hold it benami for the father. If he had put it into her hands with that object, the two sons would have become entitled to it; but the case of the plaintiff is that the object of the father in putting it into the name of the mother was that the issue of the second wife should have no share in it.

Further, a petition of guardianship was put in evidence. It was an application by Ganga Parsad, the plaintiff. He there says:—"My father, Ganesh Singh, died in October, 1872, leaving two sons, i. e., myself and Dip Chand, a minor"—that is, the son of the second wife—"who is now 2½ years old, as his heirs, and we two sons of the deceased are owners in equal shares of the property left by him." If the property remained the — causing it to be believed that Shahpur, which was held, as he alleged, by 10 A. 197 his mother for the benefit of his father, was not the property of his father,

15 I.A. 29= or he must have believed at the time that the property was put into the
5 Sar. P.C.J. hands of the mother, not benami for the father, but for some other purpose.
138. He afterwards filed a list of the property left by his father, in which Shahpur is excluded, which shows that there was no mistake in the omission of Shahpur. In both these documents Shahpur is excluded as property left by the father, which if left by the father would have belonged to himself and his brother. In his evidence, he says:—"I know and consider Shahpur Bhatai to be my own share and not that of Dip Chand."
 In the face of these statements he cannot now contend that the property was held by his mother benami for his father. He contended at one time that the property was put into his mother's name benami for himself. If that were so, it was for him to prove the fact, which he was unable to do.

Looking at the conduct of the plaintiff and at the representations which he made, which would have been grossly fraudulent if the property had been in the mother's name benami for the father, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the case of the plaintiff is not made out, viz., that the property was put into the hands of the mother benami for the father. Their Lordships do not believe that it was put into the hands of the mother for the purpose of giving the plaintiff the sole interest in the property, or that it was put into the hands of the mother benami for the father.

Under these circumstances their Lordships think that the High Court came to an erroneous conclusion in reversing the judgment of the Subordinate Judge upon the fourth issue, in which he found, upon the evidence and upon the statements of the plaintiff, that the property was the property of Thakro and not the property of the plaintiff. The plaintiff even in his plaint does not state that the property was that of himself and Dip Chand, but claimed it as his own property. Dip Chand was no party to the suit, as he ought to have been if the property was that of the father.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the decree of the High Court be reversed and the decree of [207] the Subordinate Judge affirmed, and that the respondent be ordered to pay the costs of the appeal to the High Court. The respondent must also pay the costs of this appeal.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. MARU AND ANOTHER. [16th January, 1888.]

Evidence—Witnesses—Competency of persons of tender years—Act I of 1872 (Evidence Act), s. 118—Judicial oath or affirmation—Act X of 1873 (Oaths Act) ss. 6, 13—Omission to take evidence on oath or affirmation.

S. 6 of the Oaths Act (X of 1873) imperatively requires that no person shall testify as a witness except on oath or affirmation; and, notwithstanding s. 13 of the same Act, the evidence of a child of eight or nine years of age is inadmissible if it has been advisedly recorded without any oath or affirmation. The Queen v. Sewa Bhogta (1) dissented from.

The facts of this case are stated in the judgment of the Court.

The appellant was not represented.

The Public Prosecutor (Mr. G. E. A. Ross) for the Crown.

MAHMOOD, J.—In this case the two prisoners, Maru and Fatteh, were tried together and both have been convicted. The prisoner Maru has been convicted under s. 363 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment, and the other prisoner, Fatteh, has been convicted under s. 368 read with s. 363 of the Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment.

Both prisoners have appealed. So far as Maru is concerned I have arrived at the same conclusions on the evidence as the assessors and the learned Sessions Judge. The substantive offence charged against Maru was that of kidnapping within the meaning of s. 363 [208] of the Penal Code, and the person kidnapped was a girl, Musammatt Tbakuri, whose father has stated her age to be about nine years. She was examined as a witness for the prosecution, but without any oath or solemn affirmation, and this circumstance has furnished one of the difficulties in the case. Speaking of her the learned Judge remarks:—"She is of tender years and does not understand the obligations of an oath, but was cautioned to speak the truth, and is a competent witness as far as intelligence is concerned."

Again, with reference to the prisoner, appellant Fatteh, the learned Judge goes on to say:—

"As regards Fatteh, two of the assessors think the charge proved, the third does not. The case depends entirely and solely on the evidence of the little girl. Two of the assessors believe it; think it impossible she can have been tutored: third does not believe it."

Again, the learned Judge goes on to say:—

"Why Fatteh should assist Maru in the concealment is not clear and has formed the chief stumbling-block to the third assessor; but Maru is an old Raipur man and has dealings admittedly with Fatteh. Moreover, if I have not been much mistaken in my observation, Fatteh has from behind his clasped hands held in front of his face been whispering advice to Maru all through the case as to what answer he should give and what questions put. I agree, therefore, with the assessors in convicting Fatteh.

The conclusions at which the learned Judge arrived are stated in the following paragraph of his judgment:—

"Maru's intent in kidnapping is not shown or Fatteh's in concealment. At the best I am willing to credit it to Maru that he only wished to annoy and distress Ami Chand and perhaps merely extort some advantage from him—such as cattle-lifters in these parts steal cattle—and that Fatteh was abetting him in this. Without exacting anything, the child was restored in a few days, under the influence of fear of prosecution, in so great harm done." (sic.)

So far as the case of Maru is concerned, the evidence of the girl Thakuri is of no great consequence, as the rest of the evidence is in itself sufficient to warrant his conviction. But the case [209] against the prisoner, appellant Fatteh, rests entirely upon the testimony of the girl Thakuri; and it thus becomes important to consider whether her statement is to be accepted as evidence in this case, and if so, whether it is sufficiently trustworthy to warrant the conviction.

The former of these questions depends entirely upon the law relating to the competency of witnesses and to the obligation of oaths or solemn affirmations to be made by them in judicial proceedings.

First, then, as to the competency of Musammat Thakuri to be a witness. It is important to observe that upon the findings of the learned Sessions Judge, her age must be taken to be eight or nine years, and she must be held to have not attained such maturity of mind as would enable her to realize the solemnity or obligation of an oath or affirmation.

So far as the simple question of age is concerned, I have no doubt that Musammat Thakuri could be called as a witness. Whatever the rule of law or the practice of the Courts may have been antecedent to the year 1855, the Legislature in passing the Evidence Act (II of 1855) of that year laid down a definite rule in s. 14 (clause 1) of that enactment, the effect of which is to declare the incompetency to testify of "children under seven years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the fact respecting which they are examined or of relating them truly." The law, however, as it now stands, contains a more comprehensive rule in s. 118 of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872) for which we are indebted to the labours of an eminent jurist, Sir James Stephen, now one of Her Majesty's Judges in England. The section lays down the rule that "all persons shall be competent to testify, unless the Court considers that they are prevented from understanding the questions put to them or from giving natural answers to those questions by tender years, extreme old age, disease whether of body or mind, or any other cause of the same kind."

The tender age of Musammat Thakuri would not therefore, ipso facto, render her incompetent to appear as a witness to give testimony. Indeed, the effect of our law seems to me to be the same [210] as the rule of the English Law of Evidence on this particular point, and that rule is nowhere stated better than in s. 1377 of Taylor's Work on Evidence (Vol. II, p. 1170, 8th ed.), where it is stated:—"With respect to children no precise age is fixed by law within which they are absolutely excluded from giving evidence on the presumption that they have not sufficient understanding. Neither can any precise rule be laid down respecting the degree of intelligence and knowledge which will render a child a competent witness. In all questions of this kind much must ever depend upon the good sense and discretion of the Judge; who will do well in remembering the wise rule promulgated by the Indian Evidence Act of 1855, that 'children under seven years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts' to be deposed to 'or of relating them truly,' ought not to be examined. In practice it is not unusual to receive the testimony of children of eight or nine years of age when they appear to possess sufficient understanding; and in Brasier's case (1), which was an indictment for assaulting with intent to rape an infant who was certainly under seven years of age, and perhaps only five, all the Judges held that she might have been examined upon oath if on strict examination by the Court she had been found to comprehend the danger and impiety of falsehood. But in Pike's case (2) Mr. Justice Park, with the concurrence of Mr. Justice James Parke, promptly rejected the dying declarations of a child of four years of age, observing that however precocious her mind might have been, it was quite impossible that she could have had sufficient understanding to render her declarations admissible."

I must, however, at the risk of prolixity, read another passage from another celebrated work of English law—Roscoe's Criminal Evidence (pp. 115-16, 10th ed.)—as much that is contained in that passage will conveniently bring me to the next point as to the legal admissibility of Mussamat Thakuri's evidence in this case. The passage runs as follows:—

"It is said by Gilbert, C. B., that infants under the age of fourteen are not regularly admissible as witnesses, though there is no time fixed wherein they are to be excluded from evidence, [211] but that the reason and sense of their evidence are to appear from the questions propounded to them and their answers. Gilb. Ev., 144. At one time their age was considered as the criterion of their competency, and it was a general rule that none could be admitted under the age of nine years, very few under ten: R. v. Traver, 2 Str. 700; 1 Hale, P. C. 302; 2 Hale, P. C. 278; 1 Phill. Ev., 10th ed., 8. But of late years no particular age is required in practice to render the evidence of a child admissible. A more reasonable rule has been adopted and the competency of children is now regulated not by their age, but by the degree of understanding which they appear to possess. 1 Phill. Ev. 4, 10th ed., 8. In R. v. Brazier, 1 East P. C., 443, 1 Leach 199, S. C. Blackstone, Nares, Eyre, and Buller, JJ., were of opinion that the evidence of a child five years of age would have been admissible if she had appeared on examination to be capable of distinguishing between good and evil. But others of the Judges, particularly Gould and Willes, JJ., held that the presumption of law of want of discretion under seven was conclusive. Subsequently all the Judges agreed that a child of any age, if capable of distinguishing between good and evil, might be examined upon oath, and that a child of whatever age could not be examined unless sworn. This is now the established rule in all cases, civil as well as criminal, and whether the prisoner is tried for a capital offence or one of an inferior nature. According to this rule the admissibility of children depends not merely upon their possessing a competent degree of understanding, but also in part upon their having received a certain share of religious instruction. A child whose intellect appears to be in other respects sufficient to enable it to give useful evidence, may from defect of religious instruction be wholly unable to give any account of the nature of an oath or of the consequences of falsehood (1) Phill. Ev. 9, 10th ed.) In a recent case of trial for murder, where it appeared that a girl eight years old up to the time of the deceased's death was totally ignorant of religion, but subsequently she had received some instruction as to the nature and obligation of an oath, but at the trial seemed to have no real understanding on the subject of religion or a future state, Patterson, J., would not allow her to be sworn, observing: "I must be satisfied that this child feels the binding obligation of an oath from the [212] general course of her religious education. The effect of the oath, upon the conscience of the child should arise from religious feelings of a permanent nature, and not merely from instructions confined to the nature of an oath recently communicated to her for the purposes of this trial; and as it appears that previous to the happening of the circumstances to which this witness comes to speak she had had no religious education whatever and had never heard of a future state, and now has no real understanding on the subject, I think that I must reject her testimony. R. v. Williams. (1) Mr. Pitt Taylor observes upon this case—Ev. 1077, 2nd ed.—Perhaps the language which the learned Judge is reported to have used was somewhat stronger than the law warranted, and it certainly went further than the facts required, as the child even when offered as a witness had no real knowledge of the nature of an oath. Had not this been the case, it seems difficult to understand upon what valid ground her testimony could have been rejected; for whether she was instructed in religious knowledge previously or subsequently to the commission of the crime in question, or whether the instruction was intended to excite permanent feelings or merely to secure the temporary purpose of enabling her to swear to the facts she had witnessed, can signify nothing, provided that at the time when she was called upon to give her evidence she was really aware of the solemn responsibility which devolved upon her of speaking the truth. Accordingly in Ireland it has been held that, even on an indictment for murder, an infant might be examined though her religious knowledge had been communicated to her after the perpetration of the offence, and with the sole object of rendering her a competent witness." R. v. Milton (2) (Ir. Cr. Rep. 61) per Doherty, C. J. In R. v. Nicholas (3) (2 C. and K. 246) Pollock, C. B., refused to put off the trial in order that a child of six years old might receive instruction, but said that he thought there were cases in which such an application might be entertained; and that the Judge should act according to his discretion."

Such, then, being the rules of English law, I have to consider how far our law renders an oath or solemn affirmation a condition [213] precedent to the admissibility of the testimony of a witness. And in order to consider the question I intend to go into the history of legislation in British India on the subject. But before doing so, it is somewhat important to bear clearly in mind what an oath or solemn affirmation really means or implies. In Taylor's Work (s. 1382, p. 1175, 8th ed.) "oath" is defined on the authority of R. v. White (1 Lea. 403) and the Queen's Case (2 B. and B. 185) to be "a religious asseveration by which a person renounces the mercy and imprecates the vengeance of Heaven if he does not speak the truth." And the learned author, with reference to this definition, goes on to say that it "may be open to comment, since the design of the oath is not to call the attention of God to man, but the attention of man to God; not to call upon Him to punish the wrong-doer, but on the witness to remember that He will assuredly do so; still, it must be admitted that by thus laying hold of the conscience of the witness the law best insures the utterance of truth."

(1) Ev. 1077, 2nd ed.(2) Ir. Cr. Rep. 61.

(3) 2 C. and K. 246.

But a much more complete definition of oath is given by Bentham (who has been rightly denominated as the father of English jurisprudence). At p. 191 of vol. 5 of his Works he says:—

"By the term oath, taken in its largest sense, is universally understood a ceremony composed of words and gestures, by which the Almighty is engaged eventually to inflict on the taker of the oath, or swearer, as he is called, punishment in quantity and quality, liquidated, or more commonly unliquidated, in the event of his doing something which he, the swearer, at the same time and thereby engages not to do or omitting to do something which he in like manner engages to do. Correlative to the term oath is the term perjury, and it conjugates to perjure, oneself, perjured, perjurious; among which perjury is understood as designation of the conduct, whether positive or negative, which stands in opposition to the conduct engaged for, as above." And the same thinker in considering the efficiency of an oath goes on to say (p. 195):—

"When the question has been concerning a Muhammadan, a Hindu, a Chinese, or even a Christian, if a Catholic, great doubts have been entertained by pious and learned Church of England [214] men—lawyers and non-lawyers—concerning the degree of binding force, which in any such heterodox bosom ought to be ascribed to the ceremony of an oath." The doubts to which this passage refers have, however, been set at rest by the leading case of Omichund v. Barker (1), where the Lord Chancellor and three other Judges concurred in laying down the rule that the depositions of witnesses professing the Gentoo (Hindu) religion who were sworn according to the ceremonies of their religion, taken under a commission out of Chancery, could be admitted and read as evidence.

In stating the history of the law in British India relating to oaths and solemn affirmations, I do not think it is necessary to go behind Act V of 1840, beyond saying that probably in consequence of the practice adopted by Muhammadan Judges before the advent of the British rule, certain old Regulations passed by the Government of the East India Company required that Muhammadans were to be sworn on the Koran and the Hindus on the Ganges water. So stood the law when Act V of 1840 was passed, and the only provisions of the Act which I wish to refer to are contained in the first section of that enactment. That section runs as follows:—

"Whereas obstruction to justice and other inconveniences have arisen in consequence of persons of the Hindu or Muhammadan persuasion being compelled to swear by the water of the Ganges, or upon the Koran, or according to other forms which are repugnant to their consciences or feelings:

"It is hereby enacted, that except as hereinafter provided, instead of any oath or declaration now authorised or required by law, every individual of the classes aforesaid within the territories of the East India Company shall make an affirmation to the following effect:—

"I solemnly affirm, in the presence of Almighty God, that what I shall state shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

The effect of this alteration of the law was of a very significant character, with reference to the means and guarantees which Courts of justice had for ascertaining the truth from the evidence of native [215] witnesses.

It is not for me, sitting here as a Judge, to consider questions of political import; but I think that it is within my province to say that, so far as the administration of oaths furnishes a guarantee for truth, the provisions of Act V of 1840 were of such a sweeping character as, in the case of most witnesses, rendered that guarantee totally ineffective. For either there is a use in an oath or a solemn affirmation, or there is no such use; and what is the use of an oath or affirmation which is not binding upon the conscience of native witnesses, whether Hindu or Muhammadan? My own past experience both as a member of the Bar and as a Judge of the Courts of first instance warrants my saying that in the vast majority of cases the solemn affirmation introduced by Act V of 1840 in lieu of the older form of oath is not treated or felt by native witnesses as binding upon their conscience. And in view of this circumstance it is a question of great importance how far our law of perjury in the apportionment of punishment should be applied to cases in which a native witness, to whom no such oath as is binding upon his conscience has been administered, has not spoken the truth after the solemn affirmation provided by the law, and which affirmation he feels not binding upon his conscience. I am aware of the reasons which induced a philosophical jurist of the eminence of Jeremy Bentham to object to the whole theory of administering oaths, but with all the veneration and respect which I entertain for him, I, whilst not prepared to dissent from his views in the abstract, cannot help feeling that the sweeping alteration of the law by Act V of 1840 went too far with reference to the religious and social conditions of India, and that the desired results could have been probably achieved without abolishing the old forms of oaths altogether in the case of Hindus and Muhammedans. And it is with due respects for the wisdom of the Legislature that I say that the Act V of 1840 seems to proceed upon the theory of taking exceptional cases as the basis of that legislative measure, and that it does not seem to have taken into account the effect of the change on the vast majority of native witnesses.

It is, however, now perhaps too late to re-open the question; and because judicis est jus dicere non dare, I must proceed with the history of legislation in British India upon this subject. We find, then, the provisions of Act V of 1840 were extended by s. 9 of Act [216] XVIII of 1863 to the High Courts also, and the law stood so in 1872 when Act VI of 1872 was passed. The effect of that Act can best be represented in the words of Lord Hobhouse, who was then the Legal Member of the Viceroy's Legislative Council and is now one of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council. Referring to Act VI of 1872 he went on to say:—

“That Act introduced two very important alterations. One was this, that every witness who objected to take an oath might, instead, make a simple affirmation; and the other was that, notwithstanding any irregularity in the administration of any oath, or any irregularity in the making of an affirmation, or, in fact, any irregularity in the former method of taking evidence, the proceedings should be valid. Another alteration was introduced, probably of less importance, because Mr. Hobhouse imagined it applied only to a few cases. Act V of 1840, which was the Act that prohibited the administration of oaths to Hindu and Muhammadans, was modified in this way: it was provided that, if a witness was willing to take an oath in a form peculiarly binding upon his own conscience, it should be competent to the Court to administer such an oath. That was the present state of the law. The general rule, if anything could be called general which excepted Hindus and Muhammadans, remained the same as before. With regard to Hindus and Muhammadans, it was forbidden to administer oaths to them, except in those special cases in which witness himself was willing to take an oath; and it was provided that irregularity should not affect the validity of the proceeding."

Then came the present Indian Oaths Act (X of 1873) with which I am immediately concerned in this case. That Act by s. 6 maintained the solemn affirmation which had been substituted for oath by its predecessors, Act V of 1840 and Act VI of 1872, so far as Hindu or Muhammadan witnesses were concerned. The section provides that "where the witness, interpreter, or juror is a Hindu or Muhammadan, or has an objection to making an oath, he shall, instead of making an oath make an affirmation;" and that "in every other case the witness, interpreter or juror shall make an oath." S. 13 of the enactment in reproducing the [217] provisions of s. 5 of Act VI of 1872 enunciates the following rule:—

"No omission to take any oath or make any affirmation, no substitution of any one for any other of them, and no irregularity whatever in the form in which any one of them is administered, shall invalidate any proceeding or render inadmissible any evidence whatever, in or in respect of which such omission, substitution or irregularity took place, or shall affect the obligation of a witness to state the truth."

The law stood thus, as indeed it stands now, when the case of The Queen v. Anunto Chuckerbutty (1) came before a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court, and in that case the learned Judges (Kemp and Birch) held that s. 13 of Act X of 1873 does not render the evidence of a child of nine years of age inadmissible, if the evidence has been advisedly, and not by an omission, recorded without any oath or affirmation. A similar question arose in the case of The Queen v. Sewa Bhogta (2), in which a Full Bench of the same Court, consisting of Couch, C.J., and Kemp, Jackson, Phear and Markby, JJ., were concerned, and in which the Bench, with the exception of Jackson, J., laid down the rule that the word "omission" in s. 13 of Act X of 1873 includes any omission and is not limited to accidental or negligent omissions. Both these cases have been relied upon before me by the learned Public Prosecutor on behalf of the Crown, and I have no doubt that they support the case for the prosecution so far as the admissibility of the evidence of the girl Musammat Thakuri is concerned.

But these rulings have been to me the main reason for having considered this question at such length. The broad question is whether in the case of a witness who by reason of tender age and by want of previous instruction has no conception of the obligations of an oath or solemn affirmation, whether with respect to the future life or as to the punishment for perjury, can give legal testimony in a judicial proceeding for purposes of adjudication. This question I shall consider now, because it is on the determination of this question that the case for the prosecution against the prisoner-appellant Fattah almost entirely depends.

[218] The practice of the English Court is well stated in Roscoe's Criminal Evidence (p. 116):—

"Where a case depends on the testimony of an infant, it is usual for the Court to examine him as to his competency to take an oath previously to his going before the grand jury, and if found incompetent for want of proper instruction, the Court will, in its discretion, put off the trial in order that the party may, in the meantime, receive such instruction as may qualify him to take an oath. (Stark. Ev. 94, 2nd ed.) This was done by Rooke, J., in the case of an indictment for a rape, and approved of by all the Judges: 1 Leach, 430 (n); 2nd Bac. Ab. by Gwill, 577 (n). An application to postpone the trial upon this ground ought properly to be made before the child is examined by the grand jury, at all events before the trial has commenced, for if the jury are sworn, and the prisoner is put upon his trial before the incompetency of the witness is discovered, the Judge ought not to discharge the jury upon this ground: 1 Phill. Ev. 19, 10th ed., citing R. v. Wade, post, tit, Practice. There the witness was an adult, but the principle seems to apply equally to the case of a child. If a child is from want of understanding incapable of giving evidence upon oath, proof of its declaration is inadmissible: R. v. Tucker, 1808, M. S.; 1 Phill. Ev. (10), 10th ed., Anon, Lord Raym cited 1 Atk. 29."

So far as the Indian Courts are concerned, the earliest trace of the practice appears from a circular order of the late Nizam Adalat, No. I, dated 1st February, 1828, which has been published at p. 28 of Skipwith's Magistrate's Guide. The circular runs as follows:—

"Any children who may not appear to have a sufficient sense of the nature and obligation of an oath shall not be examined at all in any criminal trial; their depositions may, however, be taken in preliminary enquiries and be placed among the records of the office in which they may be taken, not as evidence in themselves, but to be used as a clue to evidence."

It does not appear how this provision could have had the force of law, but we find that the Legislature in passing Act II of 1855 made the following provision in s. 15 of that enactment:—

"Any person who, by reason of immature age or want of religious belief, or who, by reason of defect or religious belief, ought not, [219] in the opinion of such Courts or persons, to be admitted to give evidence on oath or solemn affirmation, shall be admitted to give evidence on a simple affirmation, declaring that he will speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

No provisions to this particular effect as to the immature age of the witness with reference to the conception of the obligation of an oath or solemn affirmation appear to have been reproduced either in the Oaths Act (VI of 1872) or in the present Oaths Act (X of 1873), and if there exists any definite legislative provision on the subject, it must be devolved out of s. 118 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872) or s. 13 of the Oaths Act (X of 1873).

The question then is, what is the effect of these provisions of the law? In other words, does the law dispense with oath or solemn affirmation in the case of witnesses who, by reason of tender age and want of instruction, are totally incompetent either to comprehend the spiritual obligations of an oath or the temporal punishment awarded by the law in the cases of perjury?

To this question, as I have already said, the answer of the Calcutta Court is that omission to administer an oath or solemn affirmation does not vitiate the evidence of the witness, even though such oath or solemn affirmation was deliberately omitted, and omitted not by accident or negligence, but because of the immature understanding of the witness for comprehending the solemnity of the oath or solemn affirmation.

It seems to me, with profound deference to the majority of the Calcutta Full Bench in the Queen v. Sewa Bhogta (1), that the rule therein laid down has the effect of virtually abolishing the whole of the principle of oaths and solemn affirmations as guarantees for securing true statements by witnesses. Indeed, such was the view taken in that case by an eminent Judge, Sir L. Jackson, who, in dissenting from the opinion of the majority of the Court, went on to say :—

“It seems to me that, in framing the 13th section of the Oaths Act, it was intended to obviate the effect of any evasion on the part of witnesses or mistake on the part of officers of the Court, and not to give a power to Judges or Magistrates to render the [220] whole Act as it were ineffectual by perversely or erroneously ordering that witnesses should not take an oath or affirmation.”

This is exactly the view which I hold in this case with reference to the statement made in the witness-box by the girl Mussammat Thakur, to whom neither an oath nor a solemn affirmation was administered, and deliberately not administered because the learned Judge found that she had not attained sufficient maturity to comprehend either the spiritual or temporal consequences or obligations of making a true statement in the witness-box. The question, then, is whether the girl's evidence is admissible in law for the purposes of this case. To use the words of Sir L. Jackson, “it seems to me, therefore, that the Judge in this case having been directed by law to examine the witness in question upon affirmation, and having determined that he would not administer such affirmation, the witness has been examined contrary to law, and the evidence is inadmissible.” Whether oaths or solemn affirmations have any intrinsic utility is a question which it would be out of place to discuss here. All I need say is that the Indian Legislature has never yet accepted the entire theories of Jeremy Bentham on this point, and that to this day oaths and solemn affirmations are regarded by our law as guarantees against perjury ; in other words, as a means of securing ascertainment of truth. Nor is the case different in England, because even there encroachments upon the maxim in judicio non creditur nisi juratis have not gone so far as to dispense with the sanction of an oath or solemn affirmation. To illustrate this I will only read a passage from Taylor on Evidence, s. 1380 (8th ed.): “Again, though a Peer is privileged, while sitting in judgment, to give his verdict upon his honour and was also permitted, under the old law, to answer a bill in Chancery upon his protestation of honour, and not upon his oath, he cannot be examined as a witness in any cause, whether civil or criminal, or in any Court of justice, whether it be an inferior Court or the House of Lords, or in any manner, whether viva voce, or by interrogatories, or by affidavit, unless he be first sworn ; for the respect which the law shows to the honour of a Peer, does not extend so far as to overturn the settled maxim, that in judicio non creditur nisi juratis. If, therefore, he refuses to take the necessary oath or affirmation, he will, notwithstanding the privi- [221] leges of peerage or of Parliament, be guilty of a contempt, for which he may be committed and fined.”

The history of the Indian legislation, as already stated by me, does not warrant the conclusion that the Legislature intended to make a radical departure in this respect. Indeed, the broad conclusions which I draw from the various changes which the Indian statute law has undergone on the subject are :—

- First*—that whilst the limit of age as to the competency of witnesses was removed, the general principle that they should be competent to give "rational answers" to questions was affirmed; as shown by s. 118 of the present Evidence Act (I of 1872);
- Secondly*—that the necessity of oaths or solemn affirmations was maintained and imperatively required, as shown by s. 6 of the Indian Oaths Act (X of 1873);
- Thirdly*—that omissions or irregularities in the administration of oaths or solemn affirmations were to be overlooked in certain cases contemplated by s. 13 of the Indian Oaths Act (X of 1873).
- Adopting the opinion, as I have done, of Sir L. Jackson, I cannot but hold that the statements made by Mussammat Thakuri in the witness-box were not admissible as evidence. The words of s. 6 of the Oaths Act (X of 1873) seem to me to be not merely directory but imperative, and I hold this view because the object of the statute naturally aims at security of justice and guarantees as to the liberty of the subject. I believe that this is the manner in which statutes of this description are interpreted by Courts of Justice in England. To say, then, that the object of s. 13 of the Oaths Act (X of 1873) was to practically nullify the whole of the enactment itself is a proposition which, with profound respect for the majority of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court, I find myself unable to accept. And my difficulty in endeavouring to accept that proposition is in no small degree enhanced by the fact that the very next clause of that same statute, viz., s. 14, provides that "every person giving evidence on any subject before any Court or person hereby authorized to administer oaths and affirmations shall be bound to state the truth on such subject;" and whilst s. 191 of the Indian Penal Code provides that "whoever [222] being legally bound on an oath or by any express provision of law to state the truth, or being bound by law to make a declaration upon any subject, makes any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false, or does not believe to be true, is said to give false evidence," s. 193 of the same enactment provides a punishment of seven years' imprisonment. How a person who by reason of tender years is unable to comprehend either the spiritual or the legal obligations of an oath or solemn affirmation can be regarded as competent to give evidence legally admissible, and to be understood to be liable to such penalties under the law, is a matter the reasons wherefor I find myself unable to conceive. Yet such is the practical effect of the ruling of the majority of the Court in the Calcutta Full Bench case; and with all the respect which I feel is due to such an authority, I cannot help feeling that if the principles of oaths and solemn affirmations were intended to be repudiated by the Legislature, the simplest course would have been, not to have passed a statute such as the Indian Oaths Act (X of 1873), but to have simply repealed the earlier enactments which required oaths or affirmations as a condition precedent to admissibility of the evidence of witnesses in judicial proceedings.
- In the case now before me the case against the prisoner-appellant Fattah depends entirely, as the learned Sessions Judge points out, upon the evidence of the girl Mussammat Thakuri, to whom neither an oath nor a solemn affirmation was administered, for the simple reason that she had not attained sufficiently mature intelligence to comprehend the spiritual sanctity or legal obligations of an oath or solemn affirmation.
- Holding this view of the law as to the inadmissibility of Mussammat Thakuri's evidence, it is not necessary for me to say what degree of credit I would attach to her statement as a matter of weighing the evidence in the circumstances of this case. I need only repeat what has been said by Blackstone in his Commentaries on the English Law, that "where the evidence of children is admitted, it is much to be wished, in order to render it credible, that there should be some concurrent testimony of time, place, and circumstances, in order to make out the fact, and that the conviction should not be grounded solely on the unsupported [223] testimony of an infant under years of discretion." And because in this case the evidence against the prisoner-appellant Fattah is inadmissible in law, I hold that the prosecution has failed to make out the case against him. I therefore decree his appeal, and, setting aside the conviction and sentence passed upon him, direct that he be released.

As to the prisoner appellant Maru, I have already said enough to indicate that there is sufficient evidence, irrespective of the statements of the girl Musammatt Thakuri, to warrant his conviction. The provisions of s. 167 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872) therefore apply to his case, and I dismiss his appeal and confirm the conviction and sentence passed upon him.

(Plaintiff)* [23rd January 1888.]

Civil Procedure Code, ss. 32, 365, 366, 367, 368, 582, 587—Death of plaintiff-respondent pending appeal—Substitution of alleged legal representative on her own application—Application by defendants-appellants to substitute another person as true legal representative—Power of Court to determine which of such persons is the true legal representative.

In a suit for declaration of title to, and for possession of, a share in alleged ancestral property with mesne profits, the plaintiff obtained a decree in the lower appellate Court from which the defendants appealed to the High Court. Pending the appeal, the plaintiff died childless, and, on her application, his widow was substituted for him as respondent. Subsequently the defendants-appellants applied to the High Court to have the deceased's father brought upon the record as respondent, alleging that he, and not the widow, was the deceased's legal representative and solely entitled to be placed on the record as such. The father made no objection to the proposed substitution. It was common ground that either the father alone or the widow alone was the deceased plaintiff-respondent's true legal representative.

Held by the Full Bench (MAHMOOD, J., dissenting) that, having regard to the words "as nearly as may be" and "as far as may be" in s. 582 of the Civil Procedure Code, ss. 365, 366 and 367 might be applied, at all events analogically, to the case so as to enable the real legal representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent to be ascertained and brought upon the record; that the latter portion of s. 582 did not limit the [224] earlier words of the section so as to make s. 368 the only provision applicable to the case; that the Court of record must have an inherent power to ascertain whether or not it has before it the proper parties to an appeal if the question be substantially raised; and that, therefore, the Court could and should, either before or at the hearing of the appeal, ascertain and determine for the purposes of the prosecution of the appeal the preliminary question whether the father or the widow was the legal representative of the deceased, and should act accordingly.

Held also by the Full Bench (MAHMOOD, J., dissenting) that s. 32 of the Code did not apply to the case, and that if it did apply, it would be the duty of the Court to decide whether the father or the widow was the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent.

Held by MAHMOOD, J., contra, that the effect of s. 582 read with s. 587 was to place the defendants-appellants in the position of plaintiffs and the deceased respondent in that of a defendant for the purposes of array of parties; that consequently the provisions of ss. 363, 364, 365, 366 and 367 had no application; that, applying s. 368, the Court was bound to implead the person named by the defendants-appellants as a respondent to the appeal; that, applying s. 32, the widow occupied a position which gave her a sufficient prima facie status to be impleaded as respondent; and that as there existed no authority in the Code allowing the Court to hold an enquiry whether the father or the widow was the true legal representative of the deceased-plaintiff respondent, the Court should bring both upon the record as respondents and proceed to decide the appeal after hearing both.

The plaintiff in this case, Dipchand, a member of a joint Hindu family, sued Muhammad Husain and others for a declaration of title to and possession of a one-sixth share of alleged ancestral family property, namely, a three biswas share of mauza Pekhlani with mesne profits. The defendants had purchased the rights and interests of the plaintiff's grandfather, Duli, in the property at a sale in execution of simple money decree which was dated the 19th March, 1860.

The plaintiff alleged that this decree "was not for a debt contracted for the benefit of the family, and therefore the sons and grandsons were not bound to satisfy it, nor were their shares in the ancestral property transferable in satisfaction thereof." The plaintiff was born about three months after the passing of the decree, and the ancestral property was sold about fifteen months [225] after the plaintiff's birth. The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Aligarh) on the 30th June, 1883, dismissed the suit on the ground, inter alia, that the debt for which the property had been sold was one in respect of which the whole family estate was liable. On appeal by the plaintiff, the District Judge of Aligarh on the 15th June, 1885, held that the plaintiff's interest in the property did not pass by the sale to the defendants, and gave him a decree for possession of the share claimed.

On the 9th December, 1885, the defendants appealed to the High Court. On the 7th May, 1886, while the appeal was pending, the plaintiff Dipchand, died, and on the 17th July, 1886, his widow, Musammatt Khushalo, was on her application dated the 30th June, 1886, made respondent in his place by an order of Straight, J. The appeal came for hearing before Oldfield and Mahmood, JJ., when it was contended for the appellants that the appeal should be decreed and the suit dismissed, as on the death of Dipchand the right to sue did not survive. The Division Bench referred the questions involved in this contention to the Full Bench for decision; and the Full Bench held that the benefit of the lower appellate Court's judgment would survive to the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff, expressing no opinion whether such representative could enforce the whole of the judgment or not (7).

On the 2nd July, 1886, the following application was made by Pandit Sundar Lall on behalf of the defendants-appellants :—"In the above case the respondent died on or after the 5th May, 1886. He has left no issue. He was living with his father Sita Ram, and, so far as the petitioners know, Sita Ram, his father (if anybody is at all), is heir and legal representative to the deceased respondent. It is therefore prayed that the name of Sita Ram be entered of the record as respondent in place of the deceased respondent."

On the 25th March, 1887, the appeal came for hearing before Edge, C. J., and Mahmood, J. It was contended on behalf of the defendants-appellants that Khushalo had been wrongly substituted as respondent by the order of the 17th July, 1886, and that the proper person to be substituted as the legal representative of the deceased Dipchand was his father Sita Ram. It was agreed between the parties that either Sita Ram alone or Khushalo alone was the true legal representative of the deceased. No objection was raised on behalf of Sita Ram to the effect that he was not the legal representative of Dipchand.

With reference to this contention and with the consent of the parties the Division Bench ordered that the appeal and the application made by the defendants-appellants on the 2nd July, 1886, to substitute Sita Ram as respondent should be heard together by a Full Bench of the Court. The appeal came for hearing before the Full Bench on the 4th April, 1887.

The Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath, for the appellants.—Dipchand was a member of a joint Hindu family, and his widow could have no interest beyond a right to maintenance. We do not, however, object to the widow remaining on the record as respondent so long as the deceased's father, Sita Ram, who is the true legal representative, entitled to execute the lower appellate Court's decree, is added.

[Mr. C. H. Hill, Musammatt Khushalo.—This is a complete change of front. Till now it has always been contended on the other side that Khushalo was wrongly added as respondent and that Sita Ram should be substituted for her.

EDGE, C. J.—I do not see how two respondents with divergent interests can both remain upon the record, or how in that case the Court's decree could be executed.]

Then I say that Khushalo's name should be struck out. Under s. 587 of the Code the provisions of s. 582 apply to this appeal. By reason of s. 582, Chapter XXI applies to the case and also ss. 28 and 32. These sections show that the parties are in a different position in appeal from that which they occupied in the original suit, and that for the purposes of substitution of parties the defendants-appellants should be treated as plaintiffs. If I am wrong, then s. 367 applies, and the Court may either now itself determine who is the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff or stay proceedings until the fact has been determined in another suit.

[227] [MAHMOOD, J.—Why should you implead any one as respondent? Does not Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1) decide that if you do not do so your appeal will not abate?]

The Full Bench in that case did not deny that we were at liberty to apply for substitution if we chose to do so. The limitation for such an application is that provided by art. 178 of the Limitation Act.

[EDGE, C. J.—Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1) only decided that the appeal would not abate if the defendant-appellant did not apply for substitution within sixty days from the death of the plaintiff-respondent. It did not decide that the defendant-appellant could proceed with the appeal without any respondent being added. If the appeal succeeded, how and against whom could it be drawn up or executed?]

It is difficult to answer that question, having regard to the decision of the Full Bench. My chief difficulty is caused by the wording of art. 171B of the Limitation Act, which omits all reference to the death of a respondent. The view expressed by Straight, J., in reference to that article has been concurred in by the Calcutta High Court in Udit Narain Singh v. Harogouri Prosad (2) and by the Madras High Court in Lakshmi v. Sri Devi (3). S. 582 of the Code does not necessarily prevent the application of s. 367 to this case. The words "so far as may be" and "include" (not "mean") show that a plaintiff-respondent may be treated either as a plaintiff or as a defendant as occasion requires. I contend, therefore, that, reading together ss. 368 and 582, we are entitled to have Sita Ram placed on the record as respondent; and that, if not under s. 367 the Court has power to decide whether Sita Ram or Kushalo is the true legal representative of Dipchand.

Mr. C. H. Hill, for Mussammat Khushalo.—Our application was made under s. 365 of the Code within the time limited. The second paragraph of s. 366, therefore, does not apply, and the Court has no power to allow any application on behalf of the defendants for adding another person as legal representative.

[MAHMOOD, J., referred to Lakshmibai v. Balkrishna (4).]

[228] The Legislature in framing s. 582 of the Code did not intend that an appellant should occupy the position of a plaintiff and a respondent that of a defendant absolutely. In Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1), the only question was whether the appeal had abated because no application was made within sixty days after the respondent's death. Everything in the judgments relating to other questions is obiter. A plaintiff does not cease to be plaintiff after an appeal has been instituted. The effect of s. 582, is not that the word "plaintiff" is to be read out of s. 365, but that the word "appellant" is to be read into that section when necessary. S. 367 only applies to cases arising under s. 366, that is to say, to cases where an application has been made within time by the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff. On general principles the sections relating to the death of a plaintiff ought to be held applicable to plaintiffs even after the institution of an appeal in which the plaintiff is respondent. The appeal is virtually a rehearing. From beginning to end the question is whether the plaintiff's suit shall succeed or not. The appeal merely gives a second opportunity to the defendant.

[MAHMOOD, J.—Take the analogy of the House of Lords, where the appeal abates upon the death of either party pending appeal, and the practice is to obtain an order of revivor. The representative of the plaintiff-respondent would not apply for revivor; having his decree, he would not be interested in making such an application. It would be made by the defendant-appellant, who wanted to get rid of the decree.]

Here the appeal does not abate and the analogy would not hold good. The words in s. 582 "as far as may be" mean so far as may be necessary for the purposes of justice. Surely it would defeat the ends of justice to forbid the person who holds the decree of the first Court to obtain the benefit of it, and to allow the defendant-appellant who has lost in the Court below to appoint any person he pleases to support the lower Court's decree.

[EDGE, C. J.—Supposing that we refused to allow the defendants' application and set aside the lower Court's decree, and your client turned out not to be the true legal representative of Dipchand, the real legal representative would not be bound by our decision, nor would the lower Court's decree held by the real [229] legal representative be in any way affected. In that case, assuming the appellant to have acted under a bond fide mistake, is he to bring a fresh appeal? Such an appeal might be out of time. It comes to this; either an appellant who succeeded against a wrong respondent might get execution under s. 583, or he might lose his appeal altogether by the respondent being brought on the record against his will.]

I contend that s. 365 applies and that, therefore, ss. 366 and 367 (which must be read together and which refer only to cases where no application under s. 365 has been made within time) do not apply; but if the Court should rule otherwise, then I ask it to determine the question at issue under s. 367.

The Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath, for the appellants in reply. — S. 365 does not apply. We deny that Khushalo is the "legal representative" of the deceased. We can apply either under s. 366 or under s. 368. The word "or" in s. 366 should be read disjunctively from the preceding words, and the second paragraph of that section is not limited to cases where no application has been made by the representative of a deceased plaintiff.

EDGE, C. J., and STRAIGHT, BRODHURST and TYRRELL, JJ.—In this case one Dipchand brought a suit against Khwajah Muhammad Husain and others, in which he claimed a declaration of title to a share in alleged ancestral property in mouza Pekhlani, possession and mesne profits. It is not necessary on the present occasion to consider the questions raised by the defendants in defence. Dipchand's suit was, on the 30th of June, 1883, dismissed by the then Subordinate Judge of Aligarh. From that decree Dipchand appealed, and on the appeal the officiating Additional Judge of Aligarh, on the 15th of June, 1885, made a decree in favour of Dipchand for proprietary possession of the share claimed by him, for Rs. 624 profits against the defendants with costs in both Courts, and for mesne profits from the date of the institution of the suit to the date of the delivery of possession of the share. From that decree the defendants brought an appeal under s. 584 of the Code of Civil Procedure to this Court.

After the appeal to this Court had been filed, Dipchand, who was the respondent, died childless. After the death of Dipchand [230] his widow, Mussammat Khushalo, was on her own application brought upon the record as the legal representative of the deceased respondent, Dipchand. Subsequently the appellants applied to the Court to have Sita Ram, the father of Dipchand, brought upon the record as the legal representative of Dipchand, alleging that Sita Ram and not Mussammat Khushalo was the heir and legal representative of the deceased respondent, and contending that Sita Ram, and he only, should be on the record as the legal representative of the deceased respondent. Sita Ram has not objected, and we understand that he does not intend to object that he is not the legal representative of the deceased respondent. As it appeared to the Judges composing the Bench before which the appeal then was, and to which the application was made, that the application of the appellants raised questions of great importance upon which those Judges were not agreed, it was, with the consent of the parties, ordered that the appeal and the application of the appellants should be heard by the Full Bench. The application of the appellants has been heard by the Full Bench, and as it raised questions to be decided preliminary to the consideration of the appeal, upon which questions the Full Bench was not agreed, we took time to consider our judgments.

On the part of the appellants it has been contended that as they allege that Sita Ram is the legal representative of the deceased respondent, Dipchand, and as they desire that Sita Ram should be made the respondent to the appeal in the stead of the deceased respondent, they are entitled by virtue of ss. 368 and 582 of the Code of Civil Procedure to have the Court enter the name of Sita Ram as that of the legal representative of the deceased respondent upon the record in the place of the deceased respondent and to the exclusion from the record of Mussammat Khushalo, and this without the question being considered as to whether Sita Ram or Mussammat Khushalo is in fact the legal representative of the deceased respondent. It is common ground that the legal representative of the deceased respondent is either Sita Ram or Mussammat Khushalo, and that both of them are not legal representatives of the deceased respondent. On the part of Mussammat Kushalo it has been contended that she is entitled to show that she and not Sita Ram is the legal representative, and, as such, the only person [231] to be on the record as the legal representative of the deceased respondent; and in any event that as her name has been entered upon the record as that of the legal representative of the deceased respondent, her name cannot now be removed from the record and that she is entitled to be heard upon the appeal.

It has been contended that the question has been concluded by the ruling of the Full Bench of this Court in the case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1). The point decided by the majority of the Court in that case was that the appeal of a defendant-appellant does not abate by reason only of his omission within sixty days of the death of a plaintiff-respondent to make application to the appellate Court for bringing on the record the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent; or in other words, that arts. 171, 171 A and 171 B of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, do not apply to such a case. An examination of the order of reference shows that that, and that only, was the question referred to the Full Bench for decision. The judgment of Straight, J., in that case, at page 697, shows expressly what he considered, and we think rightly, to be the sole question before the Full Bench. In the course of his judgment he said: "The whole question which we have to consider is whether, in a case where a plaintiff-respondent has died, and the defendant-appellant has failed to make an application that the name of the plaintiff's legal representative be entered on the record as respondent in his place, the appeal in consequence of such failure abates." It is true that in their opinions recorded in that case Petheram, C. J., and Mahmood, J., gave expression to certain obiter dicta.

Petheram, C. J., thought that the provisions of s. 368 of the Code of Civil Procedure are "inapplicable to the case of a defendant-appellant who claims no debt or damages, but only to have a decree which has been passed against him reversed." This expression of opinion of the learned Chief Justice may, in our opinion, be treated as obiter. He also held, and this was the question in the reference, that the word "defendant" in art. 117 B of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act must be construed strictly as defendant only and is not to be read as "including a respondent," non obstante the language of s. 582 of the Code of [232] Civil Procedure. On the other hand it was held by Mahmood, J., at pages 700 and 701 that "the word 'defendant,' therefore, as it occurs in art. 171 B of the Limitation Act, must be taken to include a respondent, and there is nothing to suggest that any distinction is intended between a plaintiff-respondent and a defendant-respondent. Now there is one more consideration in favour of my view. There is nothing, either in the Civil Procedure Code or in the Limitation Act, which provides for or imposes the duty on the legal representative of a deceased respondent (whether plaintiff or defendant in the original action) to apply to the Court for having his name placed on the record in substitution for the deceased party. It is unnecessary to determine whether such an application could be entertained, and, if so, what limitation would govern such an application."

The Full Bench of the High Court at Calcutta in the case of Udit Narain Singh v. Harogouri Prasad (1) to which reference was made in the argument, decided only that the word "defendant" in art. 171 B of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act does not include a respondent, and expressed the opinion that s. 582 of the Code of Civil Procedure was intended to affect only proceedings under that Code.

In Lakshmi v. Sri Devi (2) the question before the Full Bench of the High Court at Madras was whether art. 171 B of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act applied to the case of a deceased respondent to an appeal. The questions which we have to consider are not questions which it was necessary to consider in any of the Full Bench cases to which we have referred.

S. 582 of the Code of Civil Procedure enacts that "the appellate Court shall have, in appeals under this chapter, the same powers, and shall perform, as nearly as may be, the same duties, as are conferred and imposed by this Code on Courts of original jurisdiction in respect of suits instituted under chapter V; and in chapter XXI, so far as may be, the words 'plaintiff,' 'defendant,' and 'suit' shall be held to include an appellant, a respondent, and an appeal, respectively, in proceedings arising out of the death, marriage, or insolvency of parties to an appeal. The provisions [233] hereinbefore contained shall apply to appeals under this chapter, so far as such provisions are applicable."

The first point to be noticed is that, in appeals under chapter, XLI of the Code, the appellate Court has and can "perform, as nearly as may be, the same duties as are conferred and imposed by the Courts of original jurisdiction in respect of suits instituted under chapter V." The words which we have just quoted, unless there be something in the section to limit their application, confer and impose upon an appellate Court very wide powers—powers the conferring of which, we think, impliedly authorises, even if the words do not expressly authorise us, as an appellate Court, to decide for the purposes of the prosecution of this appeal, or to have it determined by an independent suit, whether Sita Ram or Musammat Khushalo is the legal representative of, the deceased respondent as a preliminary question.

If the words in s. 582 "and in chapter XXI, so far as may be, the words 'plaintiff' 'defendant,' and 'suit' shall be held to include an appellant a respondent, and an appeal, respectively, in proceedings arising out of the death," &c., mean or are to be read as "provided that in chapter XXI, so far as may be, for the words 'plaintiff', 'defendants,' and 'suit' shall be read appellant, defendant, and appeal, respectively, in proceedings arising out of the death," &c., then undoubtedly the earlier words of the section are limited, and s. 368 of the Code is the only section which applies to the case, and with some startling possible results in cases in which plaintiff-respondent has died pending an appeal.

To take a possible case, a defendant appeals against a decree passed against him. Afterwards and before the appeal has come on for hearing, the respondent dies, and in the meantime the appellant has obtained, as here, a stay of execution. The appellant, we will assume, knows that he has no case in appeal and has appealed only to gain time. If s. 368 is the only section which applies, what is there to prevent such an appellant nominating as the legal representative of the deceased respondent a creature or friend of his with whose collusive assistance he could postpone upon one pretext or another the hearing of the appeal, and so keep the true legal representative of the deceased respondent out of the fruits of the decree which [234] the deceased respondent had obtained below? If s. 368 alone applies, such an appellant need only make an application to the Court, specifying the name, description, and place of abode of any person whom he alleges to be the legal representative of the deceased respondent and whom he desires to be made the respondent in his stead. The actual legal representative of the deceased respondent could not, if s. 368 alone applies, get upon the record, and would not be entitled to be heard; and could not even inform the appellate Court with any effect that it was proceeding with the hearing of an appeal in which it had not before it the proper parties to the litigation. In such a case the actual legal representative of a deceased respondent might have in his hand the probate of the will in his favour of the deceased respondent granted by the very appellate Court before which the appeal was pending ready to be produced to the Court; and might be able to show by the very record of the case under appeal that it was an undisputed fact that the person nominated by the appellant was not, and could not be the legal representative of the deceased respondent, and that he, the applicant, was the legal representative. Is the Court in such case to add a mere dummy to the record and proceed, with the knowledge of that fact, to go through the farce of hearing and determining an appeal in which the Court is aware that the decree which it may pass can have no binding effect upon the real representative of the deceased respondent? We cannot come to the conclusion that the Legislature intended to compel a High Court, or any other Court, to waste its time in the hearing and determining of an appeal, its decree in which the Court knows, or has the means, if it may apply them, of knowing, can have no possible binding effect upon the legal representative of the deceased respondent. We must put a reasonable interpretation upon the Act and assume that the Legislature, or those who may have been responsible for the framing of s. 582 of the Code, intended at the time when that section was framed to facilitate and not to obstruct the administration of the law and of justice. In our opinion, this Court, as the appellate Court dealing with this appeal and the application of the appellant, has the power to ascertain under the circumstances, as a preliminary question, whether Sita Ram or Musammam Khushalo is, for the purposes of the decree which it may have to pass, the legal representative of the deceased respondent.

[235] If we are mistaken as to the extent of our power, it will be easy for the Legislature, in the contemplated Bill for amending the Code of Civil Procedure, to enact that an appellate Court must, in the case of the death of a respondent, bring upon the record, as the representative of such deceased respondent, any person who does not object and who is nominated by the appellant, and such person only, notwithstanding that it appears to it that such person is not, and cannot be, the legal representative of the deceased respondent, and notwithstanding that the actual legal representative of the deceased respondent desires to be brought upon the record to protect his interests under the decree appealed against (1). Probably such a question as the present could not have arisen if the powers which an appellate Court should exercise had been in the Code specifically dealt with and not by reference.

It has been suggested on the authority of the case of Athiappa v. Ayanna (2), and our brother Mahmood so considers, that s. 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure would apply to this case. We may say, with all deference to the opinion of our brother Mahmood, that in our judgment s. 32 does not apply; if it does apply then that it is the duty of the Court to decide whether Sita Ram or Musammam Khushalo is the legal representative of the deceased respondent. The material part of that section, so far as this question is concerned, is as follows:—

"And the Court may at any time, either upon or without such application, and on such terms as the Court thinks just, order that any plaintiff be made a defendant or that any defendant be made a plaintiff, and that the name of any person who ought to have been joined, whether as plaintiff or defendant, or whose presence [236] before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the suit, be added."

It could not be suggested that under that section, if it applied, a person who is not the legal representative of the deceased respondent is "a person who ought to have been joined" as the legal representative of the deceased respondent. Nor, in our opinion, could such a person who has no interest whatsoever, representative or otherwise, in the suit or in the appeal, be said to be in any sense "a person whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the suit" or in the appeal. If it be contended that such a person is a necessary party to the appeal, it can only be on the ground that one of the questions which the appellate Court has to adjudicate upon is as to whether or not he is, as in this case, the legal representative of the deceased respondent. If that were a question to be adjudicated upon and settled in the appeal, it would be the duty of the Court to decide the question, and not as we infer is our brother Mahmood's opinion, to leave it undecided. To leave it undecided would be, in our opinion, to show that such a person was not a necessary party to the appeal.

(1) Act VII of 1888 ("An Act to amend the Code of Civil Procedure, the Indian Registration Act, 1877, and the Indian Limitation Act, 1877") received the assent of the Governor-General on the 23rd March, 1889, and will come into force on the 1st July, 1888. S. 32 (3) provides as follows:—To s. 368 the following shall be added, namely: The legal representative of a deceased defendant may apply to have himself made a defendant in place of the deceased defendant and the provisions of this section, so far as they are applicable, shall apply to the application and to the proceedings and consequences ensuing thereon." S. 53 (1) provides as follows:—"In s. 532, for the words 'the words plaintiff-defendant, and suit shall be held to include an appellant, a respondent, and an appeal, respectively, the following shall be substituted, namely, 'the word plaintiff shall be held to include a plaintiff-appellant or defendant-appellant, the word defendant a plaintiff-respondent or defendant-respondent, and the word suit an appeal.'"

If Sita Ram is to be brought on the record as the legal representative of the deceased respondent, and if Musammam Khushalo is to remain on the record also as the legal representative of the deceased respondent, which of them is entitled to be heard in support of the decree below? As the deceased respondent has admittedly only one legal representative, on what principle or rule of practice should we hear two persons as his legal representatives in argument on the appeal? And further, what is the decree which the Court should make in case we dismiss the appeal? The decree in such a case, if we are not to ascertain which of those two persons is the legal representative of the deceased respondent, would be dismissed with costs to the respondents. It would be unjust to dismiss it with a double set of costs—one set for the respondent who was not brought upon the record at the instance or with the consent of the appellants, and the other set for the respondent who was brought on the record on the appli-[237] cation of the appellants. If the appeal be one which ought to be dismissed with costs, the only course for the Court to adopt would be to dismiss the appeal with one set of costs to the respondents; and in that event the real legal representative, instead of getting one full set of costs, would only get a share in the full set. It cannot be doubted on the authorities that the decree to be executed would be the decree of this Court. How could it be executed? It may be doubted whether s. 231 of the Code of Civil Procedure was intended to apply to such case. If Sita Ram be the mere creature of the appellants—we do not say that he is—he would not join in an application for the execution of the decree, nor would he apply for the execution of the decree for the benefit of himself and Musammam Khushalo. If Musammam Khushalo applied for execution of the decree for the benefit of herself and Sita Ram, what would be the interests of Sita Ram which it would be necessary for the Court by its order under s. 231 to protect? They would in fact be the interests not of Sita Ram but of the appellants, and the protecting of the interests of Sita Ram would in effect deprive Musammam Khushalo of a moiety of the costs to which, if she be the legal representative of the deceased respondent, she would be entitled. S. 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure was considered by a Bench of this Court in the case of Har Narain Singh v. Kharag Singh (1), and the corresponding section of Act X of 1877 was considered by a Bench of this Court in the case of Naraini Kuar v. Durjan Kuar (2). We dissent from the view taken by the High Court at Madras in Athiappa v. Ayanna (3) and are of opinion that s. 32 of the Code does not apply to a case like this. We have pointed out what might be the result of holding that we have no power to have determined in another suit the question of which of these two persons, Sita Ram and Musammam Khushalo, is the legal representative of the deceased respondent, or to decide that question for the purposes of the prosecution of this appeal.

Different considerations arise in the case of the death of a defendant before decree in the Court of first instance. A person does not as a rule bring an action against another person unless he has, or believes he has, a cause of action ; and in the case of the death of his defendant before decree, he would not, except [238] through mistake, nominate, under s. 368 of the Code, as the legal representative of his deceased defendant, a person who did not represent his deceased defendant or his estate. If he did, no possible harm could come to the real legal representative of the deceased defendant, except possibly having to show in subsequent proceedings that he was the legal representative. A plaintiff would make such an application at his own risk, and he may be safely left to put upon the record his nominee as the legal representative of the deceased defendant. But the case is otherwise when a person claiming to be the real legal representative of a deceased respondent desires to be put on the record to protect the decree obtained by the deceased respondent, and to obtain the fruits of that decree as speedily as possible. If a judgment-debtor dies before the decree has been fully executed, the holder of the decree must, under s. 234 of the Code, "apply to the Court which passed it to execute the same against the legal representative of the deceased." In that case the decree-holder would have to satisfy the Court, either by proof or admission, that the person whom he proposed to proceed against was the legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor. An appellant would have no greater difficulty in ascertaining who is the legal representative of the deceased respondent and bringing him before the Court than would a decree-holder have in ascertaining who was the legal representative of his deceased judgment-debtor and bringing him before the Court. Ss. 365, 366, and 367 of the Code may, in our opinion, having regard to the words "as nearly as may be" and "as far as may be" in s. 582, be held to be applicable and be applied, in any event analogically, to this case to enable the real legal representative of the deceased respondent to get or be brought upon the record, and to enable this Court to ascertain whether Sita Ram or Musammatt Khushalo is the legal representative of the deceased respondent, and, as such, entitled to be heard in support of the decree obtained below. Assuming for the moment that there are no words in s. 582 to support the view we hold and have expressed, we would be prepared to hold that there must be an inherent power in a Court of record to ascertain whether or not it has before it the proper parties to a first or second appeal if the question be substantially raised. It is clear to us that when a respondent to an appeal has died, there [239] can be no hearing and determining of the appeal that can have a binding effect upon the legal representative of such deceased respondent if such legal representative be excluded from the record without having been heard to show, if he can, that he is the legal representative; and it is equally clear to us that an appellate Court is not bound to hear and determine an appeal in which it has not on the record a respondent. In the latter case, it would not be contended that any decree which might be passed, except one dismissing the appeal, would be other than fruitless. So far as the legal representative of a deceased respondent or the estate of a deceased respondent would be concerned, we can see no difference between a case in which the legal representative who applies to be put on the record is excluded from the record without having been heard and one in which there is no respondent in appeal on the record. We may observe that the High Court at Bombay in Lakshmibai v. Balkrishna (1) and the High Court at Calcutta in Rajmoonee Dabee v. Chunder Kant Sandel (2) considered that they might in those cases apply the principle of analogy.

We have had the opportunity of considering the draft judgment of our brother Mahmood and the cases referred to in it. We regret that we cannot agree with that judgment. In our opinion we can and should, either before or at the hearing of this appeal and as a preliminary question, ascertain and determine for the purposes of the prosecution of this appeal the question as to whether Sita Ram or Musammatt Khushalo is the legal representative of the deceased respondent, and should act accordingly.

MAHMOOD, J.—The preliminary question which requires determination in this case has arisen from the following facts:—On the 20th of December, 1881, one Dipchand sued the present defendants-appellants for possession of certain zamindari shares together with mesne profits. The suit was dismissed by the Court of first instance on the 30th June, 1883, and from that decree an appeal having been preferred by Dipchand, the lower Appellate Court, reversing the decree of the first Court, decreed the claim on the 15th June, 1885. From that decree the defendants preferred this appeal on the 9th December, 1885, and the appeal was admitted and is still pending in this Court. On or about the 5th May, 1886, [240] the plaintiff-respondent died childless, leaving his father, Sita Ram, and a widow, Musammatt Khushalo, and it does not appear whether there is any other person claiming to be the legal representative of the deceased. On the 30th June, 1886, an application was presented to this Court by Musammatt Khushalo, claiming to be the legal representative of the deceased and praying that her name might be substituted as respondent to the appeal, and this prayer was granted by order of my brother Straight on the 17th July, 1886. On the 2nd July, 1886, an application was made on behalf of the defendants-appellants, stating that the respondent, Dipchand, died childless on or after the 5th May, 1886, and that, so far as the defendants appellants (petitioners) were aware, the sole heir of the deceased was his father, Sita Ram, and praying that his name might, therefore, be substituted for the deceased as respondent to this appeal. This application has not yet been granted, and has given rise to one of the points which require determination in this case. The appeal originally came on for hearing before a Division Bench of the Court consisting of Oldfield, J., and myself, and, for the reasons stated in the order of 30th July, 1886, the Bench referred the case to the Full Bench for consideration of the legal effect of Dipchand's death as to the question whether the cause of action survived in favour of his legal representative. The question was decided in the affirmative by the Full Bench, and the appeal coming on for hearing before the learned Chief Justice and myself, it was contended on behalf of the defendants-appellants that Musammatt Khushalo had been wrongly substituted as respondent to the appeal, and that the proper person who should have been substituted as the legal representative of the deceased Dipchand was his father, Sita Ram, whom the defendants-appellants had by this application sought to implead as respondent to the appeal. In view of the points raised by this contention, the learned Chief Justice, by his order of the 25th March, 1887, directed that the case was to be heard by a Full Bench of this Court. The case has accordingly been heard by the whole Court so far as the preliminary question is concerned, and in dealing with that question it is necessary with reference to the arguments addressed to us at the bar, to consider the following points:—(1) Whether the order of 17th July, 1886, whereby Musammatt Khushalo's [241] name was brought upon the record as the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent, Dipchand, can be interfered with by us at this stage. (2) If so, whether she has been rightly brought upon the record as such representative, and should occupy that position for the purposes of this appeal, notwithstanding the objection of the defendants-appellants. (3) Whether the defendants-appellants are either required by law or entitled to make the application whereby they pray that the name of Sita Ram may be brought upon the record as the sole legal representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent, Dipchand. (4) Whether both Mussammamat Khushalo and Sita Ram should be impleaded as respondents to this appeal. (5) Whether the law requires that, as a condition precedent to the further hearing of the appeal, the Court should decide the question whether Mussammamat Khushalo or Sita Ram is the true representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent, Dipchand.

As to the first of these points, it is enough to say that the order of the 17th July, 1886, whereby Mussammamat Khushalo was substituted for the deceased Dipchand as plaintiff-respondent, was passed ex parte by a single Judge, and that the ratio decidendi upon which the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Dubey Sahai v. Ganeshi Lal (1) proceeded applies to this case, and that it is, therefore, open to us, as the Bench required to dispose of the appeal, to consider and decide whether the lady has been properly brought upon the record. The remaining four points as enunciated by me can be conveniently dealt together, because they form elements of one and the same question and require consideration of the same portions of the Civil Procedure Code. That question is, whether, for the purposes of the array of the parties incident upon the death of either of the parties to an appeal, the provisions of s. 582 are such as require us to apply the provisions of chapter XXI of the Code, regardless of the position which either party held in the Court of first instance—that is, regardless of the question whether the party was plaintiff or defendant in the original suit. I confess that in considering this question as a member of the Full Bench of this Court, my difficulty does not arise so much out of the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code itself as from the conflicting state of the case-law upon the subject, and this circumstance renders it necessary for me to consider the exact effect and bearing of the various rulings which were cited and relied upon at the hearing of this case, with reference to the changes which s. 582 of the Civil Procedure Code has undergone since it first appeared in the Code of 1877. The section as it originally appeared in the Code of 1877 ran as follows: "The appellate Court shall have the same powers in appeals under this chapter as are vested by the Code in Courts of original jurisdiction in respect of suits instituted under Chapter V. The provisions hereinbefore contained shall apply to appeals under this chapter so far as such provisions are applicable." By s. 88 of Act XII of 1879 the following words were added to the first paragraph of the section:—"and in ss. 363 and 365 the word 'plaintiff' shall be held to include an 'appellant.'" Whilst the section stood thus, the Calcutta High Court in Rajamonee Dabee v. Chunder Kant Sandel (2) held that, notwithstanding that s. 582 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not expressly direct that the word 'plaintiff' occurring in s. 366 shall be held to include an "appellant," yet the power conferred by s. 366 on the Court of original jurisdiction to award costs against the estate of a deceased plaintiff may by analogy be taken to be conferred on the appellate Court. And in laying down this rule the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court followed the ruling of the Bombay High Court in Lakshmibai v. Balkrishnao (3), in which, with reference to ss. 363, 365, 368, and 582 of the Code of 1877, it was held that a procedure analogous to that laid down in s. 368 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act X of 1877) in respect to the death of a defendant must be applied in the case of the death of a respondent; and that, therefore, where a respondent dies during the pendency of an appeal, it is for the appellant to take the initiative, and he is at liberty to select one or more persons to defend the appeal; and no person other than the person so selected has a right to force himself into the proceedings and to claim to have his name entered as representative of the deceased respondent against the appellant's consent. It was also held in the same case that persons so introduced on the record may or may not be the real representatives of the deceased respondent; [243] but the merits of their claim to be such, on the ground of any right or status, such as that of adoption, is immaterial to the determination of the appeal.

Both these cases are strong authority for showing that, even as the law then stood, a defendant-appellant was dealt with as plaintiff for the purposes of the array of parties in proceedings arising out of death, &c., although s. 366 was not specifically referred to in s. 582 of the Code as it then stood. In the Calcutta case just cited Mr. Justice Mitter entertained no doubts in the matter, but Garth, C.J., in delivering his judgment in the case, went on to say:—

"S. 582 of the Code has provided that in ss. 363 and 365 the word 'plaintiff' shall be held to include an 'appellant.' If the provision had been made with regard to s. 366, all difficulty in this case would have been removed; but the express mention of ss. 363 and 365 and the omission of s. 366 would rather lead to the supposition that the Legislature did not intend a respondent to have his costs under such circumstances. As my learned brother, however, is disposed to put a more liberal interpretation upon s. 582, and as the view which he takes appears to be supported by the Bombay High Court in the case to which he has referred, I shall not differ from him on this occasion, more especially as, in my opinion, the justice of the case is entirely in accordance with that view. We trust that the omission, if it is one, may be supplied in the Bill to amend the Civil Procedure Code, which is now before the Legislative Council."

The Bill to which the remarks referred was the one which on passing has become the present Civil Procedure Code of 1882, and it was probably in consequence of this suggestion that s. 582 was amended. The words inserted by s. 88 of Act XII of 1879, as addition to the first para of s. 582 of the Code were cut out and the following words substituted therefor: "And in Chapter XXI, so far as may be, the words 'plaintiff,' 'defendant,' and 'suit,' shall be held to include an appellant, a respondent, and an appeal, respectively, in proceedings arising out of the death, marriage, or insolvency of parties to an appeal." The main question, therefore, before us is, what is the effect of these alterations upon the facts of a case such as this? In other words, the question is whether [244] the defendants-appellants in this case are or are not exactly in the same position as to the array of parties as they would have been if they had been plaintiffs in the original suit and the death of the defendant had occurred during the pendency of the suit.

I should have had no difficulty in answering this question in the affirmative but for the fact that in the Full Bench ruling of this Court (1) in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram, in which I had the misfortune of being in the minority of one, there is a great deal in the ratio decidendi adopted by the majority of the Court which clashes with my views upon this point. The general effect of the view adopted by the majority of the Court in that case is that, even for the purposes of the array of parties to an appeal arising out of the incident of the death of one of the parties, a plaintiff continues to be a plaintiff and a defendant a defendant for the purposes of chapter XXI of the Civil Procedure Code, notwithstanding s. 582 of the Code of 1882. In other words, the effect of the ratio decidendi of that ruling is to hold, as I pointed out in Rameshar Singh v. Bisheshar Singh (1) and again in Grant v. The Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway Company (2), that it is not the duty of a defendant-appellant to implead any one as respondent upon the death of a plaintiff-respondent. In the last-mentioned case (which has not been reported in the authorised reports) I said: "Cases have occurred within my own experience, in which, during specially unhealthy seasons, both the appellant and the respondent have died, and in which there is some difficulty in knowing how to act. In this case the difficulty would have been considerably enhanced if the plaintiff were not also the applicant and if the defendant had not occupied the same defensive position before us as he occupied in the Court below. This would be the result of the ruling of the Full Bench in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (3) to which I was a party, but in which I had the misfortune to differ from the late learned Chief Justice and my other learned colleagues regarding the interpretation to be placed upon a clause of s. 582, Civil Procedure Code, which happens to have been drafted and submitted by myself to the Legislature word for word as it now stands. The effect of the judgment of the majority of the Court in that case, as I pointed out in Rameshar Singh v. Bisheshar Singh (1) is that the appeal by a defendant is absolutely [245] free from abatement, if he chooses to decline to implead any person to represent the deceased plaintiff-respondent, and the appeal would go on for ever upon our file if no one volunteered as representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent. Such is not the interpretation which the authors of the clause either intended or could accept; and I still think, with due deference to the Full Bench ruling of the majority of the Court, that the ruling will probably have to be reconsidered as soon as we have a case where the defendant-appellant neglects—or, to put the point more strongly—deliberately declines to implead any person as representing a deceased plaintiff-respondent, and the representative of the latter makes no endeavours to appear. And I may respectfully say that I still think that just as it is the duty of a defendant against whom a decree is passed when filing his appeal to implead the plaintiff as respondent, so it is his duty to implead the representatives of the plaintiff who dies before the appeal is instituted, for it is obvious that in such a case no appeal could be instituted ex parte, and no Court would admit an appeal which did not name any respondent at all or named a respondent who was admittedly no longer alive. Nor am I aware of any juristic reason why this duty of impleading the opposite party imposed upon the appellant should vanish simply because the plaintiff-respondent has died after and not before the appeal is preferred. Notwithstanding the high authority of Petheram, C. J., and the learned Judges who followed him, I humbly venture to think that the views expressed by me are in accord with the practice of the House of Lords in appeal where such questions arise, if not also of the other Courts of appeal in England itself. In the absence of books of reference on this subject in the library of this Court I have not been able to study the matter, and I have indulged in these obiter dicta principally to place upon record the views I entertain in the hope that when the Legislature thinks fit to amend the Civil Procedure Code, they may perhaps take these observations into consideration."

It is just possible that it was in consequence of these observations, as also the remarks which I made in my dissenting judgment in the Full Bench case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1), the Legislature in accepting Bill No. II of 1887 (now pending before the Legislature) to amend the Code of Civil Procedure, proposed in [246] s. 48 of the Bill to alter the language of s. 582 of the Code in the following manner: "In s. 582, for the words" 'plaintiff,' 'defendant,' and 'suit' shall be held to include an appellant, a respondent, and an appeal, respectively, the following shall be substituted, namely, the word 'plaintiff' shall be held to include a plaintiff-appellant or defendant-appellant the word 'defendant' a plaintiff-respondent or defendant-respondent, and the word 'suit' an appeal" (2).

I have quoted this proposed section, not because it can be utilised as a means of interpreting the Code as it now stands, but because it formulates in specific language the law as it already stands, subject of course to such difficulties as have arisen out of the case-law. Some of the cases which have given rise to the difficulties have already been cited by me, and although I have no intention of repeating what I said in my dissenting judgment in the case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1), I shall deal with that case as the central point from which this Court sitting in Full Bench should view the rulings of the other High Courts bearing upon the point now before us.

I have already mentioned what the Bombay High Court ruled in Lakshmibai v. Balkrishna (3) with reference to the Code of 1877; and I may add that a similar rule was laid down by that Court under the present Code in Bai Javer v. Hathi Singh Kesri Singh (4) where it was held that, under s. 368 of the Civil Procedure Code (XIV of 1882), a plaintiff may have the representatives of a deceased sole defendant placed on the record, so that he may continue his suit against them; but there is no section which allows the representatives of a sole defendant who has died to be placed on the record at their own request; that consequently s. 582 gives no authority to a civil Court to place on the record at their own request the representatives of a deceased sole respondent, and that such an application cannot be entertained. It is clear that both these cases are not only consistent with what I said in the case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1), but go somewhat too far according to my view of the law. The next case which I wish to cite is Soshi Bhuson Chand Grish Cunder Taluqdar (5) where the [247] Calcutta High Court laid down a rule wholly in accord with what I said in the Full Bench case of this Court, because the learned Judges (Field and Beverley, JJ.) held that, having regard to s. 3 of Act XIV of 1882, it is clear that the word 'Code' in sch. ii, art. 171B of Act XIV of 1877, applies to the present Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882), and that, therefore, the word "defendant" in s. 368 of that Code when read with s. 582 must be held to include "respondent."

This view was, however, repudiated by the Full Bench of the same

Court in Udit Narain Singh v. Harogouri Prosad (1), and in doing so the learned Judges followed the ruling of the majority of this Court in the Full Bench case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2), though judging from the report of the case I cannot but feel, with due deference, that the attention of the learned Judges was not called to my dissentient judgment. Nor can I help feeling that the learned Judges of the Full Bench of the Madras High Court in dealing with a similar question in Lakshmi v. Sri Devi (3) had not directed their attention to the reasons upon which my humble judgment in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2) proceeded; and I make this special reference to what I said at pp. 700 and 701 of the authorised report.

It is of course clear that like the Full Bench case of this Court in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2) some of the cases before the other High Courts, which I have just cited, turned upon the interpretation of a clause of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) as amended by s. 108 of a later statute, namely, Act XII of 1879. I suppose no one who has studied the rulings in those cases will deny that in interpreting s. 582 of the present Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882), they have been materially influenced by the terms of an earlier statute, namely, the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) as amended by Act XII of 1879. I have cited these cases out of deference to the learned Judges who delivered judgments in those cases in this Court, as also in the High Courts of Calcutta and Madras, though I have felt, and still feel, very great difficulty in either regarding the statutes of limitation as in pari materia with the Civil Procedure Code, or in holding that a later statute, such as this present Civil Procedure Code, is to be interpreted and governed by an earlier statute which deals with a different department of adjective law. [248] Having so far dealt with the most important cases bearing upon the question now before us, I wish to state what seems to me to be a simple proposition of law, consistent as it is with juristic reasoning. We all know that the maxim ubi jus ibi remedium is a fundamental principle of our law, and that primarily it applies only to causes of action which have to be dealt with by Courts of original jurisdiction, that is, Courts of first instance. But the principle upon which the maxim is based is applicable as much to Courts of appeal as it is to Courts of first instance, that is to say, that whilst in the Court of first instance the plaintiff complains of an injury ante litem motam, in a Court of appeal the main complaint of the appellant is that injury has been done to him, not only by the act of the opposite party, but by a wrongful exercise of jurisdiction by the lower Court. As a matter of juristic reasoning, there is no substantial difference between the position of a plaintiff in the original Court and that of an appellant before the Court of appeal, whether such appellant was plaintiff or defendant in the original Court. The juristic reason is simple, namely, that the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta is comprehensive enough to include not only acts ante litem motam, but also the acts of a Court. There is, therefore, no more reason to presume that a defendant has committed an injury than there is to presume that a plaintiff-respondent has obtained a wrong decree because of the error of the lower Court. In both cases the presumption of law is that, till the contrary is proved, acts which have actually occurred, whether done by a party to the litigation or by a Court of justice, were rightly done. And if I am right so far, for whom is it in a case of appeal to show that the decree of the lower Court was wrongly passed? Surely it is not for him who was obtained a judgment in his favour, but for him who impugns that judgment, to show that the judgment is wrong; and I find it extremely difficult to conceive how an appellant can be exonerated from this duty by dint of the simple fact that he happened to be defendant in the original Court. And if this is so I fail to see any reason, either in jurisprudence or law, why a defendant-appellant in the Court of Appeal should be placed upon a footing different from that of a plaintiff in the original Court, with reference to the array of parties, for the purposes of obtaining his remedy. Such remedy [249] in the Court of first instance would of course be obtaining a decree or an injunction, and in the Court of appeal the remedy aimed at would be the reversal of a judgment, decree, or injunction, for, whichever the case may involve, the principle remains that omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta.

Now, dealing with this point somewhat concretely, I suppose nobody would deny that a defendant against whom a decree has been passed is the person who must complain of the decree if he chooses to impugn it. Nor do I think any one would deny that under our Code of Civil Procedure it is not the duty of the successful plaintiff, but of the defendant, to implead some one as a respondent to the appeal. But the successful plaintiff may have died before the appeal is filed. Whose duty then would it be to bring the proper parties before the Court of appeal to enable that Court to adjudicate upon the appeal? Surely it would not be the duty of the successful plaintiff to impugn the judgment which is in his favour. And if this is so, the party who could or would appeal would in the case supposed be the defendant who had been unsuccessful in the Court below. It is accepted as a sound principle of adjudication by all civilised nations that audi alteram partem, and how is the appellate Court to hear the appeal of a defendant-appellant without hearing the other side? And how is it to hear the other side if the defendant-appellant either names a dead person (a plaintiff-respondent) or does not name any living person as the legal representative of the deceased?

It seems to me, therefore, to be the undoubted duty of the appellant, be he plaintiff or defendant in the original action, to implead some one as respondent, and, if the opposite party is dead, to implead some one as the legal representative of the deceased. Such, no doubt, would be the case if a plaintiff-respondent died before the filing of the appeal by the defendant-appellant. And for what reason can this duty vanish if the death of the plaintiff-respondent takes place not before the institution of the appeal but during the period of its pendency? The effect of the ratio decidendi of the ruling of the Full Bench of this Court in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1) can suggest only one answer, namely, that the appeal must remain pending for ever, or at least till so long as the legal [250] representatives of a deceased plaintiff-respondent do not apply to have their names substituted as respondents. To the question arising from such a state of things the ruling of the Bombay High Court in Lakshmibai v. Balkrishna (2) and in Bai Javer v. Hathi Sing Kesri Sing (3) would furnish the answer that the legal representatives of the deceased plaintiff-respondent have no locus standi to make an application to be substituted as representatives of the deceased; and the Full Bench ruling of the majority of this Court, as also the Full Bench ruling of the Calcutta High Court and Madras High Court would lead to the conclusion that a defendant-appellant can choose his own time for making an application to implead the legal representatives of a deceased plaintiff-respondent, the appeal in the meantime being free from liability to abatement.

I confess that I find it extremely difficult to hold that such was the intention of the Legislature. I made this observation, of course, with profound respect for the rulings which I have cited; and with equally profound respect I may observe that the whole difficulty in connection with the array of parties has arisen out of a misapprehension of the juristic principles upon which our Code of Civil Procedure is based. A due consultation of the various parts and chapters into which the Code is divided will show that the essential rules governing the procedure of the Courts of first instance form the body of the statute, and those same provisions, mutatis mutandis, have been rendered applicable, not only to the first appellate Court, not only to the second appellate Court, but also to the Courts exercising civil jurisdiction in miscellaneous cases. Such, stating the matter briefly, is the effect of ss. 582, 587 and 647 of the Code; and speaking for myself, I cannot conceive how a workable Code could be framed upon better principles. The Code is, as we all know, the outcome of the labours of one of our most eminent jurists, Lord Hobhouse, now one of the Lords of the Privy Council, with the co-operation and assistance of another great jurist, Mr. Whitley Stokes, who, in the position of Law Member of the Legislature, is no doubt mainly responsible for s. 582 of the Code of 1882 as it now stands. The Code so framed, is, to my mind, perfectly clear, and if difficulties [251] have arisen in this Court, as also in the other High Courts, over the matter now before us, it is due, as I humbly and respectfully think, to some misapprehension of the method upon which the Code has been framed. I have said so much because the policy upon which the Legislature has framed s. 582 of the Code cannot be fully realised, unless it is accepted that, as a pure matter of codification and drafting statutes, it would be nothing more nor less than clumsy to reproduce or repeat in the appellate chapters, or in the chapter relating to miscellaneous proceedings, the provisions of the procedure already well defined and accurately expressed in the earlier chapters of the Code, and which provisions, as matters ad litis ordinationem, are as suitable for appeals and miscellaneous proceedings as for regular original suits.

This is in effect what I said in one of the cases to which I have already referred; and since I am sitting again as a member of the Full Bench of this Court, which can overrule the ratio decidendi of the Full Bench ruling in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1), I must, with due deference to the majority of the Court as then constituted, repeat what I held in that case, namely, that the object of s. 582 of the Civil Procedure Code is to obviate the necessity of repeating the provisions of chapter XXI, as also to make them applicable to appeals, and the words "appellant" and "respondent," as used in the section, include both plaintiffs and defendants in an appeal; that the whole Code maintains the analogy between the position of a respondent and that of a defendant for the purposes of being impleaded and brought before the Court; that chapter XXI applies to cases where a plaintiff-respondent has died; and that in such a case, and where no application has been made within the period prescribed therefor, praying that the legal representatives of the deceased be made parties in his place, the appeal abates.

To this view I still adhere; and I may respectfully say that I do so partly because in the reports of the cases already cited by me laying down a different rule, I have failed to trace any attempt to meet the reasons which my judgment in the case just cited relied upon. Holding these views still, I need only say that not only s. 582 but the provisions of the whole Code of Civil Procedure, far from presenting difficulties of interpretation, become wholly intelligible and consistent when s. 582 is read in the sense in which I respectfully think it was framed. That sense is best enunciated in the second paragraph of the present Bill to amend the Code, namely, that "the word 'plaintiff' shall be held to include a plaintiff-appellant or defendant-appellant, the word 'defendant' a plaintiff-respondent or defendant-respondent, and the word 'suit' an 'appeal.'"

In this view of the matter, the points before us become very simple because, for the purposes of the array of the parties, s. 582 read with s. 587 of the Civil Procedure Code renders the provisions of chapter XXI of the Code relating to incidental proceedings arising from the death of parties applicable to this case in such a manner that the appellant, whether plaintiff or defendant in the original Court, must be dealt with as plaintiff for the purpose to which that chapter relates. And if I am right so far, I need only refer to the provisions of that chapter for stating my view of the law. S. 368 which occurs in that chapter lays down inter alia that in case of the death of one of several defendants or of the sole defendant, "the plaintiff may make an application to the Court, specifying the name, description, and place of abode of any person whom he alleges to be the legal representative of the deceased defendant, and whom he desires to be made the defendant in his stead." The section further goes on to say that "the Court shall thereupon enter the name of such representative on the record in the place of such defendant, and shall issue a summons to such representative to appear on a day to be therein mentioned to defend the suit; and the case shall thereupon proceed in the same manner as if such representative had originally been made a defendant and had been a party to the former proceedings in the suit, provided that the person so made defendant may object that he is not the legal representative of the deceased defendant, or may make any defence appropriate to his character as such representative."

In the present case, whilst the defendants-appellants insist upon impleading Sita Ram as the legal representative of the deceased, Musammatt Khushalo, as the widow of the deceased, far from objecting to be impleaded as respondent, has applied to be so [253] impleaded, though the application is objected to by the defendants-appellants. Now, in dealing with such a state of things, the law ceases to present any difficulties if we interpret s. 368 of the Code in the sense in which s. 582 of the Code intends that section to be interpreted. In other words, the provisions as to the impleading of defendants become applicable to the impleading of respondents, whether such respondents were plaintiffs or defendants in the original suit. And, indeed, I am prepared to go further and say that reading s. 582 of the Code as a whole, the section confers upon the appellate Court all the powers conferred upon the Courts of original jurisdiction in connection with such matters; and those extensive powers have also been conferred upon the Courts of second appeal by s. 587 of the Code. Thus not only s. 368 of the Code becomes applicable to this case, but also all the other sections of the Code as to the array of the parties, such as s. 32.

To put the matter more concretely: the defendants-appellants must in this case be treated as plaintiffs and the plaintiff-respondent Dipchand, deceased, as a defendant. On this hypothesis there is no question of the death of a plaintiff in this case, and therefore the provisions of ss. 363, 364, 365, 366, and 367 have no application. Upon the same hypothesis, what has really occurred is that a sole "defendant" has died, and a dispute has arisen as to who is his legal representative for the purposes of the litigation. The defendants-appellants (who must be regarded as plaintiffs) state that the deceased respondent (who must be regarded as defendant) lived jointly with his father, Sita Ram, who is therefore, as a surviving member of a joint Hindu family, the legal representative of the deceased, and it is only him whom they wish to implead for the purposes of carrying on this appeal. On the other hand, the widow of the deceased, Musammatt Khushalo, wishes to force herself into the litigation, in spite of the wishes of the appellants, on the contention that her husband was separate from his father, and that she is therefore his legal representative in preference to his father, Sita Ram.

To the former part of this state of things s. 368 of the Code (reading it as I do in the light of ss. 582 and 587 of the Code) is fully applicable. The effect of that section so interpreted is that upon the application of the appellant, the Court "shall" enter the name of [254] any person whom he desires to implead as legal representative of the deceased respondent. In this view the Court has no choice with reference to impleading Sita Ram, because the provisions of the statute are imperative. Then as to the latter part of the state of things already described by me, that is, the application of Musammatt Khushalo, the provisions of the first part and the last paragraph of s. 582 (read with s. 587) are applicable, and, in my opinion, the claims of the widow to be impleaded in the action must be dealt with upon principles of s. 32 of the Code, so far as they are applicable to the array of the parties in appeals. The words of the last paragraph of s. 582 are very comprehensive and seem to be consistent with the principles upon which such matters are dealt with by Courts of appeal in England, for, if I remember rightly, there are cases to be found in the English reports where even third persons have been made parties to appeals where the sound discretion of the Court required such a course. The ruling of Lord Selborne, L. C. and Brett and Cotton, L. JJ., in Markham v. Markham (1) is an illustration of what I have just said; and although I am not prepared to say definitely one way or the other that our powers in such matters under our Code are as extensive as those of the Court of appeal in England under their rules of procedure, I think I may say that the principles upon which those Courts proceed furnish a good guide for our own procedure in cases of doubt.

Nor is the view which I have taken unsupported by the authority of the Indian case-law. In the case of Athiappa v. Ayanna (2) Sir Charles Turner, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, and referring to the Bombay ruling in Lakshmibai v. Balkrishna (3) which, as I have already stated, was followed in Bai Javer v. Hathi Sing Kesri Sing (4) went on to say: "While we agree with the learned Judges of the High Court of Bombay that the Court must place on the record the person indicated as the representative of a deceased respondent, we are not prepared to say that in no case can the Court place on the record any other person as filling that character. The Court has the same power to make parties to an appeal as it has to make parties to a suit; and where there appears a substantial doubt whether the person indicated by an appellant is the [255] representative of a deceased respondent or a representative for all purposes connected with the matters in litigation, and a person other than the person indicated by the appellant lays claim to the representative character, and on good prima facie grounds, and where, if he be not allowed to join, the interests of the person entitled to the estate of the deceased may be prejudiced, we consider the Court ought to proceed under s. 32 to make him a party to the appeal."

This ruling was concurred in by Mr. Justice Mutusami Ayyar, and I am of opinion that it lays down a sound principle of law. There are, of course, some portions of s. 32 of the Code which may not be applicable to the procedure of the appellate Court, but so far as the matter now before us is concerned I think that that section is applicable. I have already said that the provisions of s. 367 of the Code are not applicable because the defendants-appellants are alive, and being dealt with as plaintiffs for the purpose of the array of parties, no dispute has arisen as to who is the proper legal representative. And what we have to consider is whether Musammat Khushalo has any such prima facie right as would entitle her to be made a party respondent to this appeal. Sita Ram, the father of the deceased Dipchand, respondent, as I have already said, must necessarily be impleaded, because he has been named by the appellants as the person against whom they wish to prosecute their appeal; and so far as Musammat Khushalo is concerned, I think that although her application to be made a party respondent to this appeal is opposed by the appellants, and may for aught we know be contested by Sita Ram also, we are not called upon to apply the procedure laid down in s. 367 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the simple reason that the plaintiff-respondent (Dipchand) cannot, according to my view, be regarded as a plaintiff for purposes of the array of parties to this appeal. All that we have to consider is whether Musammat Khushalo has any such prima facie case as would entitle her to be made a party respondent to this appeal under s. 32 read with ss. 582 and 587 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Even a Court of first instance is not required by our laws to decide any dispute as to the legal representation of a deceased defendant, and I fail to see why a Court of appeal should be called upon either to decide such a dispute as [256] to the legal representation of the deceased respondent and thus stay the decision of the appeal. In the present case, what I have gathered from the argument addressed to us at the bar is that the contention as to the legal representation of the deceased Dipchand rests mainly upon the decision of the question whether he was a member of a joint Hindu family with his father, Sita Ram, or was separate from him. We know that such questions are as a rule very difficult to decide and rest upon very minute details of evidence upon the issue when raised. It is obvious that no adjudication on such an issue when it arises between two defendants (i.e., two respondents) can bind them, and it seems to me that we shall only be delaying the disposal of this appeal if we apply s. 367 of the Code to this matter, and either decide the issue ourselves or stay the hearing of appeal until the issue has been determined in another suit.

I do not wish to go into the details of the juristic reasons why the rules of procedure, ad litem ordinationem, applicable to a dispute as to the legal representation of a plaintiff are not the same as those which relate to a dispute in connection with the legal representation of a deceased defendant. The reason why I do not go into those details is that I have already given my reasons for holding that a plaintiff-respondent, such as Dipchand in this case, must be treated as a defendant for the purposes of the array of the parties to an appeal such as this ; and that whilst Sita Ram must necessarily be impleaded as respondent, the claims of Musammatt Khushalo to be impleaded also as a respondent must be dealt with under s. 32 of the Code read with ss. 582 and 587.

This view explains why I have said that the ruling of the Bombay High Court in Lakshimbai v. Balkrishna (1) went too far in holding that no application could be made by a claimant to a deceased respondent to be impleaded in an appeal as a respondent. In my opinion the ruling of the Madras High Court in Athiappa v. Ayanna (2) solves the difficulty in this case. And adopting that ruling, I hold that Mussammatt Khushalo has in this case shown a sufficient case to entitle her to be made a respondent in this appeal without the condition precedent of any decision whether she or Sita Ram is the proper legal representative of the deceased Dipchand.

[257] Having said so much as to the views which I hold, I now proceed to state seriatim the specific answers to the five questions which, as I stated at the outset, arise in this case. My answer to the first question is that the order of the 17th July, 1886, whereby Musammatt Khushalo was brought upon the record as the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent, Dipchand, can be rescinded by the Bench at this stage, that is, after having heard the defendants-appellants,

To the second question my answer is that, notwithstanding the objections of the defendants, Musammatt Khushalo, as the childless widow of the deceased plaintiff-respondent, Dipchand, occupies a position which affords her a sufficient prima facie status to resist the appeal, and, as such, to be impleaded as respondent under s. 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure read with ss. 582 and 587 of that Code.

To the third question my answer is that the defendants-appellants, being in the position of the plaintiffs for the purposes of the array of parties to their appeal, were bound by law to implead some one to represent the deceased plaintiff-respondent, Dipchand ; that their omission to do so would subject them to the penalty of the abatement of their appeal under s. 368 read with ss. 582 and 587 of the Code of Civil Procedure ; that this Court is therefore bound, by reason of the specific provisions of s. 568, to implead Sita Ram as a respondent to this appeal.

To the fourth question my answer is that under the circumstances of this case both Musammatt Khushalo (who has already been brought upon record as a respondent) and Sita Ram should be made parties to this appeal by reason of s. 32 read with ss. 582 and 587 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882).

To the fifth question my answer is that there exists no authority in our Code of Civil Procedure either to require or permit the decision of disputes as to the legal representation of a deceased plaintiff-respondent (any more than the Code requires or permits adjudication upon such questions when they arise between two or more defendants in the Court of first instance) ; that, therefore, the question whether Musammatt Kushalo or Sita Ram is the proper legal representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent Dipchand [258] is a matter which we not only need not determine for the purposes of this appeal, but is a matter which we cannot determine under the rules of procedure as a condition precedent to the further hearing of this appeal.

I would therefore, without adjudicating upon the question whether Musammatt Khushalo or Sita Ram is the proper legal representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent, Dipchand, bring both upon the record as parties respondents to this appeal and would proceed to decide the appeal after having heard both of them.

As I understand the judgment of the majority of the Court, I take it to mean that it is not by reason of any provisions in the Code that we are required to hold an inquiry whether Sita Ram or Musammatt Khushalo is the proper legal representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent, Dipchand. I also take that judgment to mean that it is not upon the authority of any case-law existing in India or in England that such an inquiry is proposed to be held. I also understand that judgment to imply that even though a plaintiff-respondent may stand in the position of a defendant within the meaning of s. 582 of the Code, his death renders the question as to whether A or B is his legal representative a matter for adjudication by the Court as a condition precedent to the further progress of the appeal, and that such an adjudication can be made under an inherent power of the Court regulated by considerations of convenience and promotion of the ends of justice.

I regret that I cannot accept these views, for I cannot help holding that, even accepting the doctrine of inherent power in matters of procedure, the views adopted by the majority of the Court, far from resulting in convenience of procedure, will tend to prolong litigation and not necessarily obviate the inconveniences or difficulties anticipated from the view of the law which I have taken.

I am not aware of any rule of law which requires a Court in dealing with a case such as this to adjudicate upon the conflicting claims of two defendants, and if the deceased plaintiff-respondent in this case, Dipchand, is to be treated as a defendant within the meaning of s. 582 of the Code, I can find no authority either in that Code or in the case-law to necessitate an adjudication between the contending claims of two or more persons claiming to be the [259] legal representatives of the deceased. In such cases there may be not only two but many more persons, each claiming to be the proper legal representative of the deceased to the exclusion of the others, and if the law requires adjudication upon their respective rights as a condition precedent to the progress of the appeal, the effect would be to prolong litigation. And I may add that, even if such rights are adjudicated upon, it is far from certain that any such adjudications, when made by a Court of appeal in a case such as this, would be conclusively binding upon parties.

I need not, however, pursue this matter further, because although it may possibly be true that Sita Ram is in collusion with the present defendants-appellants (who have named him as the proper legal representative of Dipchand), yet it may also be true that he is the real representative and not Musammatt Khushalo, and it may also be true that both of them are his legal representatives. It may also be possibly the fact that there is a third person or persons of whose existence we have not heard, and who, by reason of the existence of a will or otherwise, are the proper legal representatives, but whose existence has not been brought to our notice by any of the parties to this litigation.

In a state of things such as this, what is the duty of this Court? Is it its duty to go about searching for the real legal representatives of the deceased? And if it is not, it is clear that, whether we have Musammatt Khushalo or Sita Ram as the proper legal representative of the deceased Dipchand, our decree must necessarily be ineffective against those who are no party thereto, rendering further litigation necessary if the party or parties whom we hold to be the legal representatives of the deceased Dipchand are not his proper legal representatives. It seems to me that the difficulties and inconveniences contemplated by the judgment of the majority of the Court are such as no system of procedure can avoid. Indeed, those difficulties and inconveniences increase, and have the effect of prolonging litigation, when attempts are made to adjudicate upon the rights of parties arrayed on the same side, whether in a Court of first instance or a Court of appeal.

Opposed to the view of the law which I have taken, two judgments have been relied upon which I have not yet mentioned. [260] One is the case of Narain Kuar v. Durjan Kuar (1), which relate to the exercise of powers under s. 32 of the Code, and the other case is Har Narain Singh v. Kharag Singh (2). The former of these cases does not appear to me to clash with my views because there is no question of intervenors in this case; but the latter no doubt militates against the ratio decidendi which I have adopted in this case. With much that was laid down in that case I am respectfully unable to agree for the reasons which I have already fully stated.

There is only one more point to which I need refer, viz., the difficulty contemplated as to costs if my views of the law were adopted. Under s. 223 of the Code of Civil Procedure read with ss. 582 and 587 of that enactment this Court would have the power to make any order as to costs within its judicial discretion, just as a Court of first instance would have similar power. And this appeal, if Sita Ram has been improperly impleaded, or if Musammat Khushalo has wrongly forced herself upon the record as a party to the appeal, and the appeal prevails or fails, these would be considerations regulating the discretion of the Court regarding the order as to costs.

For these reasons, without adjudicating upon the contention of the appellants that Sita Ram is the proper legal representative of the deceased Dipchand, and without adjudicating upon any such claims as he may have to that capacity as against Musammat Khushalo or vice versa, I would place both upon the record as parties respondents to this appeal, and would proceed to hear the same and dispose of it.

CHAJMAL DAS AND OTHERS (Defendants) v. JAGDAMBA PRASAD

Civil Procedure Code, ss. 3, 363, 582—Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act), sch. ii, Nos. 171B, 178—Death of plaintiff-respondent—Application by defendants-appellants for substitution of legal representative.

The judgment of the majority of the Full Bench in Narian Das v. Lajja Ram (1) only decided that art. 171B, sch. ii, of the Limitation Act of 1887, did not apply [261] to an application by a defendant-appellant to have the representative of a deceased plaintiff-respondent made a respondent. Art. 178 applies to such applications.

So held by the Full Bench, MAHMOOD, J., dissenting.

Held by MAHMOOD, J., that by reason of s. 3 (read with ss. 368 and 582) of the Civil Procedure Code, the word "defendant" in art. 171B, of the Limitation Act necessarily includes a plaintiff-respondent. Soshi Bhusan Chand v. Grish Chunder Taluqdar (2) referred to.

[R.—11 A. 408 = 8 A.W.N. 111.]

This was a suit brought by one Jagdamba Prasad for possession of a share of alleged ancestral property which was sold in execution of simple money decrees against the plaintiff's father, Narain Lal. The Court of first instance decreed the claim in full on the 31st March, 1884. On the 15th April, 1884, the defendants (purchasers under the decrees in execution of which the property in suit had been sold) appealed to the High Court from the Subordinate Judge's decree. On the 17th September, 1885, while the appeal was pending, the plaintiff-respondent died.

On the 20th March, 1888, an application was made on behalf of one Musammat Genda Kuar, mother of the deceased plaintiff-respondent, in the following terms:—

1. "That your petitioner's name be entered as the heiress and legal representative of her deceased son, Jagdamba Prasad, plaintiff in the original suit under the provisions of ss. 365, 366 and 582 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

2. "That as the appellants (defendants in the suit) have failed to bring the proper legal representative of the deceased respondent into Court within the time prescribed therefor by the Limitation Act, their appeal be ordered to abate under the last paragraph of s. 368 coupled with s. 582 of the Code."

The appeal came for hearing before Straight and Mahmood, JJ. It was ordered to be laid before the Full Bench for consideration of Musammat Genda Kuar's application.

The Hon. T. Conlan, Munshi Hanuman Prasad, and Lala Juala Prasad, for the appellants.

The Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath and Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri, for the respondent.

[262] EDGE, C. J.—In this case the plaintiff obtained a decree from the Court below. From that decree an appeal was filed in this Court on the 15th April, 1884. The plaintiff-respondent died on the 17th September, 1885. No application has been made by or on behalf of the appellant to bring upon the record the representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent, nor has any representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent applied to be brought upon the record. The present application, which was preferred on the 20th March, 1888, is made on behalf of the mother of the deceased plaintiff-respondent. It is an application for an order of the Court decreeing that the appeal has abated. I consider that the judgment of the majority of the Full Bench in the case Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1), notwithstanding the head-note, simply decided that article 171 B of sch. ii of the Limitation Act of 1877 did not apply in that case. That case is on all fours with that now under consideration, so far as the question of limitation is concerned. The result of that decision, I think, must be that art. 178 of sch. ii of the Limitation Act must apply. As three years have not expired since the death of the plaintiff-respondent, and as I do not propose to re-consider the question decided in the case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1), I think that the application is premature and, as such, must be rejected with costs.

STRAIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I was a party to the Full Bench ruling in this Court to which the learned Chief Justice has referred. Any one who will take the trouble to read what I said in that case will find that what I laid down there was that art. 171B of the Limitation Act did not apply to a case like this. I was of opinion, for reasons stated therein, that the word "respondent" had, whether from intention or mistake, been omitted from that article, and comparing it with the preceding article, I showed, in reference to s. 582, that it seemed rather as if it had been intentionally omitted. That view has been adopted by five Judges of the Calcutta Court, and the same view has been taken by the Madras Court. I add these remarks for the purpose of showing that when I used the expression at the end of my judgment in that case, "it therefore appears to me impossible to say that the appellant in the present case has failed to make the application within the period [263] prescribed therefor, because no period for making such an application is in fact prescribed at all," I was limiting my remarks to art. 171B, no other article having been suggested to me, and it not having occurred to my mind that art. 178 of the Limitation Act was applicable. I think that art. 178 is applicable, and that, therefore, where a respondent dies, the appellant has three years from the date of such death, that is to say, from the date "when the right to make the application" accrues to him, to come into Court and have the heirs of the deceased respondent brought on the record. I concur with the learned Chief Justice that this application is premature and that it should be rejected with costs.

BRODHURST, J.—I also concur with the learned Chief Justice.

TYRRELL, J.—I concur.

MAHMOOD, J.—The order which I have to make on this application must be the same as that made by the majority of the Court. But I am anxious to guard myself against being understood to hold that the provisions of s. 582 of the Code of Civil Procedure, read with s. 368 of that Code, would not render the word 'defendant' as used in art. 171 B, sch. ii, Limitation Act, applicable also to the case of the death of the plaintiff-respondent. I say this, of course, with due deference to the rulings to the contrary, which need, however, not be now cited. I dealt with most of those cases in my dissentient judgment in the Full Bench case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1). At page 700 of the report I expressed the exact reasons why by dint of the interpretation clause of the Civil Procedure Code, the word 'defendant' occurring in art. 171 B, sch. ii of the Limitation Act, must necessarily include a plaintiff respondent. That was a view in full accord with what was said by Field and Beverley, JJ., in Soshi Bhusan Chand v. Grish Chunder Taluqdar (2). The ruling in this last case, however, though apparently not cited or considered, has been dissented from by a Bench of five Judges of the same Court; and all the other cases bearing on this point were collected by me in delivering my judgment in the recent Full Bench case of Muhammad Hoosein v. Khushalo (3), in which the order of the Full Court was passed on [264] the 23rd January, 1888. To the remarks I have made in this last judgment I have nothing to add, though, being bound by the decision of the majority of the Court, I agree in the order which has been made.

DEBI DIN (Plaintiff) v. CHUNNA LAL (Defendant).
[30th April, 1888.]

Civil Procedure Code, ss. 3, 368, 582—Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act.) sch. ii, Nos. 171 B, 178—Death of defendant-respondent—Application by plaintiff-appellant to have representative of deceased substituted as respondent.

Held by the Full Bench (MAHMOOD, J., dissenting) that art. 171B of the second schedule of the Limitation Act does not apply to the death of a respondent, whether plaintiff or defendant in the original suit; and that art. 178 applies to an application made by a plaintiff-appellant to bring upon the record the representative of a deceased defendant-respondent.

Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1) and Balkrishna Gopal v. Bal Joshi Sadashiv Joshi (4) referred to.

Baldeo v. Bismillah Begam (5); and Rameshar Singh v. Bisheshar Singh (6) overruled.

Held by MAHMOOD, J., contra, that the word "defendant" in art. 171B includes a defendant-respondent, and, reading art. 171 B with clause 2 of s. 3 in conjunction with ss. 368 and 582 of the Civil Procedure Code includes also a plaintiff-respondent; and that an application made by a plaintiff-appellant more than sixty days after the defendant-respondent's death to have the representative of the deceased made a respondent is barred by limitation, and the appeal is liable to abatement.

Soshi Bhusan Chand v. Grish Chunder Taluqdar (2) referred to.

[F.—29 M. 529=16 M.L.J. 475=1 M.L.T. 348.]

This was a suit for an account of the profits of certain zamindari property in which the plaintiff claimed a share, and for the recovery of such sum with interest as might be found due on the accounts being taken. The defendant, the uncle of the plaintiff, was the manager of the property.

Cawnpore decreed the claim in respect of part of the property in suit. On the 13th August, 1886, the plaintiff appealed to the High Court from so much of the lower Court's decree as was adverse to him. On the 4th January, [265] 1888, pending the appeal, the defendant-respondent Jia Lal, died, and on the 19th March an application to the Court was made on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant to the effect that the names of the four sons of the deceased respondent might be entered on the record as respondents in his place. On the 27th March, 1888, pending the disposal of this application, another application was made on behalf of the above-mentioned legal representatives to the effect that the application of the 19th of March, 1888, had not been presented within the period of limitation provided in art. 171 B of the second schedule of the Limitation Act, and prayed that the appeal should accordingly be declared to have abated.

On the 28th April, 1888, the case came for hearing before Edge, C.J., and Straight, J., who passed an order referring the applications of the 19th March and the 27th March, 1888, to the Full Bench for disposal together with the other cases raising similar questions of law.

The Hon. T. Conlan, Sheikh Amiruddin, and Lala Latta Prasad, for the appellant.

Mr. G. E. A. Ross and Mr. E. C. F. Greenway, for the legal representatives of the defendant-respondent.

The Hon. T. Conlan for the appellant.—The decision of the Full Bench in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1) applies to this case in principle. The judgment of Straight, J., in that case was concurred in by Oldfield and Brodhurst, JJ., and it shows that art. 171B of the second schedule of the Limitation Act does not apply to the death of a respondent. The only article of the Limitation Act applicable to such a case is art. 178, and therefore the application of the 19th March was in time and that of the 27th March premature.

Mr. G. E. A. Ross for the legal representatives of the respondent.—In the case of Baldeo v. Bismillah Begam (2) Oldfield and Tyrrell, JJ., held that art. 171B of the Limitation Act applies to applications to have the representative of a deceased defendant-respondent made a respondent. That case is exactly in point, and it shows that those learned Judges drew a distinction between the case of a defendant-respondent and that of a plaintiff-respondent dying, and considered that Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1) did not [266] govern the former class of cases. The Legislature can never have meant that while an application under s. 365 of the Code for substitution of the legal representative of an appellant must be made within sixty days after the appellant's death, an application for substitution of a respondent might be made at any time within three years after the respondents death.

[STRAIGHT, J.—The omission of the word "respondent" in art. 171B was probably an oversight.]

The Hon. T. Conlan for the appellant in reply.

EDGE, C. J.—This is an application on behalf of the plaintiff appellant to bring upon the record the representative of the deceased defendant-respondent. The defendant-respondent died on the 4th January, 1888. This application was presented to the Court on the 19th March last. Mr. Ross also applied, on behalf of the legal representative of the deceased defendant-respondent, for an order directing that the appeal should abate. The question raised is whether art. 171B of sch. ii of the Limitation Act applies to this case. It has been decided in the case of Balkrishna Gopal v. Bal Joshi Sadashiv Joshi (1) that art. 171B, sch. ii, of the Limitation Act does not apply to the case of a defendant-respondent. Having regard to the fact that by art. 171 the Legislature provided specifically for the cases of the death of an appellant or the death of a plaintiff, and there is no express reference in art. 171B to the death of a respondent, I am of opinion that art. 171B does not apply to the death of the respondent, whether that respondent was originally in the action plaintiff or defendant. I think the principle applicable to this case is the same principle which was the basis of my brother Straight's judgment in the Full Bench case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2), with which, so far as the report enables us to see, at least two Judges of the Court concurred. This opinion of mine is in conflict with the judgment of Oldfield and Tyrrell, JJ., in Baldeo v. Bismillah Begam (3). It does not appear to me that Oldfield, J., who delivered judgment in that case, considered or discussed the bearing of the judgment of the majority of the Court in the Full Bench case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2). Indeed my brother Tyrrell is now of opinion that that judgment was in opposition to the decision [267] of the majority in the Full Bench case. My opinion is also apparently at variance with the decision of Oldfield and Mahmood, JJ., in Rameshar Singh v. Bisheshar Singh (4). I think I am bound to follow the principle which is enunciated in the Full Bench case and with which principle I agree, as in my opinion art. 171B does not apply, and as there does not appear to be any other article than 178 applicable to the case, I am of opinion that the application of Mr. Conlan on behalf of the appellant must be allowed, and the application of Mr. Ross on behalf of the legal representatives of the deceased-respondent should be refused with costs.

STRAIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned Chief Justice has correctly interpreted the principle upon which I based my decision in the Full Bench case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2). To put it shortly, that principle is this, that the word "defendant" in the art. 171B does not include a "respondent," and that consequently the period of limitation provided in that article is not applicable to the failure on the part of the appellant to bring on the record the heir of a deceased "respondent." I am of opinion that the limitation applicable to cases of this kind is that which has been stated a Full Bench case of the Madras High Court (5), and has, as I understand it, been approved by the Calcutta High Court (6) has also, from that we see now, met with approval by the Bombay High Court (7), and has been adopted by us.

BRODHURST, J.—I also concur with the learned Chief Justice.

TYRRELL, J.—I concur in the order made.

MAHMOOD, J.—In delivering my judgment in Chajmal Das v. Jagdamba Prasad (8), in which I concurred in the conclusion at which the learned Chief Justice and my learned brethren arrived, I had no intention to concede any principle that the ruling in the case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2) could be interpreted so as to render the rule that was there laid down applicable also to the cases in which a defendant who happened also to be a respondent died, because it is to be borne in mind that in that case the appellant was defendant in the original suit. In that Full Bench case the whole of my dissentient judgment of course proceeded upon repu-[268]diating any distinction between a plaintiff-respondent and defendant-respondent, because I held there, at page 700 of the report, that the effect of s. 582 was to demolish the distinction between the plaintiff and defendant for purposes of the array of parties in appeal. The effect of my view was that the defendant-appellant was a "plaintiff," as indeed a plaintiff-appellant also would have been a "plaintiff," so a defendant-respondent would have been a "defendant," as also a plaintiff-respondent would be a "defendant," for the purposes of art. 171B of sch. ii of the Limitation Act. That ruling, however, had to be considered by me in conjunction with Oldfield, J., in Rameshar v. Bisheshar Singh (1) where I endeavoured to show that the Full Bench ruling in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2) was distinguishable from cases in which a defendant respondent had died, and the plaintiff who was originally in the aggressive position in the first Court was also in that same position in the Court below. In that view Oldfield, J., concurred with me, though with hesitation. Exactly the same view was taken by Oldfield, J., with the concurrence of my brother Tyrrell, in Baldeo v. Bismillah Begam (3). I think these two cases are authorities for showing that a distinction does lie between the case of the death of a plaintiff-respondent and a defendant respondent.

There is indeed the case of Balkrishna Gopal v. Bal Joshi Sadashiv Joshi (4), in which West, J., without having his attention drawn to this distinction, has applied a rule similar to that of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2) to the case of the death of the defendant-respondent. But that judgment with all due respect for such an eminent Judge, does not seem to me to have dealt with the real difficulty in the case—i. e., the effect of reading s. 3 of the Civil Procedure Code with art. 171 B of the Limitation Act. That enactment, as I said in the case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2) and as was said by Field and Beverley JJ., in Soshi Bhusan Chund v. Grish Chunder Taluqdar (4) is to show that "defendant" as it occurs in art. 171B does include a respondent.

Whether it includes a plaintiff-respondent or not is a matter undoubtedly settled by the ruling in the case of Narain Das v. [269] Lajja Ram (2). The rulings of the Full Bench of Madras and other High Courts to which full reference has been made by me in Muhammad Husain v. Khushalo (5) which is also a Full Bench case, need not be referred to again. But why the word 'defendant' should be interpreted as excluding a defendant who is admittedly a defendant, but happens also to be a respondent, I confess with due deference that I fail to see. These words must be understood either with due regard to s. 582 or not. If so understood, then by s. 3 of the Civil Procedure Code the 'defendant' in art. 171B must be understood as defendant is understood in the Civil Procedure Code, and s. 582 is an essential part of that Code and defines a respondent. If the Civil Procedure Code lends us no help, then there is no rule of interpretation which would limit a term in itself general only to a defendant who does not happen to be a respondent.

In this view of course I am in a portion of my ratio decidendi departing from the judgment in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (2). But it is in consequence of the opinion of the majority of the Judges that I cannot utilize the definition of 'defendant' in s. 582 for interpreting art. 171 B of the Limitation Act.

I am of opinion that inasmuch as the Full Bench case of this Court in Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1) does not settle the exact point now before me, the word 'defendant' read with clause 2 of s. 3 of the Civil Procedure Code in conjunction with s. 582 does include a defendant-respondent, and that a plaintiff-appellant not applying within the time provided by art. 171B to bring upon the record the proper parties, is liable to the abatement of his appeal within the meaning of s. 368 of the Civil Procedure Code read with s. 582. I would therefore allow the application made by the heir of the deceased, and I would declare that this appeal should abate with costs.

As to the second application, viz., that made by Mr. Conlan, it follows from what I have said that that application cannot be maintained, and those reasons are in principle the same as those stated by me in the case of Narain Das v. Lajja Ram (1) as also in my recent judgment in Muhammad Hussain v. Khushalo (2). It is an application which admittedly having been made after the lapse [270] of sixty days as provided by art. 171 B is an application which cannot be entertained, because we should then be placing upon the record of an appeal which has abated persons who are the heirs of deceased respondents. I would therefore reject that application (3).

RAM SARUP (Defendant) v. RAM SAHAI AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs).*

Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act), sch. ii., Nos. 171B, 178—Death of plaintiff-respondent—No application for substitution—Application by defendant-appellant for hearing of appeal.

Held, by the Full Bench that inasmuch as art. 178 and not art. 171 B of the second schedule of the Limitation Act applied to the case of a deceased respondent whether plaintiff or defendant in the suit, an application by a defendant-appellant to have his appeal heard in the absence of any representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent could not be allowed until the period prescribed by art. 178 had expired without the legal representatives of the deceased applying to be brought on the record in his place.

This was a second appeal which came for hearing before Brodhurst and Mahmood, JJ., who on the 24th March, 1888, passed the following order :—

"In this case Mr. Kashi Prasad, on behalf of the appellant, states that one of the plaintiffs-respondents, Ram Sahai, died more than sixty days ago, and that the other plaintiff-respondent, Sadho, is not to be found. Upon this state of things the learned pleader contends that his client, Ram Sarup, being defendant-appellant, was not bound to make any application to implead any person as respondent to the suit as legal representative of the plaintiff-respondent, and that, there being neither any right to apply for such substitution of parties nor any period of limitation applicable thereto, the result would be that the suit will abate, and that the decree of the lower appellate Court should be reversed. The point so raised is very similar to that which has arisen in some other cases, such as Chajmal Das v. Jagdamba Prasad (1), which is to be considered, by the order of the learned Chief Justice, by a Bench of three Judges. We think that this case should also be disposed of [271] by the same Bench, and with this recommendation we direct it to be laid before the learned Chief Justice for orders."

The case was ultimately referred to the Full Bench by an order dated the 28th April, 1888.

JUDGMENTS.

EDGE, C. J.—In this case one of the two plaintiffs-respondents died pending the appeal. Three years have not expired since the day of his death. The defendant-appellant applies to have his appeal heard in the absence of any representative of the deceased plaintiff-respondent. For the reason stated by the majority of this Court in Muhammad Husain v. Khushalo (2) I am of opinion that we should not accede to this request until we have the proper parties on the record. We have held that art. 178 and not art. 171 B applies to the case of a deceased respondent, be he plaintiff or defendant in the suit. In my opinion the motion should be refused.

STRAIGHT, J.—I am of opinion that the contention of Mr. Kashi Prasad, which has been referred to this Full Bench by the Divisional Bench for disposal, should be decided against him, and that he should not be allowed to proceed with the trial of this appeal, and to have it decreed as against the respondent who has died since the institution of the appeal until the period of limitation provided for in art. 178 of the Limitation Law has expired and the legal representatives or heirs of such deceased respondent have failed to make such application to be brought on the record. That contention of the learned pleader for the appellant in the appeal must be taken to be disposed of, and the case will come on in due course.

BRODHURST, J.—I concur with the learned Chief Justice and my brother Straight.

TYRRELL, J.—I concur.

MAHMOOD, J.—Feeling myself bound by the opinion of the majority I must bow to the conclusion at which they have arrived. I concur in the order which they have made (3).

[272] SARTAJ KUARI AND ANOTHER (Defendants) v. DEORAJ KUARI, MOTHER AND GUARDIAN OF LAL NARAIN DAR BAHADUR PAL (Plaintiff).
[5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th, December, 1887, and 21st January, 1888.]

Custom—Impartible estate—Right of possessor of impartible estate to alienate.

There is no such co-parcenary in an estate impartible by custom, as, under the law of the Mitakshara governing the descent of ordinary property, attaches to a son on his birth.

The son's right at birth, under the Mitakshara, is so connected with the right to share in, and to obtain partition of the estate, that it does not exist independently of the latter right.

Where a custom is proved to exist, it supersedes the general law, which, however, still regulates all beyond the custom.

In regard to a raj estate in Gorakhpur, by custom impartible and descending by primogeniture, the family being in other respects governed by the Mitakshara law, the present Raja's alienation of part of that estate was alleged by his son to be invalid as against him.

Held that if there had been no custom of impartibility, the Raja's power over the estate would have been restricted by the law declared in Mitakshara, ch. I, s. 1, v. 27; and the gift would have been void. But, there being the above custom, the question was how far the general law was superseded, and whether the right of the son to control the father's act in this respect was beyond the custom.

Held that in regard to impartible estate, the son's right at birth did not exist where there was no right on his part to partition; also that inalienability dependent on custom or on the nature of the tenure. In this case the evidence did not establish that by custom the estate was inalienable.

APPEAL from a decree (4th May, 1883) of the High Court affirming a decree (2nd October, 1880) of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur.

The question was of the validity of a gift of seventeen villages in Gorakhpur, forming part of the hereditary and impartible raj estate in the possession of the Raja of Mahauli. It was in favour of a younger wife, and was disputed by the Raja's eldest son, still a minor, represented by his mother and guardian.

The instrument which the son sought to have declared void was dated the 18th February, 1871.

It recited that Raja Bhawani Ghulam Pal was the proprietor of a number of villages in the pargana of Mahauli, constituting [273] his raj estate, which had been settled with him for the revenue; and that he was, with regard to the nature of the raj and riasat, and also with regard to the custom and usage of the family and of the country, the sole permanent proprietor having full power to transfer the estate. The instrument then declared that the Raja thereby made a gift to his wife, Rani Sartaj Kuari, of the seventeen villages described therein, forming part of his "ilaka," and had put her into possession, she having full proprietary rights therein and being entitled to obtain dakhil kharij.

The plaintiff's ground of claim was that, by Hindu law and usage, the Raja had no power to alienate any part of the raj estate. The Raja denied this, alleging in his defence a right to make any transfer; adding that, in consequence of the separation of members of the family, and for other reasons, transfers of every description had been made of the raj estate from of old.

The judgment of the Court of first instance was against the validity of the alienation.

On appeal the High Court (Straight, J., and Tyrrell, J.) gave judgment as follows:

"The case is one of considerable moment, not only from the value of the property in suit, but the importance of the legal questions involved as to the precise character of the property of the raj and the power of the Raja in regard to it. Before addressing ourselves to the points raised for our determination, a few words may be conveniently devoted to recording the history of this Mahauli raj. The estates, which are considerable, lie in the parganas of Tanda and Akbarpur, Fyzabad, in the province of Oudh, and Mahauli and Rasulpur, in the district of Basti, in these Provinces. It would appear that some 300 years ago two brothers, by name Alakdeo and Tilakdeo, Surajbansi Rajputs, hailing, so they alleged, from Kumaun, invaded the locality in which the property above mentioned is situated, and, killing one Kaulbil, the then Rajbhar, appropriated his lands and made them the nucleus of the present raj. Subsequently, for services rendered or for some other reason, they obtained from one of the Delhi Emperors the title of "Pal," which has now for a long course of years attached to the family. Originally the dwelling-house of [274] the Raja was in the village of Mahauli, but it was afterwards removed to Mahson, where it now is situated. The seventeen villages to which the deed of gift in favour of Rani Sartaj Kuari relates are nearly all situated in Mahson, and are estimated, in round figures, to be worth some five lakhs of rupees and form, so the plaintiff alleges, the most valuable part of the raj properties. The names of the several Rajas who have preceded the present incumbent in their order are, as far as we have been able to ascertain them:—(1) Dip, (2) Jaswant, (3) Kalandar, (4) Bakhtawar, (5) Sarfraz, (6) Shamshere, and (7) Mardan, father of the defendant Ghulam and grandfather of the plaintiff. Of the above, with the exception of Kalandar, who is said to have been selected in preference to his elder brother Zorawar, though the evidence as to this is of the vaguest and most unsatisfactory kind, succession to the gaddi has been ruled by primogeniture.

"We now revert to the contentions urged by the appellants' counsel in support of the appeal. Briefly they are—1st, that the plaintiff has no title to come into Court during his father's lifetime, for he is neither a co-proprietor nor a reversioner; 2nd, that if he has a right to institute a suit, it rests with him to establish the inalienability of the raj, and that under any circumstances the defendants have conclusively proved the competence of the Raja to make the gift impeached. The first question involves the consideration of many points of no slight difficulty and complexity, and their examination has been not a little perplexed by a perusal of the numerous authorities to which we were referred in the course of the arguments at the hearing of the appeal. Putting aside the suggestion of custom or usage made in the plaint, which we do not feel called upon to discuss, the position asserted by the plaintiff apparently resolves itself into this:—“The estate now in possession of my father is ancestral; he and I are members of a joint Hindu family, ordinarily subject to the law of the Mitakshara. If I survive him, I must under that law succeed to the estate. Although it is admittedly impartible in the sense that I cannot demand partition thereof, or have joint enjoyment of the income derived therefrom, yet I have, so to speak, a limited proprietorship therein in the shape of rights to maintenance and succession by survivorship.” In other words, the plaintiff claims that except in so far as from the [275] nature of the estate they are inapplicable, his case must be determined according to the principles of the Hindu law which govern families and their property. As a matter of first impression, it appears to us that this contention is based on grounds of justice and good sense, but it will be convenient at once to see how far authority supports it.”

The judgment of the High Court then quoted passages from several judgments of the Judicial Committee, of which the effect is given by their Lordships in their judgment. They are therefore here omitted. The cases referred to by the Judges of the High Court were Katama Natchiar v. The Raja of Shivagunga (1); Neelkisto Deb Burmono v. Beerchunder Thakoor (2); Stree Raja Yanumula Venkayamah v. Stree Raja Yanumula Boochia Vankondora (3); Ramalakshmi Ammal v. Sivanantha Perumal Sethurayar (4); Periasami v. Periasami (5); Doorga Persad Singh v. Doorga Konwari (6).

To the Judges of the High Court it seemed that the principles laid down by the Judicial Committee established that a raj, or impartible zamindari, might be a portion of a joint family estate; and that, in the absence of a custom to the contrary, succession to it would be regulated by the ordinary rules of Hindu law. And they added: “The conclusion to be deduced, as it appears to us, from the observations of their Lordships is that where there is no local or family custom overriding the general law, the succession to a raj or impartible zamindari, according to Hindu law, goes by primogeniture. There is one other decision of the Privy Council—Doorga Persad Singh v. Doorga Konwari (6), in which the passage from the Shivagunga case is quoted with approval, and where the following material remarks to the question under our consideration occur:—“The impartibility of the property does not destroy its nature as joint family property or render it a separate estate of the last holder, so as to destroy the right of another member of the joint family to succeed to it upon his death; in preference to those who would be his heirs if the property were separate.” In this connection we may also refer to the judgment reported in 13, [276] Moore’s Indian Appeals, page 333, in the course of which it is observed:—“It is therefore clear that the mere impartibility of the estate is not sufficient to make the succession to it follow the course of succession to separate estate." So in Periasami v. Periasami (1), it is said:—"He would, therefore, necessarily be joint in that estate, so far as was consistent with its impartible character, with his two younger brothers; the latter taking such right and interests in respect of maintenance and possible rights of succession as belong to the junior members of a raj or other impartible estate descendible to a single heir. Hence there can be no doubt that the estate, though impartible, was up to the year 1829 in a sense the joint property of the joint family of the three brothers."

"We have thought it right to quote at this length from these Privy Council rulings, because the counsel for the appellants greatly pressed upon us a case to be found at page 523 of the 12th Vol. of Moore's Indian Appeals, which is known as the Tipperah case, and particularly the following passage on page 540:—"Still, when a raj is enjoyed and inherited by one sole member of a family, it would be to introduce into the law, by judicial construction, a fiction also involving a contradiction, to call this separate ownership, though coming by inheritance, at once sole and joint ownership, and so to constitute a joint ownership without the common incidents of co-parcenership. With deference, we can only remark that we find ourselves wholly unable to reconcile this view of the matter with the opinions expressed in the other judgments of their Lordships from which we have quoted, and by which in every aspect of the question before us we prefer to be guided. An impartible raj or zamindari must, it seems to us, be one of two things—either a separate estate conferring independent and absolute proprietary powers and carrying its own special rules of succession, or a joint ancestral estate pertaining and belonging to a joint undivided family. Because it is impartible it is not necessarily separate, for its impartibility does not 'destroy its nature as joint family property,' nor does it 'make the succession follow the succession of separate estates.' If, then, it can be considered joint property, is it to be so merely in name? It must be conceded that the complete rights [277] of ordinary co-parcenership in the other members of the family to the extent of joint enjoyment and the capacity to demand partition are merged in, or, perhaps, to use a more correct term, subordinated to the title of the individual member to the incumbency of the estate, but the contingency of survivorship remains along with the right to maintenance in a sufficiently substantial form to preserve for them a kind of dormant co-ownership. This is matter, however, more pertinent to the second question we shall presently have to consider. As to the first—namely, the competency of the plaintiff to maintain this suit—we think that, in the absence of any custom to the contrary, he and his father being Hindus and members of a joint Hindu family, and, as such, subject to the law of the Mitakshara, the estate pertaining to the raj of Mahauli must be regarded as joint family property, in which he has an immediate present interest and a right of succession as eldest son. In this view of the matter the first contention urged for the appellant fails.

"In support of his second point—namely, that the onus was on the plaintiff to establish the inalienability of the raj—the counsel for the appellant referred us to Raja Udaya Aditya Deb v. Jadub Lal Aditya Deb (2). We have very carefully perused that ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council, as also the judgment of the High Court of Calcutta, from whose decision the appeal was preferred, and it seems to us sufficient to say that the property to which the litigation related was situated in Lower Bengal, where the parties would be subject to the Dayabhaga and not the Mitakshara. Under the general law, therefore, by which they were governed, the Raja had power to make alienations, and it was for those who denied his right to do so to establish a custom of inalienability that would override the general law. In the case before us, however, the Mitakshara is the law of the parties; and if we have correctly held that the Mahauli raj estate is joint family property, then, save for urgent or necessary expenses of the family, no one member, even though he stands in the position of father or manager, can alienate it or any part of it without the consent of all. Such at least is the view of the Hindu law that has been always recognised by this Court, in a long and, as far as we know, [278] unbroken series of decisions from which we should hesitate to depart. It cannot be pretended that an absolute gift of seventeen of the best and most valuable villages of the raj to the junior wife is within the exception. On the contrary, to recognise such a power in a Hindu father would defeat the first principles of the Hindu law of inheritance and render the continuance of the joint family system impossible. We put it to the counsel for the appellant in the course of his argument, that if he carried it to its logical conclusion, a Raja might dissipate the whole of his ancestral estate, and of his own free will extinguish the raj; and he frankly admitted that he did not shrink from going that length. If for a moment we can entertain questions of policy, we doubt the expediency or propriety of allowing any such doctrine to go abroad. Looking at the matter in its practical aspect, and having regard to the origin and growth of these small powers or principalities, which are not without purpose or usefulness, we are not prepared to admit, at any rate so far as the law governing these Provinces is concerned, except where it is clearly over-riden by well-recognised family custom, any such absolute disposing power in one member of a joint family over an estate which has some of the incidents at least of joint family property. For to do so would involve the inconsistency that while the Raja, or incumbent for the time being, in no way controls the succession after him, he may nevertheless effectually deprive his successor of anything to succeed to. Until corrected by higher authority, we must hold that the law of the Mitakshara is applicable to the present case, and that the defendant Raja and the minor plaintiff, being members of a joint Hindu family, and the estate of the raj being joint ancestral property, the alienation impeached by this suit, not having been made for necessary purposes, is void and must be set aside.

"It only remains for us now to deal with the third contention put forward by the appellant's counsel, namely, that a custom has always existed in the Mahauli raj whereby the Raja for the time being can make alienations of the character challenged in this suit, and that this has been done over a long course of years. They contended that the custom has been well established by their evidence; that some of these witnesses are alienees in possession of parts of the estate conferred on them under the operation of this [279] custom by former Rajas; that no evidence was offered on the other side to contradict or qualify this testimony; and that it is not shown that objection was ever taken to any act of alienation previous to that which is the subject of this action."

In regard to the evidence relating to custom, the Judges said—

"We have to determine whether this evidence sufficiently shows (1) that previous Rajas had, by custom and usage, the absolute uncontrolled powers over the estate claimed by the defendants; (2) that they exercised such powers; (3) that they exercised them in the way and to the extent of the present alienation; and (4) that this custom is not only ancient and certain, but is also reasonable in itself as well as invariable and uncontradicted in its application;" and they concluded thus:—

"Having carefully considered this testimony, we cannot find that it establishes the fact, much less the custom, of any alienation so large in its scope, and so absolute in its character, as that made by the present Raja in favour, exclusively and for ever, of his younger Rani. We are told of settlements on cadets of the Rajah's house (Babuai): of pious and charitable gifts (birt, shankalap, and muafi), and of life allowances for maintenance or education of young Babus. We hear nothing of such an alienation as is challenged on behalf of the Raja apparent in this action, nor do we find anything to show assertion by any Raja, prior to the father of the plaintiff, of a right or title to permanently transfer the estate attaching to the raj. It remains to see how the documentary evidence helps the defendants' case. It is sufficient to say that it does not carry it a step beyond the point reached by the oral testimony. It indicates transfers by Rajas of certain highas in mauzas by way of religious and charitable grants 'under the usual birt conditions and limitations:' transfers of waste lands to Ranis and others to bring into cultivation on a muafi tenure; and gifts of parts of mauzas or of an entire mauza to 'Babus' in virtue of their Babuai right. There are two cases only that wear an apparently different aspect. These are the alleged 'gifts' to the prostitute Musammam Roshan and to Rani Taliwand Kuari. The latter extended to three mauzas only, and the deed of gift has not been produced. We have noticed above the circumstances which favour the theory that it was not an absolute and perpetual conveyance of this property to the Rani, the donee, but partook rather of the character of a life settlement on her and Babuai for the sons she had borne to the Raja donor; but even if it were, one such exceptional instance would be wholly inadequate to establish the custom prayed in aid by the defendants.

"As to the prostitute's gift that conveyed to her 'the muafi rights and interests' in one village only, mauza Koharwa, as her 'birt property,' for which she paid malikana to the Raja, it is needless to point out that this differed toto cælo from the assignment in perpetuity under the deed which is assailed in the present litigation. We are of opinion, for the foregoing reasons, that this appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs, and we order accordingly."

On this appeal,

Mr. R. V. Doyne, for the appellants, argued that the judgment of the High Court was erroneous, and that the gift made by the Raja was valid. The plaintiff could not allege that he had an estate in the nature of a share in joint family property, the raj estate being impartible, and the plaintiff being, at most, entitled to maintenance. Also, on the evidence, it was clear that so much of the estate had been alienated from time to time, without objection made by any son or other expectant heir, that the proof of the custom affirming the right to alienate outweighed that of a custom to the contrary. It should, therefore, have been held that the Raja had power to alienate, and was controlled in the exercise of such power by his son. No interest in impartible estate attached to a son at birth. That right in the case of impartible estate did not, whatever the son's rights were, commence at his birth, as in the case of ordinary estates under the Mitakshara, and there remained no reason for distinguishing such a case as the present from those already disposed of, by the Bengal High Court, in favour of the liberty of alienation. It had not been proved that custom prohibited such an alienation as had been made; on the contrary, the estate was shown to have been reduced in this way to less than it formerly was. Reference was made to Raja [281] Ramnarain Singh v. Pertum Singh (1), Maharani Hiranath Koer v. Baboo Ram Narayan Singh (2), Thakoor Kapilnath Sahai Dec v. The Government (3), which cases, it was contended, were distinguishable from the present, as they related to ancestral estate not diminished by alienation. Raja Udaya Aditya Deb v. Jadub Lal Aditga Deb (4) Stree Raja Yanumula Venkayamah v. Stree Raja Yanumula Boochia Vankondora (5), Neelkisto Deb Burmono v. Beerchunder Thakoor (6). There was no ground for applying the Mitakshara rule as to sons controlling their father's alienation to an impartible raj estate, large portions of which had been subjected to customary alienation.

Mr. F. H. Jeune and Mr. Reginald C. Saunders, for the respondent, argued, in support of the judgment of the High Court, that the Raja's alienation was invalid. The raj estate was by custom impartible and descended to the eldest son: but the custom prevailed only to this extent; and no right of alienation save to make such usual gifts as were made by way of birt, or for pious purposes, or other objects, such as maintenance of dependents or moderate grants incidental to the Raja's position, had been shown to exist by custom. The gifts in question did not answer that description. Although by custom the right of succession belonged only to one member of the family at a time, the other members might in their turn succeed, and were also entitled to be maintained out of the income of the estate. Thus there was a joint interest in the estate, although there was no right to demand a partition. The custom regulating the inheritance only to a certain extent, the law of the Mitakshara, as a necessary result, prevailed as to all other rights.

It was not contended that the raj estate was inalienable only because it was impartible, but it was argued that it was inalienable in the absence of any proved custom of alienation, the ancient Hindu raj not admitting, save in the above exceptional cases, and for reasons of necessity, such as the general law regarded, alienation of the family estate. Although it was impartible, it was not separate estate; and in a qualified, if not in the full, sense it was joint family estate. In place of the ordinary right of partition [282] there stood the special rule of inheritance, but beyond this customary rule, there was a community of interest derived from the general law; and the estate remained that of a joint family, in which each member, being entitled to interest from his birth, and to his turn of succession, had a joint interest. The question in this appeal, in effect, resolved itself into whether the burden of proving the custom, sufficiently to displace the Mitakshara law, had been discharged or not. They contended that to prove this custom of alienation was a burden cast upon those who supported it, and that it had not been discharged.

Reference was made to Katama Nachiar v. The Raja of Shivagunga (7), Sri Raja Yenumula Gavuridevamma Garu v. Sri Raja Yenumula Ramandora Garu (8), Neelkisto Deb Burmono v. Beerchunder Thakoor (6), Stree Raja Yanumula Venkayamah v. Stree Raja Yanumula Boochia Vankondora (5).

JUDGMENT.

SIR R. COUCH.—The question in this appeal is whether a gift of seventeen villages made by the appellant Raja Bhawani Ghulam Pal on the 18th February, 1887, to the appellant, Rani Sartaj Kuari, his younger wife, is valid. The suit was brought by the respondent, as mother and guardian of Lal Narindar Bahadur Pal, the minor son of Bhawani Gulam Pal, against the appellants. The plaint stated that the estate of Mahauli had been in the plaintiff's family for a very long time, and, according to the custom of the country and its neighbourhood and the provisions of Hindu law, the eldest son of the Raja succeeds to the estate; that since the establishment of the raj up to the time of bringing the suit, according to the provisions of Hindu law and the prescriptive and recognised usage, the successor of the Raja and occupant of the gaddi had had no other right under any circumstances except to enjoy [283] possession of the estate during his lifetime, and use its income in maintaining his own respectability and dignity of the estate and in support of the members of the family, leaving the whole estate at the time of his death to his successor. The plaint then stated the gift and prayed for a decree for establishment and declaration of the plaintiff's right by voidance of the deed of gift. The written statements of the defendants alleged that Bhawani Ghulam Pal was proprietor of the estate and authorized to make any transfer, and it would be proved on enquiry that, on account of the separation of the family and other reasons, transfers of every description had been made in the family from of old, without any objection or obstruction being offered.

The history of the family is given in the judgment of the High Court. The estates, which are considerable, lie in the parganas of Tanda and Akbarpur, Fyzabad, in the Province of Oudh, and Mahauli and Rasalpur in the district of Basti, in the North-Western Provinces. It would appear that, some 300 years ago, two brothers, named Alakdeo and Tilakdeo, Surajbansi Rajputs, coming, as they alleged, from Kumaun, invaded the locality in which the property is situated, and killing one Kaulhil, the then Rajbhar, appropriated his lands and made them the nucleus of the present raj. Subsequently, for services rendered or for some other reason, they obtained from one of the Delhi Emperors the title of "Pal," which has now for a long course of years been attached to the family. It was admitted that the raj or estate was impartible; that there was in the family the custom of primogeniture; and that the family was governed by the law of the Mitakshara. The evidence as to the size of the estate originally was very vague, some witnesses saying it contained 600 or 700 villages and others 1,300. At the time of the gift in question it did not contain more than 100. The estate had been thus reduced by gifts by successive Rajas to younger members of the family, who were called Babus, for maintenance, and to Brahmins for religious or charitable purposes. The former classes of gifts were called "birt" and the latter "shankalp." The former were stated by the witnesses to have been of considerable extent, some being of 50 or more villages. It did not appear that a Raja had ever made an alienation by way of [284] sale of any part of the estate. The Subordinate Judge framed the following issue:—

"Is the defendant competent to execute the deed of gift during his lifetime in favour of his second wife according to the family custom and Hindu law? Is the deed of gift legal? Has the plaintiff no right, according to Hindu law, to get it cancelled? Is the plaintiff alone competent to sue in the presence of other rightful heirs, and is the plaintiff's claim legal or not?" The Subordinate Judge decided that the deed of gift was invalid and made a decree for the plaintiff. He appears to have held that, the estate being impartible, it must also be inalienable, unless it was proved that the custom of making transfers had been prevalent in the family, and that the defendant had failed to prove this.

The defendants appealed to the High Court. That Court held that, in the absence of any custom to the contrary, the plaintiff and his father being Hindus and members of a joint Hindu family, and as such subject to the law of the Mitakshara, the estate pertaining to the raj of Mahauli must be regarded as joint family property in which he had an immediate present interest and a right of succession as eldest son. And they said that "they were not prepared to admit, at any rate so far as the law governing these (the North-West) Provinces is concerned, except where it is clearly overridden by well-recognised family custom, an absolute disposing power in one member of a joint family over an estate which has some of the incidents at least of joint family property," and that the defendant Raja and the minor plaintiff, being members of a joint Hindu family, and the estate of the raj being joint ancestral property, and the law of the Mitakshara being applicable, the gift, not having been made for necessary purposes, was void and must be set aside. Accordingly the appeal was dismissed with costs.

A similar view of the law was taken by the High Court at Calcutta in Raja Ramnarain Singh v. Pertum Singh (1).

The great distinction between the doctrine of the Mitakshara in regard to heritage and that of the Dayabhaga, the law in Bengal, is found in ch. 1, s. v. 27, where it is said that property in the paternal or ancestral estate is by birth, and the [285] father is subject to the control of his sons and the rest in regard to the immoveable estate, whether acquired by himself or inherited from his father or other predecessor. In this case, if there were no family custom, the Raja's power over the estate would be governed by this law, and the gift in question would be void. But, as was said by this Committee in the Tipperah case, 12 Moore I. A. 542, "where a custom is proved to exist, it supersedes the general law, which, however, still regulates all beyond the custom." It is admitted that the raj is impartible, and that there is a custom of succession by primogeniture. The question how far the general law of the Mitakshara is superseded and whether the right of the son to control the father is beyond the custom is one of some difficulty.

The Judges of the High Court have quoted in support of their view passages from several judgments of this Committee. In all of them the question was as to the succession to the property on the death of the Raja or zamindar, and it was held that, for the purpose of determining who was entitled to succeed, the estate must be considered as the joint property of the family. The saying in the Shivagunga case (2) "the zamindari, though impartible, was part of the common family property," must be understood with reference to the question which was then before their Lordships. The question of the right of an eldest son or other son to control the father did not arise in that case. In Doorga Prasad Singh v. Durga Kunwari (3) it is evident from what is quoted by the High Court that this question was not considered. In Periasami v. Periasami (4) the language is more guarded. It is said that the estate, though impartible, was up to the year 1829 in a sense the joint property of the joint family of the three brothers. The sense is shown by the previous sentence to be the younger brothers "taking such right and interests in respect of maintenance and possible rights of succession as belong to the junior members of a raj or other impartible estate descendible to a single heir." In Raja Yanumula Venkayamah v. Raja Yanumula Boochia Vankondora (1), which was quoted in the argument for the respondent from a passage in the judgment at p. 339, where the estate is spoken [286] of as being part of the common family property, though impartible, the question in the suit being in regard to the succession, their Lordships at p. 340, after noticing evidence of the grants of portions of the estate, say: "These grants by way of maintenance are in the ordinary course of what is done by a person in the enjoyment of a raj or impartible estate in favour of the junior members of the family, who but for the impartibility of the estate would be co-parceners with him." This is a clear opinion that, though an impartible estate may be for some purposes spoken of as joint family property, the co-parcenary in it which under the Mitakshara law is created by birth does not exist.

And in Baboo Beer Pertab Sahee v. Maharaja Rajender Pertab Sahee (2), the case of the zamindari of Hansapore in Behar, where the Mitakshara law prevails, an impartible raj, which by family usage and custom descended according to the rule of primogeniture, subject to the burthen of making Eabuana allowances to the junior members of the family for maintenance, the question was whether the Raja had power to make a testamentary disposition of the raj to one member of his family to the prejudice of his other male descendants and co-heirs, their Lordships held that the foundation of the supposed restriction on the power of the father to make a will was the community of interest which the members of the family acquired by birth, and said "cessante ratione legis cessat et ipsa lex."

The reason for the restraint upon alienation under the law of the Mitakshara is inconsistent with the custom of impartibility and succession according to primogeniture. The inability of the father to make an alienation arises from the proprietary right of the sons. "Among un-separated kinsmen, the consent of all is indispensably requisite, because no one is fully empowered to make an alienation, since the estate is in common." (Mitakshara, ch. 1, s. 1, v. 30).

The argument in support of the view of the High Court appears to be that although the sons do not take an interest by birth, so as to enable them to hold the estate or to have a partition, they have, as members of a joint family, some interest which is sufficient [287] to enable them to prevent an alienation. The learned Judges of the High Court say: "it must be conceded that the complete rights of ordinary co-parcenership in the other members of the family, to the extent of joint enjoyment and the and the capacity to demand partition, are merged in, or perhaps, to use a more correct term, subordinated to the title of the individual member to the incumbency of the estate, but the contingency of survivorship remains along with the right to maintenance in a sufficiently substantial form to preserve for them a kind of dormant co-ownership."

In the case in the 11th Bengal L. R. 397, it seems to have been considered that the son was a co-sharer with the father. It is said (p. 405) in the judgment: "It appears to me, then, on the facts with which we have to deal, that we must take the property which is the subject of suit to have been ancestral property, which descended with the joint family in the ordinary way, subject to the effect of an established custom in regard to its partibility amongst the existing joint members of the family, and in this view of the facts it is evident that the father had no power against his son, who was unquestionably joint with him as regards this property, to alienate or incumber the estate excepting upon a justification of a family necessity." Both Courts appear to have thought that, in order to prevent alienation by the father, there must be a co-ownership in the son or sons.

The property in the paternal or ancestral estate acquired by birth under the Mitakshara law is, in their Lordships' opinion, so connected with the right to a partition that it does not exist where there is no right to it. In the Hansapur case there was a right to have Babuana allowances as there is in this case, but that was not thought to create a community of interest which would be a restraint upon alienation. By the custom or usage the eldest son succeeds to the whole estate on the death of the father, as he would if the property were held in severalty. It is difficult to reconcile this mode of succession with the rights of a joint family, and to hold that there is a joint ownership, which is a restraint upon alienation. It is not so difficult where the holder of the estate has no son, and it is necessary to decide who is to succeed. In [288] Bengal there is joint family property, but where property is held by the father as its head, his issue have no legal claim upon him or the property except for their maintenance. He can dispose of it as he pleases, and they cannot require a partition. The sons have not ownership while the father is alive and free from defect. Upon his death the property in the sons arises, and with it the right to a partition; Dayabhaga, ch. 1. In the case of the raj of Patcum in Chota Nagpore, which was admitted to be an impartible raj, and one in which the custom of primogeniture existed, it was held by the High Court at Calcutta (1) that it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that there was some custom which would prevent the operation of the general law empowering alienation, and that proof of a custom that the estate descended to the eldest son to the exclusion of the other sons was not sufficient. On an appeal from this judgment this Committee was of opinion that it should be affirmed (2). In Narain Khootia v. Lokenath Khootia (3) it was held by the same High Court that the fact that the raj of Chota Nagpore is impartible does not prevent the Maharaja for the time being from making grants of portions of it in perpetuity. And it is stated in the judgment that the family is governed by the law of the Mitakshara. It had been previously held by the same Court in a case in 13 Bengal L. R. 445, where the plaintiff alleged that the descent of the estate was governed by Mitakshara law, and that by the usage and custom of the family the estate was impartible and descendible according to the law of primogeniture on the male heirs of the original grantee, the estate was not on the case stated shown to be inalienable. Their Lordships think this is the correct view.

If, as their Lordships are of opinion, the eldest son, where the Mitakshara law prevails and there is the custom of primogeniture, does not become a co-sharer with his father in the estate, the inalienability of the estate depends upon custom, which must be proved, or, it may be in some cases, upon the nature of the tenure. The Subordinate Judge and the High Court thought that the onus was upon the defendants (the appellants) to prove that by custom the estate was alienable, and they have found that the custom was [289] not proved. Their Lordships have not to consider whether these concurrent findings should be questioned. They have to see whether it is proved that there is a custom of inalienability. The fact that there is no evidence of a sale of any portion of the estate is in the plaintiff's favour; but this is not sufficient. The absence of evidence of an alienation without any evidence of facts which would make it probable that an alienation would have been made cannot be accepted as proof of a custom of inalienability. For the foregoing reasons, their Lordships are of opinion that the plaintiff has failed to show that the gift ought to be declared to be invalid, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the decrees of the lower Courts, and to decree that the suit be dismissed with costs in both these Courts. The respondent will pay the costs of this appeal.

MUHAMMAD ISMAIL KHAN AND OTHERS (Defendants).
[7th April, 1888.]

Muhammadan Law—Inheritance—Legitimacy—Acknowledgment of sonship—Practice—Remand—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 562, 563, 564, 566.

Per EDGE, C. J., and STRAIGHT, J.—The rules of the Muhammadan law relating to acknowledgment by a Muhammadan of another as his son are rules of the substantive law of inheritance. Such an acknowledgment, unless certain impediments exist, confers upon the person acknowledged the status of a legitimate son capable of inheriting. Where there is no proof of legitimate birth or of illegitimate birth, and the paternity of a child is unknown, in the sense that no specific person is shown to be the father, then the acknowledgment of him by another who claims him as a son affords a conclusive presumption that he is the legitimate child of the acknowledger, and places him in that category. Such a status once conferred cannot be destroyed by any subsequent act of the acknowledger or of any one claiming through him.

[290] Per MAHMOOD, J.—Although, according to the Muhammadan law, ikrar or acknowledgment in general stands upon much the same footing as an admission as defined in the Evidence Act, acknowledgments of parentage and other matters of personal status stand upon a higher footing than matters of evidence, and form a part of the substantive Muhammadan law. So far as inheritance through males is concerned, the existence of consanguinity and legitimate descent is an indispensable condition precedent to the right of succession, and such legitimate descent depends upon the existence of a valid marriage between the parents. Where legitimacy cannot be established by direct proof of such a marriage, acknowledgment is recognised by the Muhammadan law as a means whereby marriage of the parents or legitimate descent may be established as a matter of substantive law. Such acknowledgment always proceeds upon the hypothesis of a lawful union between the parents and the legitimate descent of the acknowledged person from the acknowledger, and there is nothing in the Muhammadan law similar to adoption as recognised by the Roman and Hindu systems, or admitting of an affiliation which has no reference to consanguinity or legitimate descent. A child whose illegitimacy is proved beyond doubt, by reason of the marriage of its parents being either disproved or found to be unlawful, cannot be legitimatised by acknowledgment. Acknowledgment has only the effect of legitimation where either the fact of the marriage or its exact time, with reference to the legitimacy of the child's birth, is a matter of uncertainty.

Ashruf-ood-Dowlah Ahmed Hossein Khan v. Hyder Hossein Khan (1), Mahammad Azmat Ali Khan v. Lall Begam (2), and Sadakat Hossein v. Mahomed Yusuf (3) referred to.

In a suit for possession of property by right of inheritance, the Court framed six issues, four of which it tried and decided. With reference to its finding upon the principal of these issues, which related to the plaintiff's legitimacy, the Court dismissed the suit, observing that, in the view which it took of the case, the determination of the remaining issues was unnecessary. Some of the defendants had filed a statement of defence upon which no issues were framed, and no evidence taken, apparently in consequence of the attention of the Court being directed almost exclusively to the main issue as to the plaintiff's legitimacy. There was no formal order excluding evidence on any point. On appeal, the High Court reversed the first Court's finding on the issue with reference to which the suit had been dismissed below.

Held by EDGE, C.J., and MAHMOOD, J., (STRAIGHT, J., dissenting) that s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code applied not only to cases where the first Court had expressly excluded evidence, but also to cases where the parties were or might have been misled by the act of the Court as to the issues or the evidence necessary, and where, in consequence of the Court erroneously considering one issue only, the parties did not tender or bring forward their evidence; and that, as in the present case, evidence had been excluded in this broad sense, s. 562 (the operation of which in such cases should be rather expanded than limited) was applicable, and the case should be remanded for trial of the remaining issues.

[291] Held by STRAIGHT, J., contra, that, with reference to ss. 562, 563 and 564, the case could not be remanded under s. 562 because it had not been disposed of upon a preliminary point so as to exclude evidence of fact, and the Court should therefore proceed to dispose of it upon the evidence on the record, if any; and that an issue should be remitted to the lower Court under s. 566.

[See 8 A. 234, wherein this appeal has arisen.]

THIS was an appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent from a judgment of Brodhurst, J., dated the 22nd March, 1886, dissenting from the judgment of Petheram, C. J., and affirming the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut, who had dismissed the suit. The facts of the case are stated in the report of the case before the Division Bench (4) and in the judgment of Straight, J., now reported. For the purpose of making the arguments of counsel intelligible the following summary will be sufficient:—The parties were Sunni Muhammadans. The suit was brought by Muhammad Allahdad Khan and Musammatt Hakim-un-nissa (to whom Muhammad Allahdad Khan had sold his rights and interests in a portion of the property in dispute) against Muhammad Ismail Khan and his three sisters, and three other persons, for a declaration of right to and possession of two shares in certain villages left by Ghulam Ghaus Khan, father of the first four defendants, upon the ground that the first-mentioned plaintiff was the eldest son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan and brother of the defendants, and was therefore entitled to the shares, under the Muhammadan law, by right of succession. The defence of the first four defendants was to the effect that Allahdad Khan was only the step-son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, having been born prior to the marriage of his mother, Moti Begam, with Ghulam Ghaus Khan. The case of the plaintiffs was that even if they failed to prove that Allahdad Khan was the son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, yet Ghulam Ghaus Khan had, on various occasions, acknowledged him to be his son, and therefore, under the Muhammadan law, Allahdad Khan was entitled to inherit as the legitimate son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan. They filed certain letters and other documents in which the deceased expressly referred to Allahdad Khan as his son; and contended that these references amounted to acknowledgments of him as a son by the deceased, which, under the Muhammadan law, gave him the status of a legitimate son.

(1) 11 M.I.A. 94. (2) 9 I.A. 8 = 8 C. 422. (3) 11 I.A. 31 = 10 C. 663. (4) 8 A. 234.

[292] The defendants 5, 6, 7, held a lease of parts of the property in suit from the daughters of Gulam Ghaus Khan. They filed a written statement of defence in the following terms:—

“That defendants have taken the lease of the villages from the actual owners, and they have reason to believe that the plaintiff is not the legitimate son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan. Defendants have, year after year, paid in good faith the lease-money to the daughters of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, the owners of the property, from whom defendants have taken the lease. Defendants have been unnecessarily joined as parties to the suit.”

No issue was fixed by the Court of first instance with reference to this written statement. The issues which it framed were:—“1. Whether Allahdad Khan, plaintiff, is a son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan? 2. Whether this suit is vitiated by the defect of champerty and ought for that reason to fail? 3. What amount of stamp duty ought, according to law, to have been paid on the deed to Hakim-un-nissa, and is it receivable in evidence in this suit? 4. Had Allahdad Khan, plaintiff, knowledge of the proceedings in the former suits while they were pending, and is his not being a party to them a bar to this suit? 5. What amount of debts, if any, due by Ghulam Ghaus Khan has been paid by Ismail Khan? 6. What sort of decree, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to?”

The Court decided the first four of these issues only. After dealing at length with the first issue and deciding it against the plaintiffs, the Subordinate Judge observed that, in his view of the case, it was not necessary to determine the other issues.

The conclusions of the learned Judges of the Division Bench hearing the appeal are thus summarised in the head-note of the report at I.L.R., 8 All. 235:—“Held by Petheram, C.J., that the acknowledgment by the deceased of the plaintiff as his son in fact conferred upon the latter the status of a legitimate son capable of inheriting the deceased's estate, although the evidence showed that the deceased never treated him as a legitimate son or intended to give him the status of legitimacy. Held by Brodhurst, J., that the documents above referred to did not show more than that the deceased regarded the plaintiff as his step-son; that the plaintiff was never called his son except by courtesy, and in the [293] sense in which a European would ordinarily describe his step-son as his son: and that there was no sufficient evidence of acknowledgment from which an inference was fairly to be deduced that the deceased ever intended to recognise the plaintiff and give him the status of a son capable of inheriting.”

The grounds on which the plaintiffs appealed from the judgment of Brodhurst, J., were as follows:—

Mr. G. T. Spankie, the Hon. T. Conlan and Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri, for the respondents.

The Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath for the appellants, referred to a passage in Syed Amir Ali's "Personal law of the Muhammadans" (at pp. 166, 167), to the effect that the Muhammadan law does not recognise adoption in the sense of the Roman and Hindu legal systems or "any mode of filiation where the parentage of the person adopted is known to belong to a person other than the adopting father;" but only the form of filiation created by ikrar or "acknowledgment," which can be established by the father alone. The essential condition of this mode of filiation is that the person to be filiated must not be known to be the son of a person other than the acknowledger. The author goes on to say that such acknowledgment may be either express or implied, and may be inferred from treatment of the child. See also Elberling's Treatise on Inheritance, &c., pp. 43, 44. The rules of the Muhammadan law as to acknowledgment are not mere rules of evidence. If a Muhammadan acknowledges another to be his brother, that, according to the Muhammadan law, does not prove the relationship asserted, but makes the acknowledged the heir of the acknow-[294] ledger in the absence of other heirs. On the other hand, an acknowledgment of another as son is deemed to constitute the consanguinity. He also referred to Baillie's Digest of the Muhammadan Law, pp. 404, 405.

[EDGE, C.J.—The passage at p. 105 seems to show that the circumstances must amount to a reasonable presumption of actual paternity.]

My contention is that it is not a question of presumptive or other evidence: the acknowledgment has the force of an affiliation.

[STRAIGHT, J., referred to Najmooddeen Ahmed v. Bebee Zuhomun (1), in which Macpherson, J., cited the passage from Baillie, pp. 404, 405, as establishing the proposition that the acknowledgment of the father renders the son a legitimate son and heir, whether the mother was or was not lawfully married to the father.]

The acknowledgment is binding not only on the acknowledger but on all the world. The acknowledged person succeeds his brothers as their heir. This suggests that the acknowledgment does not merely operate by way of estoppel or conclusive proof. It cannot be contradicted either by the acknowledger or by any of the other members of his family. If ever brought into question, the inquiry must be limited to ascertaining whether, in fact, words or conduct amounting to an acknowledgment were ever uttered or took place. If this is proved, the affiliation follows as a necessary legal consequence and cannot be questioned.

[MAHMOOD, J.—Syed Amir Ali at p. 188 of his book points out that the adoption practised by the pre-Islamic Arabs was abolished by reason of the teaching of the Prophet; and in the Koran there is a verse which says that no one can be the son of a man from whose loins he has not sprung. It appears to me that, under the Muhammadan law, affiliation independent of blood relationship does not exist.

The passage referred to merely condemns the kind of adoption formerly practised; it does not prohibit affiliation by acknowledgment. See also Grady's edition of the Hedaya (Hamilton's translation), 2nd ed., p. 439 ("acknowledgments of parentage with [295] respect to infants"). This shows that once an acknowledgment has been proved, nothing further is required to constitute parentage.

[STRAIGHT, J., referred to Muhammad Azmat Ali Khan v. Musammat Lalli Begam (1).]

In Macnaghten's Principles of Muhammadan law (chapter IV, on Parentage) it is laid down that "if a man acknowledge another to be his son, and there be nothing which obviously renders it impossible that such relation should exist between them, the parentage will be established."

[EDGE, C. J.—Does not that mean that, under the circumstances stated, the actual parentage is to be deemed proved?]

No; the actual parentage is, ex hypothesi, unknown, and the acknowledgment operates as an affiliation. It resembles in some respects the Kritrima form of adoption in the Hindu law.

In the Sirajiyyah (Sir William Jones' translation, edited by Rumsey, p. 3), in enumerating the different classes of heirs, reference is made "to him who was acknowledged as a kinsman through another, so as not to prove his consanguinity." This explains the passage already quoted from Elberling (p. 44); and the distinction which it implies is that an acknowledgment of collateral relationship does not establish consanguinity, but that an acknowledgment of paternity does so. See also Grady's edition of the Hedaya, p. 438 ("but it is annulled by a subsequent acknowledgment of the stranger being his son," &c.). The Hedaya draws no distinction between rules of substantive law and rules of evidence or procedure. It discusses in the same place acknowledgment or ikrar in all its aspects and in connection with all matters in which it may come in question. [He also referred to the Durrul Mukhtar.]

[MAHMOOD, J.—If it is not a question of evidence, but acknowledgment operates as a sort of adoption or affiliation, why should it be essential to the validity of an acknowledgment that the acknowledged person should not be known to be son of any one other than the acknowledger?]

That condition was imposed in order to prevent adoptions of the kind practised by the pre-Islamic Arabs (Sale's translation of the [296] Koran, chapter XXXIII). The judgment of the Privy Council in Muhammad Azmat Ali Khan v. Musammat Lalli Begam (1) is strongly in my favour. See in particular pp. 17, 18 and 19 of the report. The decision is an authority for the principle that an acknowledgment by a Muhammadan is not merely evidence. It is a question of fact in each case whether there has or has not been an acknowledgment. If this is proved, the legitimacy is established. The passages at pp. 18, 19 clearly show where the question of evidence ends and the question of substantive law begins. What can the following sentence mean, if not the proposition for which I contend?—"An ante-nuptial child is illegitimate. A child born out of wedlock is illegitimate; if acknowledged he acquires the status of legitimacy" (p. 18).

[EDGE, C. J.—Suppose a case in which a woman is known to be married, but her husband has been absent from her for more than a year. Could her child be affiliated by any one other than her husband? Or suppose that the husband, though absent, has had an opportunity of access to the wife.]

In the former case there could be such an affiliation but s. 112 of the Evidence Act would prevent it in the latter.

[MAHMOOD, J.—Do you contend that the offspring of admitted or proved adultery could be legitimated by acknowledgment?]

Yes. The question is treated as an open one in Sadakat Hossein v. Mahomed Yusuf (1). In that case it was held by the Privy Council that the marriage of the acknowledger with the mother of the acknowledged was not proved; and nevertheless the acknowledgment was held to confer the status of legitimacy. Even if the question is regarded as one of evidence, the principles of the Muhammadan law on the subject should be applied: Khajah Hidayat Oolah v. Rai Jan Khanum (2), Ranee Khujooroon-nisa v. Musammatt Roushun Jehan (3).

[MAHMOOD, J.—The case reported in Moore was decided long before the Evidence Act came into force,

[297] STRAIGHT, J.—It appears to me to lay down only what is practically the rule of English law, that marriage may be inferred from prolonged cohabitation.]

Oomda Beebee v. Syud Shah Jonah Ali (4) and in the matter of the petition of Musammatt Bibi Najib-un-nissa (5) are strong authorities in my favour.

[MAHMOOD, J.—The judgments in those cases were based on Baillie's Digest and Macnaghten's Principles, and the learned Judges evidently had no opportunity of consulting the original texts.

STRAIGHT, J., referred to Mahomed Bauker Hossein Khan v. Shurf-oon-nissa Begam (6) and Muhammad Ismail Khan v. Fidayat-un-nissa (7).

[EDGE, C. J.—Can we as a matter of law determine whether Ghulam Ghaus Khan intended what is alleged to be an acknowledgment to have the effect of an affiliation?]

I contend that if, upon the face of it, it is an acknowledgment, the question of intention cannot be gone into.

[EDGE, C. J.—Then you say that if one man says to another "You are my son," the words, prima facie, work an affiliation?]

Yes, assuming that the person acknowledged admits the affiliation and the three conditions stated at pp. 167, 168 of Mr. Amir Ali's "Personal Law of the Muhammadans" are fulfilled. I contend, moreover, that in this case there is practically un rebutted evidence which, together with the presumptions of marriage from continued cohabitation and of legitimacy, establish that the appellant is the legitimate son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan.

Mr. G. T. Spankie for the respondents.—Assuming the question to be one of substantive law, and not merely of evidence, still the "acknowledgment" of the Muhammadan law means an acknowledgment not merely of sonship, but of legitimate sonship. This is the real meaning of the judgments of the Privy Council which have been cited. As pointed out by

(1) 11 I. A. 31 = 10 C. 663.

(2) 3 M. I. A. 295.

(3) 3 I. A. 291.

(6) 8 M.I.A. 159.

(7) 3 A. 723, affirmed on appeal by the Privy Council, 8 A. 516.

Mr. Amir [298] Ali, an acknowledgment may be either express or implied. An implied acknowledgment is a continuous and consistent course of treatment of another as a legitimate son. An express acknowledgment must have the same meaning, the only difference being that it consists of words instead of acts. Otherwise the words "This boy is my son" would give the status of legitimacy in the face of a twenty years' treatment as an illegitimate son, both before and after the words were uttered. Where there is an express acknowledgment, its meaning in the particular case must always be considered. The words "This is my son" either may or may not have the effect of a legitimation, according to circumstances. See Ashruf-ood-dowlah v. Hyder Hossein Khan (1) at pp. 103, 104 and 106 of the report. The case is no authority for the proposition that a mere acknowledgment of sonship amounts to an affiliation. In Muhammad Azmat Ali Khan v. Musammat Lalli Begam (2) the Privy Council did not content themselves with saying that the acknowledgment was proved, but they considered that there was strong evidence as to treatment.

[STRAIGHT, J.—The facts here are that, forty-five years ago, Moti Begam, the appellant's mother, was admittedly the wife of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, though the time of marriage is not shown. The appellant was brought up in the same house; he is written to and described by members of Ghulam Ghaus Khan's family as if he were Ghulam Ghaus Khan's legitimate son. Other children of Ghulam Ghaus Khan and Moti Begam are admittedly legitimate. Under these circumstances, why should we not presume that the appellant also is a legitimate son of the same father?

EDGE, C. J.—You will have to deal with the question whether in presuming legitimacy from cohabitation, it is or is not essential to show that the period of cohabitation covered a time when the person to whom the dispute relates could have been conceived.]

In Muhammad Azmat Ali Khan v. Musammat Lali Begam (2) the decision really turned on the evidence of legitimacy, and it was nowhere suggested, from the Court of first instance to the Privy Council, that a bare acknowledgment of sonship would be sufficient. [299] Upon the hypothesis put forward on the other side, one letter containing a clear statement as to sonship would have been unanswerable; but the evidence of treatment was fully gone into. In the case reported in 11 Moore, at p. 104, acknowledgment in the sense of the Muhammadan law is described as "acknowledgment of antecedent right established by the acknowledgment on the acknowledger, that is, in the sense of a recognition not simply of sonship, but of legitimacy as a son." Again in Sadakat Hossein v. Mahomed Yusuf (3) their Lordships of the Privy Council accept the conclusion of the Courts below "that there was sufficient evidence of the acknowledgment by Amir Hossein of Selim as his son, from which an inference is fairly to be deduced that the father intended to recognize him and give him the status of a son capable of inheriting." Surely this implies that it is a question of evidence. All the authorities on the Muhammadan law treat it as such a question. The passage which has been cited from p. 439 of Grady's Hedaya must be read with the definition of ikrar at p. 427 as "the notification or avowal of the right of another upon oneself." Whether such an avowal is intended by a particular statement is a matter of evidence; and nothing short of such an avowal constitutes an "acknowledgment" as understood in the Muhammadan law.

Taking the legitimacy of the defendant Muhammad Ismail Khan and the marriage of his parents ten months prior to his birth as proved, nothing can be inferred as to cohabitation before that time. The facts do not warrant any presumption as to the cohabitation of Ghulam Ghaus Khan with Moti Begam three years or so previously, or as to the date of their marriage, or as to the appellant's legitimacy. If it were permissible to infer from the fact of Muhammad Ismail Khan's legitimacy that his parents were married three years prior to his birth, it would be equally permissible if the interval were twenty years or more; and this shows how unsafe such an inference would be.

A passage in Grady's Hedaya, at p. 439, showing that an acknowledgment made by a woman may be contradicted, confirms [300] the view that the question is always one of evidence. See also 9 I. A., p. 14, where an acknowledgment in a formal report to Government, which speaks of the acknowledged as the acknowledger's son, is described as "almost conclusive;" and there occurs this sentence:—"He not only calls him his son, but treats him as he treated Azmat, his undoubted legitimate son." If the acknowledgment had been considered as ipso facto establishing the legitimacy, it would have been inconsistent to proceed to examine the evidence on the point of legitimacy. The word ikrar means "admission," and admissions form a distinct part of the law of evidence. The Muhammadan law of evidence is excluded by s. 24 of the Bengal Civil Courts Act (VI of 1871). By s. 2 of the Evidence Act, all rules of evidence other than those contained in that Act or some other part of the statute law are expressly repealed. It is true that the case is one of succession, in which the Muhammadan law is saved by s. 24 of the Bengal Civil Courts Act; but it does not follow that the particular question under consideration should be treated as relating to succession: Mazhar Ali v. Budh Singh (2). All the old authorities as to acknowledgment imply the acknowledger's belief that the acknowledged is in fact his son; and affiliation is unknown in cases where the former has had no intercourse with the mother of the latter. This is implied by the three conditions which all writers on the Muhammadan law lay down as essential to the validity of acknowledgments. The use of acknowledgments is always to legitimatise children whose legitimacy is doubtful. The system originated in the practice of cohabitation with slave-girls, who had opportunities of promiscuous intercourse, and whose children, brought up in the master's house, were often of uncertain parentage.

The Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath, for the appellants, in reply.

ORDER OF REMAND.

STRAIGHT, J.—This is an appeal, under s. 10 of the Letters Patent, from a judgment of my brother Brodhurst, dated the 22nd March, 1886, affirming, in difference with the opinion of Petheram, C.J., a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut of the 3rd of March, 1885. The suit to which the appeal relates was instituted by the plaintiff-appellant before us on the 13th of May, [301] 1884, in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut, for a declaration of his right to and possession of his share of the property left by his deceased father, Ghulam Ghaus Khan, who died on the 6th of November, 1879. The defendants cited by him were, Muhammad Ismail Khan, son, and Musammats Fidayat-un-nissa

(1) 4 Camp, at p. 416, and 6 Ves. Jun., 251.

(2) 7 A. 297.

Karamat un-nissa, and Barkat-un-nissa, daughters of the said Ghulam Ghaus Khan, and four other persons, lessees or mortgagees in possession of portions of the property leased or mortgaged to them by the other defendants. The real contesting defendant was Muhammad Ismail Khan, and the single and substantial position taken up by him with which we are concerned is that the plaintiff was not a son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, but that he was born of the body of one Musammat Moti Begam before her marriage with Ghulam Ghaus Khan. The Subordinate Judge found that "the weight of evidence on the record then proves that Allahdad is not really a son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, and that he never really acknowledged him as such," and he accordingly dismissed the suit. The plaintiff then appealed to this Court, and the case came before a Division Bench consisting of Petheram, C. J., and Brodhurst, J. The former was of opinion that the evidence established that "Allahdad Khan was the illegitimate son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan; that he was born before the marriage of Ghulam Ghaus Khan and Moti Begam; that it is proved by evidence, the truth of which is beyond doubt, that upon several occasions in 1861 and 1862 Ghulam Ghaus Khan did at that time acknowledge the plaintiff, Allahdad Khan, to be his son in fact, and that the case resolves itself into a pure question of law, namely, what, according to the Muhammadan law, is the effect of an acknowledgment by a Muhammadan that a particular person born of the acknowledger's wife before marriage is his son? How does such an acknowledgment affect the status of the person in reference to whom it is made?" Petheram, C. J., then proceeded to discuss three rulings of their Lordships of the Privy Council reported in 11 Moore's Indian Appeals, p. 94, L. R. 9 I. A., p. 8, and L. R. 11 I. A., page 31, which in the result he took to be authorities for the proposition that "an acknowledgment of children by a Muhammadan as his sons gives them the status of legitimacy." Upon this view of the matter he would have reversed the decision of the Subordinate Judge and decreed [302] the plaintiff's claim. Brodhurst, J., found—"From the evidence and the whole circumstances of the case it is, I think, palpable that Allahdad was not the son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan; that he was not legitimated by Ghulam Ghaus, and that he well knew that he was at the highest nothing more than Ghulam Ghaus Khan's stepson, had never been called his son except by courtesy, and had no right to any share in his (Ghulam Ghaus's) property." He also referred to the case in L. R. 11 I. A., p. 31, and observed: "I see nothing to lead me to believe that Ghulam Ghaus ever regarded Allahdad in any other light than that of a stepson: and applying the principle contained in the above remarks of their Lordships of the Privy Council to the present case, I find that there is no sufficient evidence of the acknowledgment by Ghulam Ghaus Khan of Allahdad Khan as his son from which an inference is fairly to be deduced that Ghulam Ghaus ever intended to recognise him, and give him the status of a son capable of inheriting, and I would therefore dismiss the appeal with costs." It is from this judgment of Brodhurst, J., that the appeal now before us has been preferred. The case was very ably argued at the hearing on both sides, and the delay in pronouncing judgment has occurred owing to the necessity that arose for consulting the original texts of the Muhammadan law and considering them in conjunction with the several rulings of their Lordships of the Privy Council to which Petheram, C. J., referred. The contentions for the appellant were—1st, that the evidence established Allahdad Khan, the plaintiff, to be the legitimate son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan; 2nd, that the acknowledgments the right of another [309] person against the principal in the one case and the ward in the other (1.)

"The requirement of acknowledgment is that it should be indicative of that in respect of which the acknowledgment is made, not a mere allusion thereto. This means that it is indispensable that the acknowledgment should expressly state the subject of the acknowledgment as if it already exists, and that by the acknowledgment the proof thereof is expressed. It is not an effect of an acknowledgment that anything is for the first time founded or established, and it is on this account that when the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made comes to know that the acknowledger was false in his acknowledgment, the subject of the acknowledgment is not lawful to such a person (as a matter between him and his Creator, the Almighty), since he would in such a case be taking the subject of acknowledgment without the real willingness of the acknowledger. But if the acknowledger has delivered the subject of acknowledgment willingly, then it is lawful and becomes like an investiture of ownership by the acknowledger, and as such on the footing of a gift. This is so because ownership is established in favour of him for whom the acknowledgment is made, and this without any verification or acceptance on his part; but such ownership is nullified by his rejecting it, so that if he first verifies it and then rejects it, such rejection is not valid. So in the Kofi (2).

"(ii) If a person acknowledges the sonship of a boy whose descent is unknown, and he is such that one like him can be born of one [310] like the acknowledger, and the boy verifies the acknowledgment, his descent is established. This has accidentally been mentioned with reference to the sonship of a boy, because, even if the acknowledgment of a daughterhood is made in respect of a woman, the same rule applies. But it is essential that such sonship (or daughterhood) should be without an intermediary link: so much so that if an acknowledgment is made that the boy is the son's son of the acknowledger, the descent is not established, and this result is similar to that of acknowledging another to be a brother (1).

"It is a condition precedent (to the validity of acknowledgment of parentage) that the descent of the acknowledged be unknown, because, if his descent is known, his sonship other than his parent would be impossible. What is meant by a descent not being known is that it should be unknown in the town in which he resides, and this explanation is contained in the Kifaya that the trustworthy reference is to the place of birth. It is stated in the Kenaya that when a person regarding one whose descent is known says, "This is my son, and when I die all my estate is his," then according to some of the jurists the acknowledged will be entitled to one-third : of the estate by way of legacy, whilst according to other jurists he would not be entitled even to one-third ; and this last doctrine seems to be most consistent with right principles (2).

"The limitation that the acknowledged might have been born of the acknowledger means that the age of the acknowledger should exceed the age of the acknowledged at least by twelve years, and this because it is the minimum period of puberty for a youth : [311] and this limitation is necessary, because, if the acknowledger had not attained puberty, the acknowledgment would be falsified obviously. It is also a condition that the acknowledged boy should verify the acknowledgment, because, if he does not verify, an impediment is created and his descent is not established by the mere acknowledgment, but requires proof. This, however, applies only to cases in which the boy acknowledged is capable of expressing himself ; when he is too young to express himself, verification by him is not a condition. It is stated in the chapter on the manumission of slaves in the Fatawa Kazi Khan that some jurists have held that sonship is not established unless it is verified by the person in whose favour it is made. But the correct doctrine is that such a condition is not essential as above stated, and this is in conformity with the doctrine of the Hedaya and many other books (1)."

begotten by such an acknowledger, because, if the acknowledged is older in age, the obvious fact falsifies the acknowledgment. Indeed, Malik has gone the length of holding that even if notoriety contradicts the acknowledged, such as by indicating that he was an Indian whilst the acknowledged boy was a Persian, the latter's descent is not established. The restriction that the acknowledged youth should verify the acknowledger has been imposed because the rule as to a youth who can express himself is applicable owing [312] to his being in his own competency, whilst, on the contrary, an infant is in the power of another, and as such descends to the footing of animals, and no importance is attached to his verification. But according to the three Masters (i.e., Imam Abu Hanifa, Imam Muhammad and Kazi Abu Yusuf) the descent is established without any such verification if the acknowledged be below the age of discretion. The descent is established because it is one of the necessities of nature, and there can be no objection thereto, even though the acknowledger be in sickness at the time of the acknowledgment. The acknowledged youth will participate with the heirs in the inheritance, because such is one of the consequences of the proof of descent. The acknowledgment by such in respect of a child or parents or wife or a manumitted slave will hold good, because, since it does not involve attribution of descent to any one else, the acknowledgment must be accepted (1)."

Express acknowledgment is when a man says 'The child is mine,' or says 'This is my child;' and implied acknowledgment is that the man should remain silent when he is being congratulated upon [314] the birth of the child in which case he may be required to take an oath. So in the Ghayat-ul-bayun (1).

"(ii) If the husband is without penis and she is not aware of his condition and gives birth to a child and he claims him, then the Kazi is to hold his descent to be established; and if she thereafter comes to be aware of his condition and therefore claims separation, she is entitled to do so, because the child necessarily becomes his even without proof of sexual intercourses (2).

There is difference of opinion as to the exact fixation of this time, because the question is whether these six months are to be calculated from the date of the marriage or from the time of retirement. Abu Hanifa and Abu Yusuf (on whom be peace!) regard this from date of the marriage; but Muhammad regards the six months from the time of retirement, and this is the accepted doctrine. In the case of a valid marriage all the three Masters are agreed that the period is to be regarded from the time of the marriage. Some of the jurists have said that in the case of the valid marriage retirement is not a condition precedent, but that there must be a state of things when they might have had intercourse.(2)

"A man has had illicit intercourse with a woman and she is impregnated by him, and during her pregnancy he marries her and has not had sexual intercourse with her till she gives birth to a child; then they (i.e., the three) have held that the marriage is valid, if she was not during her iddat in consequence of some one else and penitence is necessary for him; and the jurist Abulhai [316] holds that if she gives birth to the child after the expiration of six months or more from the time of the marriage, the marriage is lawful and the descent is established. But if she gives birth to the child in less than six months from the date of the marriage, the marriage is not established and the child will not inherit from him unless the man says 'This is a son from me' and does not say 'This is the offspring of illegitimate intercourse' (1).

specific rule of the substantive Muhammdan law relating to inheritance to which we are bound to give effect. Birth during wedlock, that is to say, legitimate birth, necessarily confers a right to inherit; illegitimate birth, that is, without wedlock, subsisting between the father and mother at the date of the child's begetting, confers no such right. But where there is no proof of legitimate birth or illegitimate birth and the paternity of a child is unknown in the sense that no specific person is shown to have been his father, then his acknowledgment by another, who claims him as his son, according to the authorities I have quoted from, affords a conclusive presumption that the child acknowledged is the legitimate child of the acknowledger and places him in that category. In the present case we have the fact that Moti Begam, the undoubted mother of the plaintiff, admittedly at some time or other—when it was we have no reliable proof—became the wife of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, that the plaintiff was acknowledged as a son by Ghulam Ghaus Khan and treated by him as such, and the plaintiff accepted and described himself as holding that position. It seems to me, therefore, that the requirements of the rule of the Muhammadan law have been satisfied, and that the plaintiff has established his acknowledgment and recognition by Ghulam Ghaus Khan as a son which gave him the status of a son and a title to inherit. This being so, it remains to be seen whether such a status once conferred can be destroyed by any subsequent act of the acknowledger or those who claim through him. It is equally clear that it cannot, and in support of this view there are not only the authorities of the Muhammadan law which I have quoted, but a decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council reported in 11 Moore's Indian Appeals, p. 94, in which it was held "that the denial of a son after an established acknowledgment, though supported by a deed of repudiation and disclaimer by the father, is [318] untenable." As it seems to us that there were distinct acknowledgments by Ghulam Ghaus Khan of the plaintiff in 1861, it becomes immaterial to consider whether Ghulam Ghaus Khan did or did not personally cause, or bring about, the entry which was made in the wajib-ul-arz of September 12th, 1870, upon which so much stress was laid by the learned counsel for the defendant in the course of his argument: though, if it were necessary to do so, I should have said without hesitation that there is no evidence to show that it was the result of any act or declaration of his. From the same point of view it is unnecessary to discuss the conduct of the plaintiff in regard to the suit brought by the defendant in 1880 and his delay in coming into Court with his present claim. None of these matters could alter or destroy his status as a son if once conferred by acknowledgment, and it would serve no useful purpose, and only lead me into greater length in a judgment already sufficiently prolix were I to explain my views in detail with regard to them.

For the reasons I have given I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be decreed and the status of the appellant as the legitimate son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, with the consequent right of inheriting a share in the deceased father's estate, be declared.

Then arises the question as to the precise form our order should take, and I much regret that upon this point I am at difference with the learned Chief Justice and my brother Mahmood. I feel sure that I must be wrong in my own view, and I have endeavoured to convince myself that I am, but I am unable to do so.

In determining what our order should be, it is necessary to examine the terms of ss. 562, 563 and 564 of the Civil Procedure Code; for if I understand the matter aright, those sections read together and in contrast to the provisions of ss. 565, 566, distinctly direct a Court of appeal not to remand a case, unless it has been determined and disposed of by the Court of first instance "upon a preliminary point so as to exclude any evidence of fact which appears to the appellate Court essential for the determination of the rights of the parties, and the decision upon such preliminary points is reversed in appeal."

[319] The question here, then, is whether the Sub Judge can be said to have disposed of this suit upon a preliminary point, to the exclusion of evidence of fact. In determining that question it is important to see, apart from the mere question of the status of the plaintiff, which, with the rest of the Court, I am willing to treat as a preliminary point, and which the Sub Judge has determined, what were the other issues raised? It will not be disputed that the first four issues settled by the Sub Judge for trial, including that of status, have been disposed of by him. The fifth issue which he settled was this:—"What amount of debts, if any, due by Ghulam Ghaus Khan has been paid by Ismail Khan?" That issue was fixed in reference to the seventh paragraph of the written statement, in which Ismail Khan vaguely and without any particulars said:—"The plaintiff has in his petition of plaint referred to the balance of the mortgage money due by the ancestor, but he has not mentioned the large debt paid by the defendant: the latter, like the former, is also payable from the property."

Now no one would deny, having regard to the Full Bench ruling of this Court (1), and according to the principles of the Muhammadan law of inheritance, that so far as Ismail Khan was concerned, if he was in possession of the estate of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, and if he had paid the debts of Ghulam Ghaus Khan, he would be entitled to hold on to the possession of Allahdad Khan's share of that estate, so long as, and until, Allahdad Khan paid off his quota of the debts which Ismail Khan had paid; and this is not denied.

But in the plea taken by Ismail Khan which, I have said, is of the vaguest possible kind, no mention is made of any debts that were paid, and, for aught I know to the contrary, no such payments were ever made. An issue having been fixed by the Sub-Judge in reference to that question, there is not a pretence for suggesting, and Mr. Conlan frankly admits that upon the face of this record there is not a particle of proof to show that Ismail Khan ever paid a pice of the debts of the ancestors. Moreover, I have asked in vain to have pointed out to me any trace upon the record to indicate that at any stage of the trial in the first Court, [320] the Subordinate Judge, either by order or expression of opinion, actually excluded or led the defendant Ismail Khan or his pleaders to believe that he would exclude, or that it was unnecessary to produce evidence upon this point.

What, then, are the materials from which I am to infer that the Court below disposed of this case upon a preliminary point, so as to exclude any evidence of fact which was necessary for the determination of the rights of the parties? Neither Mr. Conlan nor any other person has satisfied me upon this point, and it appears to me that this being so, I am not justified, in reference to the language of ss. 562, 563 and 564 of the Code, and more especially to the prohibition contained in such last-mentioned section, to make the form of remand proposed by the rest of the Court.

It is clear, and in accordance with many expressions of opinion by their Lordships of the Privy Council, the effect of which is embodied in those sections, that a Court of appeal should not send a case back to a Court of first instance in such a way as to open the door to one or both of the parties making a new case with fresh evidence—a most dangerous thing to do in this country. There is nothing whatever to show in the present instance that Ismail Khan was prevented from producing evidence or led to believe by the Court of first instance that the evidence upon the question of payment of debts was unnecessary because it was going to decide the case upon a preliminary point. I do not think that we are entitled, sitting here upon this point, and upon a mere speculation as to the possibility of Ismail Khan having had some claim to an equitable charge in respect of the debts of Ghulam Ghaus, paid by him, to remand the case back to the Court of first instance generally, so as to allow of a third person, who has acquired his interest pendente lite and after the appeal was filed here, to open up this part of the defence de novo and call witnesses and give other proof which Ismail Khan never attempted to produce.

There was undoubtedly, and the learned Chief Justice has put his finger upon that, a defence set up by the three persons, lessees of the villages from Ismail Khan, against whom the relief sought [321] is stated in the third paragraph of the plaint. It is true, no doubt, that if those lessees had proved the matter set out in their statement of defence, there might have been, prima facie, a good answer in point of law to the claim of the plaintiff. In respect of these defendants it may be said that no issue was specifically stated by the Sub-Judge in respect of their defence, and their answer to the plaintiff's claim, which would be direct notice to them to give their evidence in regard to it. That being so, I am disposed to assist them to this extent, that, as the Court of first instance failed to frame an issue with regard to these defendants, and as the determination of such an issue appears to me essential for the right decision of the case, I would remit an issue under s. 566 of the Code to the lower appellate Court for determination.

The matter therefore stands thus:—In my opinion, as regards Ismail Khan, we cannot remand the case under s. 562 of the Code, because it has not been disposed of upon a preliminary point so as to exclude evidence of fact, and we should therefore proceed to dispose of it upon the evidence upon the record, if there is any. It is said for the plaintiff, and I see no reason to doubt it, that there is no evidence on the record of the payment of any debt of Ghulam Ghaus Khan by Ismail Khan, and therefore, in regard to that particular matter, we ought, in my opinion, to dispose of it at once, and, there being no evidence, to dispose of it adversely to Ismail Khan.

With regard to the second question, I would remand an issue to try the question as to whether the defendants, lessees, did pay to Ismail Khan the rent of such land under a bona fide belief that he was the true proprietor. The question of costs would have to be determined hereafter.

EDGE, C. J.—I have had an opportunity of reading and considering and in fact discussing with my brother Straight and my brother Mahmood my brother Straight's judgment, on the status of the plaintiff Allahdad Khan. With that judgment, so far as it deals with the status and rights of inheritance of Allahdad Khan, I concur for the reasons stated by my brother Straight. But I do not agree with him as to the course we should take under the circumstances.

[322] First of all we must consider s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code. It appears to me that s. 572 applies not only to a case in which the Judge of the Court of first instance has expressly excluded evidence, but that also it applies to a case in which the parties may have been or were by the act of the Judge misled as to the issues or the evidence necessary in the case. I think it would apply to a case in which it was apparent that a Judge intended only to consider one issue, such as the status of the plaintiff as an heir as in this case, or an issue of limitation; and where the parties owing to the view of the judge on that point did not tender or bring forward their evidence. It appears to me here in this case that the main contention in the Court below, as in fact here in appeal, was as to the status of the plaintiff Allahdad Khan. In fact, during the whole of the argument of this case there was no word addressed to us by either side, so far as I remember, in regard to any of the issues, except as to the legitimacy to be inferred from the acknowledgment of Ghulam Ghaus Khan. I do believe that the probability is that in the Court below the same course was followed and that the attention of the Judge and the parties was almost exclusively directed to the exceedingly interesting point of law as to the effect of the acknowledgment made by Ghulam Ghaus Khan. It is quite true that we are told that in this case there is nothing on the record to show that any evidence was in fact excluded, not in the broad sense in which I use the word excluded, but in the contracted sense of exclusion by a rule or order of the Judge. That proposition put so broadly, I am bound to say I do not concur in. Because with regard to the issues raised by the defendants Nos. 5, 6, 7, the so-called lessees, I think it can hardly be said that their evidence was not excluded within any reading of s. 562, because the Judge for some reason omitted to frame any issue on their written statement. In their case they raised certain questions which would have to be tried. I do not express at present any view as to whether, if that written statement were proved, the allegations contained in it would amount to a defence in law, but it was the duty of the Court to inquire whether those allegations were true or not.

It is also true in this case that no affidavit is produced to show that the parties were misled, or that any evidence was excluded by [323] the order or direction of the Judge. But we have to remember this, that Ismail Khan, one of the defendants in the suit, was, we are informed, practically a pauper, and these issues, which may not have been tried, may have been very immaterial to him. I think that in this case, if we proceed to finally dispose it on the evidence on the record, it is possible that we may do very material injustice to the parties interested in this litigation. I think, unless we are satisfied that no injustice will be done by proceeding on the evidence on the record as it at present stands, we ought to satisfy our own minds by directing a remand under s. 562. The issues, except those numbered 1, 2, 3 and 4, framed by the Judge, have admittedly not been tried. There were other issues arising in the case which were not even framed by the Judge; and I do think in a complicated case of this kind it is better that we should extend the operation of s. 562 rather than limit the operation of that section. We have remanded cases under s. 562 where all the evidence was on the record, but where we came to the conclusion from the nature of the judgment that the Judge had misunderstood the case. If s. 562 be taken in its literal sense it is obvious to me that it was our duty in these cases to have tried the real issues raised by ourselves and not to have remanded them. I have never had any doubt that s. 562 would be applicable to a case in which the Judge has misunderstood the questions raised by the parties and has in consequence mistried the case. Such a trial could not be said to be a trial at all. I quite agree with what has fallen from my brother Straight that, in remanding cases under s. 562 we should take care that the parties should not have the opportunity of starting an absolutely new case; and I do not propose suggesting to the Judge to whom this case will go that he will give the parties an opportunity of starting a new case. The Judge must take the pleadings of the parties and their admissions and frame issues to dispose of all the material questions and proceed to try those issues on the merits.

For the reasons which I have given I am of opinion that this is a case to which s. 562 applies, and that we ought to remand it under that section. I have to make one observation with regard to s. 563. It appears to me to be a section which had been drafted upon an assumption that there was something in the previous section [324] to which it would apply and which gave authority to the Court to say what evidence should be taken on the remand under s. 562. We order the Court to try the case on its merits. Concurring with my brother Straight on the finding as to the status of the plaintiff, I am of opinion that this case should be remanded for the disposal of the rest of the issues under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that the costs should abide the result.

MAHMOOD, J.—I concur in what has fallen from my brother Straight as to the facts of the case, and also as to the rules of law applicable to those facts. But because, in the course of the elaborate argument which was addressed to us at the Bar, many suggestions were made as to the exact scope of the rule of Muhammadan law relating to the acknowledgment of parentage, and much was argued as to such acknowledgment being a substitute for adoption as recognised in other systems, such as the Roman or the Hindu law, I am anxious to specify my own views.

First, then, as to the facts of the case, for the reasons so exhaustively stated by my brother Straight, I have no doubt that the following conclusions are justified by the evidence:—

(1) That Moti Begam did not stand in any such position of relationship with Ghulam Ghaus as would render her marriage with him unlawful;

(2) that she is not proved to have been ever married to any person other than Ghulam Ghaus;

(3) that she was married to Ghulam Ghaus;

(4) that the exact date of her marriage with reference to the birth of the plaintiff Allahdad is unascertainable for want of trustworthy evidence;

(5) that she cohabited with Ghulam Ghaus for a considerable number of years and was treated by him as his lawful wife;

(6) that the plaintiff Allahdad was acknowledged and treated by Ghulam Ghaus as his son;

(7) that in such acknowledgment or treatment there was no express specification as to whether Allahdad was a step-son, a legitimate son, or an illegitimate son of Ghulam Ghaus;

[325] (8) that similar acknowledgment or treatment was accorded to him by the defendant Ismail and the other children of Ghulam Ghaus by Moti Begam, and indeed by the rest of the family.

Such being the main conclusions as to the facts of the case, I am desirous of stating the propositions of the Muhammadan law applicable to these facts. My brother has so fully quoted the authorities of the Muhammadan law that I am relieved of the necessity of repeating them, and need only refer to them for formulating my propositions.

The first and perhaps the most important question in the case is whether the rule as to the acknowledgment of parentage is a rule of the Muhammadan substantive law of inheritance or merely a rule of evidence. The question is important, because unless it is a "question regarding succession, inheritance, marriage or caste, or any religious usage or institution," within the meaning of s. 24 of the Bengal Civil Courts Act (VI of 1871) which governs this case, we are scarcely at liberty to apply the Muhammadan law in its integrity to this case, and the alternative would be almost unavoidable to apply to the question the rules of evidence, as to the admissions and presumption of legitimacy, contained in the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), by s. 2 of which enactment all other rules of evidence have been abolished.

Now, it cannot be denied that in all mediæval systems of jurisprudence much confusion exists between rules of substantive law and rules of adjective law, that is, between rules which affect the merits and go ad litis decisionem and rules which regulate the remedy and, as rules of procedure, only go ad litis ordinationem. The Muhammadan system of jurisprudence is no exception to the general rules, and I have before now felt considerable difficulty in distinguishing the rules of the substantive law of Muhammadan inheritance from the rules of evidence. I allude in particular to the case of Mazhar Ali v. Budh Singh (1), which related to the inheritance of a missing person, and in which, after much consideration, a Full Bench of this Court agreed in holding that the question there raised was a question of evidence and as such governed by ss. 107 and 108 of the Evidence Act.

[326] Is the question now before us one of a similar character? In order to decide this question I have been at some pains to consult the original authorities of the Muhammadan law which my brother has already quoted, and I am responsible for the English translation of the original Arabic of those texts. The first of them is a passage from Birjandi which describes the exact place which ikrār or acknowledgment in general occupies in Muhammadan jurisprudence, and the passage leaves no doubt that the Muhammadan jurisconsults themselves do not treat the subject of acknowledgments as forming part of the rules of evidence, though they recognise the fact that acknowledgments resemble admissions. To use the language of Birjandi, "an acknowledgment is giving information as to the right of a person enforceable against the acknowledger, that is, the person who gives such information", and "it is indispensable that the acknowledgment should expressly state the subject of the acknowledgment as if it already exists, and that by the acknowledgment the proof thereof is expressed." The author then goes on to explain that "it is not an effect of an acknowledgment that anything is for the first time founded or established."

So far, it would seem at first sight that an ikrār or acknowledgment stands in the Muhammadan law much on the same footing as an ordinary admission as defined in s. 17 of the Evidence Act; and if the matter rested here, I confess I should have been inclined to regard the question as one appertaining to the province of the law of evidence. But acknowledgments of parentage under the Muhammadan law rest upon a footing higher than that of ordinary admissions as pure matters of evidence. The rules of the Muhammadan law applicable to such acknowledgments and the conditions under which such acknowledgments can be validly made are stated in the authoritative texts which my brother Straight has already quoted, and to those texts I wish to add a passage from the Hedaya which sums up the law upon the subject:—

"If a person acknowledge the parentage of a child who is able to give an account of himself saying 'This is my son,' and the ages of the parties be such as to admit of the one being the child of the other, and the parentage of the child be not well known to [327] any person, and the child himself verify the acknowledgment, his parentage is established in the acknowledger, although he (the acknowledger) be sick; because the parentage in question is one of those things which affect the acknowledger himself only and no other person. It is made a condition, in this case, that the ages of the parties be such as to admit of the relation of parentage; for if it were otherwise, it is evident that the acknowledger has spoken falsely. It is also made a condition that the parentage of the boy be unknown; for if he be known to be the issue of some other than the acknowledger, it necessarily follows that the acknowledgment is null. It is also made a condition that the boy verify the acknowledgment; because he is considered as his own master, as he is supposed able to give an account of himself. It were otherwise if the boy could not explain his condition; for then the acknowledgment would have operated without his verification. It is to be observed that the acknowledgment, in this instance, is not rendered null by sickness, because parentage is an original and not a supervenient want. By the establishment of the parentage, therefore, the boy becomes one of the acknowledger's heirs in the same manner as any of his other heirs" (Hamilton's Hedaya by Grady, p. 439).

In commenting upon this passage of the Hedaya, the author of the Kifaya points out that the rule as to acknowledgment of parentage is based upon the words of the Koran, "call them after their fathers;" and the author explains that such acknowledgment is sufficient, "because the burden of the obligation in respect of the child rests especially on the father, and the latter's acknowledgment affects himself personally and is thus accepted without any verification by the mother" (1). Another celebrated commentary on the Hedaya, the Fathul Qadir, in explaining the rule contained in the above passage as to the condition that the acknowledged child should be of unknown parentage, goes on to say that the condition has been imposed, because otherwise the [328] descent of the acknowledged child could not be established from the acknowledger since "descent after it is established is not susceptible of the annulment" (1).

( I ) و شرط ان لا يكون له نسب معروف لانه اى لان كون نسبه معروفه يمنع ثبوته من غيره لان النسب لا يقبل النسخ بعد ثبوته - ( فتح القدير على الهدايه - كتاب الاقرار باب اقرار المريض - فصل صفحہ ٦١١ ) *

The last point is important, and is to the same effect as the text from the Ashbah and the first text from Vol. I of the Fatawa-i-Alamgiri, both of which are quoted in my brother Straight's judgments. The same rule is stated in another portion of the Fatawa-i-Alamgiri; and to use the words of Mr. Baillie's translation, "descent, when once established, cannot be dissolved or cancelled, neither can it be transferred from one person to another" (Baillie's Dig., p. 408).

The passage from the Ashbah, however, throws the greatest light upon the nature of such acknowledgments and their effect under the Muhammadan law. That passage shows that whilst ordinary acknowledgments stand upon one footing an exception is made in favour of such acknowledgments as relate to matters of personal status, and that in such cases the law does not allow cancellation or annulment of the acknowledgment. This peculiarity of such acknowledgments, that is, the permanency of their effect when duly made, upon the personal status of the persons in respect of whom such acknowledgments are made, is in itself sufficient to justify the conclusion that the acknowledgment of parentage, though it has reference to evidential presumptions and other considerations, is in effect a rule of personal status in the eye of Muhammadan law; and I am fortified in this conclusion by the uniform practice of the Courts in India and of the Privy Council in dealing with such questions as falling within the province of the Muhammadan law of inheritance and marriage.

The various propositions of the Muhammadan law as they apply to the fact of this case and the steps of legal reasoning upon which those propositions proceed may now be stated.

The right of inheritance under the Muhammadan law is based upon three grounds described by Mr. Baillie to be, "nusub, which [329] is kurabat, or kindred; special cause, which is marriage, that is, a valid marriage, for there are no mutual rights of inheritance by a marriage that is invalid or void, according to all, and wula, which is of two kinds, wula of emancipation and wula of Moowalat, or mutual friendship." In this case we are concerned only with nusub, that is, relationship by consanguinity of descent, which in Muhammadan law means legitimate descent only, so far as inheritance from or through males is concerned, and marriage between the parents of the inheritor is a condition precedent to his legitimacy. "The intercourse of a man with a woman who is neither his wife nor his slave is unlawful and prohibited absolutely. When there is neither the validity nor the semblance of either of these relations between the parties, their intercourse is termed zina and subjects them both to hud or specific punishment, for vindicating the rights of Almighty God" (Baillie's Dig., p. 1). "The offspring of a connection where the man has no right nor semblance of right in the woman, by marriage or slavery, is termed wulud-ooz-zina, or child of zina, and is necessarily illegitimate," (26, p. 3). The Durrul Mukhtar states the acknowledged general rule that "an illegitimate child as well as a child of curse or imprecation inherits only from the relations on the mother's side by reason of its being no residuary and having no father." (Tagore Law Lectures, 1873, n. 123). The same is the effect of the rule as stated in Rumsey's Chart of Muhammadan Inheritance (p. 342, 3rd ed.); and it is more fully expressed in Aini, where it is laid down that "illegitimate children and children of curse do not inherit, except from the mother's side, because their parentage on the father's side is wanting; so they do not inherit from their putative fathers, but as their parentage on the mother's side is established, they, on account of such parentage, inherit only from their mothers and half brothers by the mother's side the legal shares and no more." (Tagore Law Lectures, 1873, p. 123). "When a man has committed zina with a woman, and she is delivered of a son whom he claims, the descent of the son from the man is not established, but it is established from the woman by the birth." (Baillie's Dig., p. 411).

From these passages two points are perfectly clear, viz., first, that, so far as inheritance from males or through males is concerned, the existence of legitimacy of descent or consanguinity is a condition [330] precedent to the right of inheritance; and secondly, that such legitimacy depends upon a valid marriage or connection between the parents of the inheritor. Now, the Muhammadan jurists themselves in dealing with the question of parentage, nusub, or relationship by consanguinity, recognise a distinction between cases in which inheritance is claimed from or through the father and inheritance claimed from or through the mother. "Maternity admits of positive proof, because the separation of a child from its mother can be seen. Paternity does not admit of positive proof, because the connection of a child with its father is secret; but it may be established by the word of the father himself or by a subsisting firash (bed), that is, a legally constituted relation between him and the mother of the child" (Baillie's Dig., p. 389). And it may be taken as an undoubted proposition of the Muhammadan law of inheritance that in no case can an illegitimate child, that is, the offspring of zina or illicit intercourse, be entitled to inheritance from his father or through him, because he is regarded as nullius filius, that is a person whose nusub or descent from the father is wanting.

I have already said that in the case of establishing descent from a mother and claiming inheritance from her, legitimacy is not a condition precedent to such right of inheritance; but in the case of inheritance from the father legitimacy is absolutely necessary before any such right can be claimed. The question then is, whether in cases like the present, where the paternity of a child, that is, his legitimate descent from his father, cannot be proved by establishing a marriage between his parents at the time of his conception or birth, the Muhammadan law recognises any other method whereby such marriage and legitimate descent can be presumed, inferred, or held to be established as a matter of substantive law for purposes of inheritance.

In dealing with this part of the case much help is rendered by the case-law upon the subject. In Khajah Hidayat Oolah v. Rai Jan Khanum (1) the principle was laid down by the Lords of the Privy Council "that, under the Muhammadan law, where a child has been born to a father of a mother where there has been [331] not a mere casual concubinage, but a more permanent connection, and where there is no insurmountable obstacle to such a marriage, then, according to the Muhammadan law, the presumption is in favour of such marriage having taken place;" and their Lordships go on to add, "that in considering this question of Muhammadan law we must, at least to a certain extent, be governed by the same principles of evidence which the Musalmán lawyers themselves would apply to the consideration of such a question" (p. 318). The general effect of the ruling in that case is that continual cohabitation of the parents and acknowledgment of the child by the father is presumptive evidence of marriage between the parents and of the legitimacy of the offspring. Their Lordships had to deal with a similar question in Mahomed Bauker Hoossain

(1) 3 M. I. A. 295.

Khan v. Shurf-oon-nissa Begam (1) in which their Lordships held, that although by the Muhammadan law the legitimacy of a child of Muhammadan parents may be presumed or inferred from circumstances, without any direct proof either of a marriage between the parents or of any formal act of legitimation, in the absence of evidence or circumstances sufficient to found such a presumption or inference, a claim by a party as a legitimate son to share in an intestate's estate should be dismissed. But whilst laying down this rule their Lordships went on to say:—

"But in arriving at this conclusion, they wish to be distinctly understood as not denying or questioning the position that, according to the Muhammadan law, the law which regulates the rights of the parties before us, the legitimacy or legitimation of a child of Muhammadan parents may properly be presumed or inferred from circumstances without proof, or at least without any direct proof, either of a marriage between the parents or of any formal act of legitimation" (p. 159).

The exact effect of these rulings was again considered by their Lordships in the important case of Ashruf-ood-Dowlah Ahmad Hossein Khan v. Hyder Hossein Khan (2), where their Lordships observed:—

"The presumption of legitimacy from marriage follows the bed and whilst the marriage lasts, the child of the woman is taken to be the husband's child; but this presumption follows the bed, and [332] is not antedated by relation. An ante-nuptial child is illegitimate. A child born out of wedlock is illegitimate; if acknowledged, he acquires the status of legitimacy. When, therefore, a child really illegitimate by birth becomes legitimated, it is by force of an acknowledgment express or implied, directly proved or presumed. These presumptions are inferences of facts. They are built on the foundations of the law, and do not widen the grounds of legitimacy by confounding concubinage and marriage. The child of marriage is legitimate as soon as born. The child of a concubine may become legitimate by treatment as legitimate. Such treatment would furnish evidence of acknowledgment. A Court would not be justified, though dealing with this subject of legitimacy, in making any presumption of fact which a rational view of the principles of evidence would exclude. The presumption in favour of marriage and legitimacy must rest on sufficient grounds, and cannot be permitted to over-ride, over-balancing proofs, whether direct or presumptive" (pp. 113-14).

This passage, if taken as an abstract enunciation of the law, might lend colour to the contention that even a child whose illegitimacy is proved may be legitimated by an acknowledgment, and indeed it was upon this interpretation of that passage that a considerable portion of the argument on behalf of the plaintiffs appellants proceeded. But the Lords of the Privy Council themselves in Muhammud Azmat Ali Khan v. Musammut Lalli Begam (3) took occasion to explain the exact effect of that passage and went on to say:—

"These observations must be taken with a reference to the facts of that case, and in that case it appeared that there was a Moottah marriage after the birth of the child. There was no acknowledgment, and the treatment of the child was equivocal. Sometimes he was treated as son and at others not; and indeed by a deed executed by the father for that purpose he was distinctly repudiated by him as his son. In that case it was decided that in the absence of express acknowledgment, the evidence was insufficient either to raise the presumption of a marriage which in point of time would cover the birth of the child or of an acknowledgment. The facts and [333] questions in that case were very complicated, and some of the passages in the judgment referred to by the Judge below can only be understood by referring to the question to which they were addressed" (p. 19).

These observations are, in my opinion, an important limitation upon the interpretation of the passage on which so much reliance was placed at the Bar in the argument for the appellants. The general effect of the ruling in the case last cited is that, according to Muhammadan law, the acknowledgment and recognition of children by a father as his sons gives them the status of sons capable of inheriting as legitimate sons, and this rule was affirmed again by the Privy Council in Sadakat Hossein v. Syed Mahomed Yusuf (1), where their Lordships expressly refrained "from offering any opinion upon the very important question of law" whether "the offspring of an adulterous intercourse could be legitimated by any acknowledgment" (p. 36).

This last reservation is to my mind a most significant one, as showing that the passage which I have quoted from their Lordships' judgment in Ashruf-ood-Dowlah Ahmed Hossein Khan v. Hyder Hossein Kahn (2) must not be understood loosely in the sense of being an abstract enunciation of the law applicable to all cases; for I cannot help feeling that if that passage were to be interpreted loosely and regardless of the facts of the case in which those observations were made, there would have been no necessity for reservation of opinion by their Lordships in the case of the acknowledgment of an offspring of an adulterous or even of an incestuous intercourse. Illegitimacy under the Muhammadan law, as indeed under other systems, arises from the absence of a lawful matrimonial relation between the parents of the child; and if illegitimacy which is proved and placed beyond doubt were no impediment to an acknowledgment, there would no be logical reason why the offspring of an adulterous or incestuous intercourse should not acquire the status of legitimate children when acknowledged by the father.

After having carefully considered the various rulings of the Lords of the Privy Council in the case to which I have referred, I am of opinion that their Lordships never intended to go the [334] length of laying down the rule that a child who is proved to be illegitimate, either in consequence of marriage between his parents being disproved, or being unlawful, could be legitimated by an acknowledgment. All the cases which their Lordships had before them were cases in which the question of marriage itself was a matter in dispute and involved in obscurity which reference to the legitimacy of the child. In other words, those cases were such as left either the fact or the exact time of the alleged marriage a matter of uncertainty, that is, neither proved nor disproved; and their Lordships in dealing with those cases applied the principles of Muhammadan law of acknowledgment of parentage with reference to legitimacy for purposes of inheritance. Any other view of those cases would involve the proposition that their Lordships intended to go far beyond the authority of the Muhammadan law itself as to acknowledgments of parentage and legitimacy for purposes of inheritance.

Yet such was the effect of the argument addressed to us in support of the appeal, and indeed that argument went the length of contending that the Muhammadan law as to acknowledgment of parentage was nothing more or less than a substitute for affiliation by adoption as recognised by the Roman or the Hindu law, that is, an affiliation which has no reference either to the consanguinity of descent of the acknowledged child from the acknowledger or to the legitimacy of such descent. I have already said that this contention is not warranted by any of the rulings of the Lords of the Privy Council, and I now proceed to show that it is positively opposed to the rules of the Muhammadan law itself.

(1) 11 I. A. 31 = 10 C. 663.

(2) 11 M. I. A. at page 113.

Not a single authority of that law has been quoted, and I am not aware of any, which would justify the conclusion that legitimacy of descent from a father is not an absolutely indispensable condition precedent to the very existence of the right of inheritance from the father, and I have already shown that children born of zina (which means fornication, adultery, or incest) can never be legitimated or entitled to inherit from their father. Nor can such children be made legitimate by any kind of acknowledgment where the illegitimacy is a proved and established fact. The Muhammadan law of acknowledgment of parentage with its legitimating effect has no reference whatsoever to [335] cases in which the illegitimacy of the child is proved and established, either by reason of a lawful union between the parents of the child being impossible (as in the case of an incestuous intercourse or an adulterous connection), or by reason of marriage necessary to render the child legitimate being disproved. The doctrine relates only to cases where either the fact of the marriage itself or the exact time of its occurrence with reference to the legitimacy of the acknowledged child is not proved in the sense of the law as distinguished from disproved. In other words, the doctrine applies only to cases of uncertainty as to legitimacy, and in such cases acknowledgment has its effect, but that effect always proceeds upon the assumption of a lawful union between the parents of the acknowledged child. This is abundantly clear from the authorities from which my brother Straight has already quoted. Among those authorities the passages from the first volume of the Fatawa Alamgiri may at first sight contradict the view to which have I given expression, and I am therefore anxious to explain that those passages have no such effect. The first of those texts only shows that an acknowledgment of parentage when duly made cannot be negatived. The second text, which relates to the case of a majbub (مجبوب) (1) acknowledging a child and such acknowledgment taking effect, notwithstanding the acknowledger's mutilated condition, proceeds upon the general principle of Muhammadan law against bastardizing children, and the words "the child necessarily becomes his even without proof of sexual intercourse" which occur in the text must not be understood to mean any thing beyond the rule that even in such a case acknowledgment of parentage obviates the necessity of ascertaining either the time or the extent of the mutilation of the acknowledger's person. The text assumes the existence of a valid marriage and the possibility of the acknowledged child's legitimate descent from the acknowledger, and I have no doubt that it would be misunderstanding the text if it were held to mean that even where there is a physical impossibility of the child's descent from the acknowledger, the child becomes of one who could not be his father. The reason of the rule relates not to any theory of adoption, but to the theory that an [336] acknowledgment of parentage obviates any investigation as to the physical condition of the acknowledger's potency or impotency for procreating the offspring of a valid marriage. The same is the explanation of the latter part of the second text which my brother Straight has quoted from the Fatawa Kazi Khan.

The third text from the Fatawa Alamgiri requires no explanation, but the fourth text does require reference to show that it does not contradict the view which I have taken as to the assumption of legitimacy being a condition precedent to the validity of an acknowledgment of parentage. Now that text begins by assuming that the offspring was the result of an illicit intercourse, but the birth of the child took place during lawful wedlock, and it was acknowledged by the father. Now, so far as my view that the assumption of a legitimate descent is a condition precedent to the validity of the acknowledgment of parentage is concerned, it is enough to point out that in the text itself the condition is imposed that the birth of the child should take place after the expiration of six months (the shortest period of gestation under the Muhammadan law) from the date of the marriage—a condition which proceeds upon the theory of the possibility of a legitimate birth. The same is the theory upon which the latter part of the text proceeds, although it relates to birth within six months of the marriage, because the implication there is that the acknowledgment of the father must be taken to involve the possibility of a legitimate intercourse between the parents of the acknowledged child at the time of his being begotten. The text would be misunderstood if not considered in the light of the circumstance that divorce under the Muhammadan law rests entirely with the husband, that it may under certain limitations be retracted by him, and that there may be a remarriage between the parties. It is no doubt in view of this circumstance that the Muhammadan jurists have placed acknowledgment of the parentage of a child by a man upon an exceptionally strong footing, as obviating the necessity of an investigation into facts which would otherwise be necessary to establish the legitimacy of the child, with reference to the marriage of his parents, the period of his conception, and the date of his birth. The principle of the Muhammadan law on this head is much the same [337] as that adopted by the Courts of justice in England, where the rule is represented by the maxim semper praesumitur pro legitimatione puerorum, or by a cognate rule semper praesumitur pro matrimonio, the authority of which was recognised in Piers v. Piers (1). And it is important to observe that in the very text with which I am now dealing it is expressly indicated that an acknowledgment of parentage is ineffective if accompanied by an intimation that the acknowledged offspring was the result of an illicit intercourse. The words of the text are:—"if he says that the child is born of me by illicit intercourse, the descent is not established and he will not inherit from him," and they leave no doubt in my mind that it is only by misapprehension of the principles of Muhammadan law that it can be held that a person proved to be a walad-ooz-zina, that is, the offspring of a fornication, adultery, or incest, can ever be legitimated by any kind of acknowledgment by the father. It is upon the same principles that the first and third texts from the Fatawa Kazi Khan quoted by my brother Straight must be explained, and the latter part of the first text, as also the third text, show that the matter as to the effect of acknowledgment of parentage, though a rule of substantive law, proceeds entirely upon an assumption of the possibility of legitimate descent of an acknowledged child from the acknowledger, and that the rule as to the effect of such acknowledgment does not extend to cases where such legitimate descent was impossible owing either to the impossibility of a valid marriage between the parents of the child, or owing to the existence of such a marriage being disproved by trustworthy evidence. And I have no doubt that I am representing the views of the Muhammdan jurists rightly when I say that there is no warrant in the principles of the Muhammdan law to justify the view that a child proved to be the offspring of fornication, adultery, or incest could be made legitimate by any act of acknowledgment by the father. I repeat that the rule is limited to cases of uncertainty of legitimate descent and proceeds entirely upon an assumption of legitimacy and the establishment of such legitimacy by the force of such acknowledgment.

[338] I have dwelt upon this point at such length because the judgment of Petheram, C. J., now under appeal begins by saying :—

“The evidence in this case proves, in my opinion, that the plaintiff-appellant Allahdad was the illegitimate son of Ghulam Ghaus Khan. I also think upon the evidence that he was born before the marriage of Ghulam Ghaus Khan with Moti Begam, and therefore it has been established that he was, in the inception at all events, an illegitimate son of his father.”

Similarly, my brother Brodhurst, in summing up the effect of the evidence in this case, went even further than Petheram, C. J., in saying :—

“The following appears to be the established facts :—that Allahdad was not born in wedlock ; that he was the son of Moti by an unknown father ; that his mother was at the time of his birth and up to the time that she married Ghulam Ghaus a prostitute.”

If I had taken the same view of the evidence as Petheram, C. J., or my brother Brodhurst, as to the parentage or birth of Allahdad, I should have found it impossible to have favoured his claim ; but according to the view of the facts which my brother Straight has taken, and in which I concur, the date of the marriage of Ghulam Ghaus with Moti Begam with reference to the birth of Allahdad is wholly uncertain owing to want of trustworthy evidence, and, indeed, it is not even established that he was the natural son of Ghulam Ghaus. But direct evidence of paternity is not to be expected in such a case any more than in a case where the question of alleged illegitimacy does not complicate the facts. Indeed, in the Muhammadan law, as in other systems of jurisprudence, direct proof of paternity is not required, and rules of presumption more or less stringent are adopted by various systems as furnishing the place of absolute proof of paternity which, ex necessitate rei, cannot be proved by positive and direct evidence, because, as the Fatawa Alamgiri puts it, “the connection of a child with his father is secret,” as distinguished from “maternity, which admits of positive proof, because the separation of a child from its mother can be seen.” To sum up the matter, I agree in the views of my brother Straight in holding that the entire question of the descent, birth, and legitimacy of Allahdad is involved in obscurity owing [339] to the exact date of his mother's marriage with Ghulam Ghaus being unascertainable, and that, therefore, this case presents all those conditions to which the Muhammadan law as to the acknowledgment of parentage is most appropriately applicable ; and further, as my learned brother has shown here, the requisite acknowledgment in words and by treatment was made by Ghulam Ghaus without any such intimation of Allahdad being the offspring of illicit intercourse as would vitiate the effect of the acknowledgment according to the texts which my learned brother has quoted.

Such being my view of the facts of the case, it is not necessary to enter into any elaborate discussion as to how far the provisions of s. 112 of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), as to birth during wedlock being conclusive proof of legitimacy, would affect a case such as this. That section of course proceeds upon adopting the period of birth, as distinguished from conception, as the turning point of legitimacy. It is a peculiarity of the English law that it does not concern itself with the conception, but considers a child legitimate who is born of parents married before the time of his birth, though they were unmarried when he was begotten" (Lord Mackenzie's Roman law, p. 133, 4th ed).

That peculiarity of the English law has no doubt been imported into India by s. 112 of the Indian Evidence Act, and it may some day be a question of great difficulty to determine how far the provisions of that section are to be taken as trenching upon the Muhammadan law of marriage, parentage, legitimacy, and inheritance, which departments of law under other statutory provisions are to be adopted as the rule of decision by the Courts in British India. Fortunately the difficulty does not arise in this case owing to the date of the marriage of Ghulam Ghaus with Moti Begam with reference to the birth of Allahdad being uncertain, and I need not therefore refer to the difficulty any further than by saying that there is enough authority in the text of the Muhammadan law to show that, under that system of jurisprudence, questions of legitimacy are referred to the date of the conception of the child and not to the period of his birth.

Nor need I dwell much upon that part of the argument of the learned Pandit for the appellant which aimed at showing that the [340] Muhammadan rule as to the acknowledgment of parentage is only a substitute for adoption as understood in the Hindu and the Roman system of jurisprudence, or that the rule of the Muhammadan law is the same as the Roman or the Scotch rule relating to the legitimation of children per subsequens matrimonium, that is, legitimation of ante-nuptial children whose illegitimacy is proved and admitted by subsequent marriage between the parents. So far as the argument refers to the Hindu law of adoption, I need only say, with reference to the numerous authorities which were considered by me in Ganga Sahai v. Lekhraj Singh (1), that adoption under that system has no reference to the natural descent of the adopted child from the adoptive father; that adoption, at least in its principal form, is established by a gift from the parents of the child to the adoptive parents; that the power of adoption itself is based upon religious considerations relating to the spiritual welfare of the adoptive father in the life to come after death; that the effect of such adoption takes away the adopted child from the family of his natural parents and affiliates him to the family of the adoptive father. Further, under that law only male children can be adopted for religious reasons, although no doubt secular considerations, such as the continuity of a family and devolution of inheritance, may form motives of adoption. None of these main elements of the theories upon which the Hindu law of adoption proceeds is common to the Muhammadan law, for there, as I have shown, acknowledgment of parentage proceeds upon the theory of actual descent of the acknowledged child (whether male or female) from the father who acknowledges it, and such descent being the result of a legitimate intercourse between the parents, and when either of these two essentials is disproved, the one by proving that the acknowledged child is the offspring of another man, the other by proving either that marriage between the acknowledger and the mother of the child was impossible or did not exist at the time which would make the child legitimate, the acknowledgment itself would be ineffective.

For similar reasons there is absolutely no analogy between the Roman law of adoption and the Muhammadan law of the acknowledgment of parentage. Under the Roman system adoption, [341] whether in the form of arrogatio or in the later form of adoptio proper, was simply one of the methods of acquiring patria potestas, that is, the rights of control enjoyed by the head of a Roman family over his children, and it went through various stages of modification both as to the method by which it was acquired and as to its conditions and effects upon the adopted children. The history of the law and its rules have been well summarized by Mr. Hunter in his work on Roman Law (pp. 58-66), and by Colquhoun in his work on Roman Civil Law (Vol. I., ss. 683-705, pp. 545-558). It is not necessary to enter into any detail of the reasons and rules which distinguish the Roman adoption from the Muhammadan law as to the acknowledgment of parentage, and it is enough to say that before the age of Islam adoption by a feigned parturition was common and well recognised among the ancient Arabs, that the cognate as well as the agnate rights were attributed to children so adopted, and that such adoption and its legal effects were abrogated by the express words of the Koran and have never since found a place in Muhammadan jurisprudence in connection with marriage, inheritance, or for any other legal purpose (see Colquhoun's Roman Civil Law, s. 707, Vol. 1, p. 559).

Then, so far as legitimation is concerned as a rule of the Roman Law and of the Scotch Law, I need only refer again to Colquhoun's Roman Civil Law (ss. 660, 666, 667, and 683) and to Lord Mackenzie's Roman law (pp. 130-34), which describe the rules, conditions, and effect of legitimation under both those systems, and it only requires a comparison between those rules and the rules of the Muhammadan law as to acknowledgment of parentage to show that no analogy exists between the principles upon which those rules proceed and those upon which the Muhammadan rule of the acknowledgment of parentage is founded. Putting the matter shortly, the former two systems proceed upon the principle of legitimating children whose illegitimacy is proved and admitted, whilst the Muhammadan law relates only to cases of uncertainty and proceeds upon the assumption that the acknowledged child is not only the offspring of the acknowledger by blood, but also the issue of a lawful union between the acknowledger and the mother of the child. To illustrate this distinction I may refer to the rule adopted [342] in Scotland and I may also say in France (Lord Mackenzie's Roman law, pp. 132-33), as to the legitimation of ante-nuptial children by reason of a subsequent marriage between their parents—per subsequens matrimonium. In both those countries the marriage itself, subject to certain restrictions, has the legitimating effect. No such rule is known to the Muhammadan law and we should really be introducing doctrines foreign to that system if, influenced by the analogies furnished by the Roman, the French, or the Scotch law of legitimation, we were to place acknowledgment of parentage under the Muhammadan law on the same footing as the rule of legitimation per subsequens matrimonium rests on in the foreign systems of law to which I have referred.

It is apparent from what I have said that I fully concur with my brother Straight as to the weight of evidence and the facts of this case, and that I have as a matter of law arrived at the same conclusion as he has arrived at with reference to the status of the plaintiff Allahdad to be that of a legitimate child of Ghulam Ghaus, and as such entitled to inherit from the latter and entitled to maintain the suit. But then comes a question upon which, unfortunately, I am unable to agree with my learned brother, namely, the question as to what order we should pass upon this appeal. The facts of the case and the pleadings of the parties show that this is one of those cases which fall within the purview of the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Jafri Begam v. Amir Muhammad Khan (1) and of a Division Bench ruling in Mahammad Awais v. Har Sahai (2). These rulings show that no absolute and unconditional decree should be passed for possession in favour of the plaintiff, if it is true that during his remaining out of possession debts due by the deceased Ghulam Ghaus Khan were lawfully paid, by the heirs in possession. If such payment of debts be proved, the effect would be that the payment of a proportionate share of such debts would be a condition to which the decree in favour of the plaintiffs would be rendered subject with reference to the various equities that may arise in the case.

Have we, then, upon the record any material for framing such a decree? The learned counsel for the parties are agreed that there is no sufficient material upon the record to enable us to frame such [343] a decree. All that is contended by the learned Pandit for the appellants is that, in the absence of such materials, it is the duty of this Court as the Court of appeal to decree the suit absolutely without any further remand for a proper trial of the points upon which the equities aforesaid would proceed. It is important to observe that not only the heirs of the deceased Ghulam Ghaus Khan, but also three lessees, were parties defendants to the suit, and it is clear that in a suit of this character, if the Court below had framed adequate issues arising out of the proceedings of the parties and after taking evidence thereon had adjudicated upon those issues, we should have been bound by s. 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure to go ourselves into the merits of the evidence and to refrain from a remand such as s. 562 of the Code contemplates. But for the reasons stated by the learned Chief Justice such is not the case here; and agreeing with him in the interpretation of the law upon the subject of remand for new trials under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure, I hold that all that the learned Judge of the lower Court tried and decided in this case was the preliminary question of the plaintiff Allahdad's status to sue as the heir of the deceased Ghulam Ghaus, and that, by reason of the view taken by that Judge upon this point of status, the rest of the case was not tried upon the merits, and that, therefore, the case is a fit one for remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

I agree with the learned Chief Justice in the order which he has made.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[343] Before Mr. Justice Straight and Mr. Justice Tyrrell.

HASHMAT BEGAM AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs) v. MAZHAR HUSAIN AND OTHERS (Defendants).* [11th January, 1888.]

Limitation—Suit by Muhammadans for possession of immoveable property by right of inheritance to mother—Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act), sch. ii., Art. 141.

Plaintiffs sued for their share in the estate of their deceased father and mother. The defendants were the brother and a sister and a step-mother of the plaintiffs. As regards the claim of the plaintiffs to their shares in the estate of their mother, the defendants pleaded that the same was barred by limitation inasmuch, as their mother died on the 22nd January, 1873, and the suit was not instituted till the 29th of January, 1885. The Court below finding that the mother died on the 22nd January, [344] 1873, held that art. 141, sch. ii, Limitation Act, barred the claim and dismissed the suit.

Held that art. 141 of the Limitation Act does not apply to a suit by an heir-at-law for possession of immoveable property in that character, but to a suit by a Hindu or Muhammadan who, prior to the death of a female, occupied the position of a remainder-man or reversioner or a devisee, and on the death of the female sues on the basis of that character.

[R—A W.N. (1908) 256 = 5 A.L.J. 715.]

THE facts of this case are stated in the judgment of Straight, J. Hon'ble T. Colan and Mr. Amir-ud-din, for the appellants. Mr. C. H. Hill and Mr. Abdul Majid for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—In the suit to which this appeal relates there were two plaintiffs, the appellants before us, Musammat Hashmat Begam and Mussammat Ishrat Begam. The defendants to that suit, who are respondents before us, were Mazhar Husain, the brother of the plaintiffs, Husaini Begam, wife of Mazhar Husain, Musammat Khudayat-ul-Kubra, the sister of the plaintiffs, and Musammat Wajid-un-nissa, the second wife of Kamar-ud-din, the deceased father of the plaintiffs and defendants (1) and (3). It may be convenient also to state here that Kamar-ud-din, the father of the plaintiffs and defendants (1) and (3) and the husband of defendant No. (4), had a brother of the name of Zain-ul-Abid; and that his first wife was one Musammat Sakina Bibi, who predeceased him. The property, which is the subject of the present suit is of two kinds: first, the interest which the plaintiffs claim as the daughters of Musammat Sakina Bibi in their deceased mother's estate; and secondly, their shares in the estate left by their deceased father, Kamar-ud-din, who died upon the 25th May, 1874. The case for the plaintiffs in regard to these two properties was that as to each of them they were severally entitled to six sihams; that their sister, defendant Khudayat-ul-Kubra, was also entitled to six sihams; and that the principal defendant, Mazhar Husain, their brother, was entitled to the residue of 12 sihams out of the 30 sihams into which the properties were divisible. Such were the claims in respect of which the plaintiffs brought their present suit, and the grounds upon which they based their cause of action for coming into Court was, that by reason of certain alienations of the property of their deceased father and mother made by their brother Mazhar Husain in favour of his wife, the second defendant and daughter [345] of their father's brother, Jamal-ud-din, they had been prejudiced in their rights by inheritance. In regard to that portion of the property which belonged to the estate of their mother Sakina Bibi, they no doubt said in their plaint, as part of their statement of the facts, that her death took place upon the 2nd February, 1873. The nature of their claim being that which I have indicated, it was met by a long statement of defence filed by the defendant Mazhar Husain, the real answering defendant, which, when we come to analyze it, sets up three main contentions:— First, that Musammat Sakina Bibi did not die on the 2nd February, 1873, but on the 22nd January, 1873, and, therefore, that the suit, quoad that portion of the property claimed is, as to both the plaintiffs, barred by limitation; secondly, that if it is not barred, then that, quoad the claims of the plaintiffs to the property both of Musammat Sakina Bibi and of Kamar-ud-din, there has been upon their parts a relinquishment of their rights of inheritance; and, lastly, it is urged that, even assuming the rights of the plaintiffs have not been relinquished, they are bound to repay to the defendant, before they can succeed in this suit, their shares of certain debts of their deceased father Kamar-ud-din, which have been satisfied by the defendant.

As to the first of these matters, an issue was framed and tried by the learned Judge below, namely, whether Musammat Sakina Bibi died upon the 2nd February, 1873, as alleged by the plaintiffs, or on the 22nd January, 1873, as alleged by the defendant. Upon this point the Subordinate Judge found against the plaintiffs and in favour of the defendant, and his finding was that the death of Musammat Sakina Bibi took place upon the 22nd January, 1873. The learned Subordinate Judge acting upon that finding has, so I understand him, held that art. 141 of the Limitation Law is applicable to the suit, and that it, having been instituted upon the 29th day of January, 1885, is beyond time, such date being more than twelve years from the date of the death of Musammat Sakina.

As to the first point impeaching this finding of fact, I listened to Mr. Conlan's argument with very great attention, and gave full weight to his criticisms of the witnesses for the defendants, and of the views expressed by the Subordinate Judge as to the value to be attached to the testimony on the one side and the other. Having fully considered all that evidence [346] as it bears upon this point, I think it enough to say, without travelling through it in detail, that I am of opinion the Subordinate Judge was right in coming to the conclusion he did, and that the weight of evidence does appear to me to be in favour of the allegations made on the part of the defendants, that the 22nd January, 1873 was the date of the decease of Sakina Bibi.

Then arises the question whether art. 141 of the Limitation Act is applicable. Upon consideration, I am inclined to think that it is not. I have come to the conclusion, though not without doubt, that the suit therein provided for is one by a Hindu or Muhammadan who, prior to the date of the death of the female, occupied the position of a remainder-man, or reversioner, or of a devisee, by devise, after the death of the female, instituting a suit on the basis of such title as remainder-man, reversioner, or devisee, and that it does not apply to the case of an heir-at-law suing for the possession of immoveable property in that character. I say I have come to this conclusion not without doubt; but it seems to me that when there is doubt upon a question of limitation, and another article can be found which reasonably applies to the suit, it is right to adopt it. From the assertion of the defendant himself in the 9th paragraph of his statement of defence, and from the circumstances disclosed, I think that the property left by Sakina Bibi and Kamar-ud-din may be regarded as joint family property of the kind mentioned in art. 127 of the Limitation Act. If this be so, then it is clear that knowledge of their exclusion from their shares therein was not acquired by the plaintiffs till a date which would bring the suit well within the period provided by that article. But if this article be not applicable, the plaintiffs can fall back upon the limitation of art. 144, and as no adverse possession has been pleaded or shown—indeed, the inference from the relation between them and the defendant rather pointing to a contrary inference—the suit under that article would also be within time. In this view the matter stands thus, that the plaintiffs are persons who, as the daughters of Sakina Bibi and Kamar-ud-din, are entitled to a share in the inheritance of the estates left by those two persons, and it rests with the defendant Mazhar Husain to show either that, by relinquishment formally made and clearly and satisfactorily established, they have abandoned their interests in both properties, [347] or that by his adverse possession for a period of more than twelve years prior to the date of suit, he has obtained a proprietary title to their shares.

* [As to this latter point I have looked very carefully through the statement of defence, and I find no paragraph therein which I can construe as setting up a plea of adverse possession. Mr. Ross has said that, because the plaint was framed in a particular way, and suggested the date of the death of Sakina Bibi as the time when their cause of action arose in respect of her estate, the defendant was misled thereby, and did not raise the plea of adverse possession. I do not think that we ought at this stage of litigation to listen to such a contention. Taking the statement contained in the plaint as a whole, if the defendant Mazhar Husain had a defence upon the ground of adverse possession, he ought, in my opinion, to have raised it. But he did not, and not having done so, I do not think that we should entertain that question now or afford him further opportunity for producing evidence in regard to it. Then comes the point of whether the defendant has shown that the plaintiffs relinquished their rights of inheritance in the estate of their father and mother in favour of the defendant (or any other person). I do not propose upon the present occasion to repeat the remarks that I have in cases of this description frequently had to make before with regard to the obligation that rests upon our Courts of scrutinizing these matters, in which pardah-nashin ladies are involved, with an extremely careful and jealous eye. Here I may remark that the learned Sub-Judge seems to have been a good deal influenced in dealing with the present case by certain circumstances present to his mind with regard to the character and conduct of Riazuddin, the husband of the plaintiff Hashmat Begam, and he seems to have lost sight of the fact that her rights in the property of her deceased father and mother were wholly independent of, and apart from, her husband; and that she was entitled to entirely independent control of that property according to Muhammadan Law. Therefore, whatever his misconduct, or however fraudulent or dishonest her husband was, he could in no way prejudice or damage her interest or right, or by any act of his, preclude her from obtaining a determination of the question whether she is not entitled to the rights which she claims. Mr. Ross has admitted, with the candour which always marks his conduct of his cases, that with regard to the plaintiff Ishrat Begam there is no evidence from which it would be proper to infer that she has relinquished her share, so that as regards her it must be taken as conceded, and I think rightly, that the defendant's plea upon that score entirely failed. Generally, as regards her case and that of her sister Hashmat Begam, the other plaintiff, I can only repeat what I have so often remarked before, that, considering the peculiar conditions of the lives of these pardah ladies, and remembering that in 999 cases out of 1,000 their business matters and interests connected with their own property are left in the hands of, and managed by, their male relatives, too much importance is not to be attached to their silence about or failure to assert their legal rights. Indeed, ordinarily speaking, I doubt if any adverse inference should be drawn from that circumstance. It is unfortunate that we have not before us the evidence of either of the plaintiffs, as, for some reason unknown to us, no commission was issued to take their deposition. But applying the common knowledge open to us of the position which the females in Muhammadan families occupy in regard to the male members, we are disposed to accept the explanation offered us for the plaintiffs, that while they were willing for a time at any rate to allow their brother, the defendant Mazhar Husain, to remain in possession of their interest, he having to wind up the father's affairs and pay any debts that he had owing out of the profits generally derivable from the joint property, they never contemplated nor intended to surrender or abandon their rights in the corpus of the estates left by their father and mother. With regard to the plaintiff Hashmat Begam, I have only a word or two to say about the evidence of relinquishment set up by the defendants to defeat her. This rests upon that extraordinary transaction, for I can call it no other, which is alleged by the defendant to have taken place on the 17th March, 1874. First of all it is to be observed with regard to it that the mortgage, which is said to be evidence that she relinquished her inheritance in the estate of her father, was executed before her father's death, a portion of the consideration money being in fact found by the father himself. Further, upon looking into the document and the evidence with regard to it, it is difficult to understand why the plaintiff Hashmat Begam should accept the position of a mortgagee of her father-in-law for Rs. 7,000 as an equivalent for the interest she had already acquired in her mother's estate, and was in future to acquire in her father's estate. It looks very much as if the real state of things was that Kamaruddin, who then was a Munsiff within the jurisdiction of this Court, was in conjunction with his son lending Rs. 7,000 to his brother Zain-ul-abdin, and for the purpose of avoiding the appearance of his name in the transaction as mortgagee, he simply used the name of his daughter, a course of proceeding by no means uncommon in this country. As I said, Kamaruddin did not die until the 23rd May, 1874, and, so far as I can ascertain, it was not until this suit was instituted that it was ever suggested that this extraordinary mortgage transaction represented the consideration for the relinquishment by the plaintiff Hashmat Begam of her interests in the several estates of her father and mother. But, as I have before observed, we must not lose sight of the fact that this is a case in which we are dealing with a pardah-nashin lady, and it behoves us not to hold her bound by any transaction, unless we are clearly satisfied that she was, with the knowledge of its nature, a conscious and consenting party thereto. Now it is clear, upon the face of the mortgage itself, that it was not executed by the lady, her name nowhere appears upon it, and even the name of her husband, who is said to have been mixed up in the transaction, is not subscribed by himself but by Zain-ul-abdin, his father-in-law, as his attorney. As far as the document itself is concerned, I find nothing to bind the plaintiff, Hashmat Begam, and for that purpose it seems to me to be practically worthless. In this connection, I need only refer to, without speaking at length, what I have more than once laid down from this Bench as to the objection that rests upon a party to a suit seeking to bind a pardahnashin lady to give clear and satisfactory proof that she had opportunities of obtaining independent advice before entering into the transaction with which she is sought to be fixed, and that she did enter into it with full knowledge of its nature and legal effect. I think also that, as regards Hashmat Begam, the evidence of any relinquishment of her rights by her entirely fails. Then the single question remains, has the defendant under the eighteenth plea, which was raised in his statement of defence, established any thing on the nature of an equitable set-off that would entitle him to require the plaintiffs to repay to him any sums of money paid by him in respect of the debts of the father or mother? He has, in my opinion, proved no such case. Even if he has paid any debts, which as far as I can see were by no means considerable, he has now been in possession and enjoyment of the profits derivable, in respect of the rights of the two plaintiffs, since 1873 and 1874. No claim is made by them for profits received by him antecedent to the date of the institution of this suit and therefore I think we may well say here that we are not called upon to hold that he is entitled to receive any thing from the plaintiffs before they can receive their shares. I am of opinion that this appeal succeeds, that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in the view he took, and, reversing his decree, the claim of the plaintiffs will stand decreed with costs in both Courts.]*

Tyrrell, J.—I entirely concur.

The period of limitation, for instituting a suit in the Civil Court as prescribed in these sections, apply only to suits brought by plaintiff, or unsuccessful intervenor to have it declared that plaintiff had a title to receive the particular rent claimed, and which the Rent Court has refused to give him; and not to suits for declaration of title to, and possession of, the land in respect of which the rent accrued due.

In the year 1881, plaintiffs had, under the provision of the Rent Act (XII of 1881), made a distraint for rent alleging to be due by one of their tenants. The tenant contested the legality of the distraint by a proceeding in the Rent Court, and the defendant intervened on the ground that he had been actually and in good faith in receipt and enjoyment of the rent of the land occupied by the tenant. On the 28th of June, 1881, Rent Court decided against the defendant; but owing to some irregularity the distraint was withdrawn. Plaintiffs subsequently instituted a suit in the Rent Court against the tenant for recovery of arrears of rent and the defendant again intervened, and upon enquiry under s. 148 of the Rent Act (XII of 1881), plaintiffs' suit for arrears of rent was dismissed. Plaintiffs then instituted this suit in the Civil Court for declaration of their right to, and possession of, the land in respect of which distraint proceedings had been taken and suit for recovery of arrears of rent instituted. The Court of first instance dismissed the suit on the merits. The plaintiffs appealed and urged, inter alia, that the defendant was estopped by the decision of the 28th June, 1881, from contesting plaintiffs' title.

Held that the decision of the 28th June, 1881, in the enquiry held under s. 84 of the Rent Act (XII of 1881) was not conclusive between the parties in a subsequent [348] suit between them to determine their title to the land in respect of which the distraint proceedings had been taken.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—This is a suit for declaration of title to and possession of 1 bigha 12 pie kham land numbered 98 in the revenue registers. It will be seen that there are two defendants to the suit, one Ganga Prasad and the other Mital Kahar, and their position in regard to the litigation will be explained by a statement of the following facts, which the learned pleaders for the parties at the hearing informed me were the facts out of which the suit has arisen. It appears that some time before 1881, the plaintiffs had under the provisions of the Rent Act made a distraint for rent which they alleged to be owing from the defendant Mital Kahar. Mital contested the legality of that distraint by a proceeding in the Revenue Court, and under section 84 of the Rent Act the defendant Ganga Prasad intervened, and the question therefore came up for determination as to whether before and up to the time of the commencement of that suit in the Revenue Court the defendant Ganga Prasad had been in actual receipt and enjoyment of the rent of the land occupied by the defendant Mital. The Revenue Court decided against the claim of Ganga Prasad, but it was held that there had been irregularity in the plaintiff's distraint, and it was accordingly directed to be withdrawn.

Subsequently a second suit was brought in the Revenue Court by the plaintiffs to recover certain arrears of rent from Mital, and again Ganga Prasad intervened, this time under section 148 of the Rent Act, the question thus raised for determination again being, who had in good faith received and enjoyed the rent of the land before and up to the time when the right to sue claimed by the plaintiffs had accrued. On this occasion the Revenue Court took a different view and held that Ganga Prasad had established that he was the person who had had the receipt and enjoyment of the rent. Thereupon the present suit was instituted by the plaintiffs for, as I have already said, a declaration of their right to, and possession of, the land numbered [349] 98. The first Court dismissed their claim upon the merits, and they then appealed to the lower appellate Court. Among their pleas there was one to the effect that the defendant Ganga Prasad was incompetent to set up any defence to the present suit by reason of the first decision of the Revenue Court upon his intervention in the distraint suit under section 84, Rent Act. This plea has been accepted by the Subordinate Judge, and he has in effect found that the decision of the 28th June, 1881, of which I have spoken, precluded the defendant from raising his present defence.

It is argued before me that this is an erroneous ruling in law and that, whether the decision of the 28th June, 1881, could have made the question subsequently raised in the Revenue Court in the rent suit res judicata for the purposes of that tribunal, it can in no sense stand in the way of the defendant asserting his proprietary title to the land, in a suit in the Civil Court, brought against him and the occupier of the land, for a declaration of the plaintiff's proprietary title to the land. Three rulings of this Court were referred to by the appellant's pleader in the course of his argument, which are Gopal v. Uchabal (1), Chotu v. Jitan (2), Muhammad Salim v. Abdul Rahim (3).

To the first two of those rulings I was a party, and in one of them I pointed out what appeared to me to be the scope of inquiry by a Revenue Court, as sanctioned by the provisions of section 148 of the Rent Act. Those remarks apply by analogy to section 84, and I need only briefly repeat them by saying that in either case, it appears to me that the sole question upon which, as a question of fact, the Revenue Court has the power to determine, is as to whether the plaintiff in the suit or the intervenor has received the rent of the land before and up to the date when the plaintiff alleged that his right to sue accrued to him.

Then comes the point as to whether the last paragraphs of sections 84 and 148 of the Rent Act deprive the plaintiffs, who have been worsted in such a suit, when they came into the Civil Court for a declaration of their proprietary title to, and possession of, such land, of the ordinary limitation period that under the law regulating such matters would ordinarily apply to a suit of such a [350] description, by reducing the twelve years' term to a term of one year. It has been ruled by my brothers Brodhurst and Tyrrell in effect that it does not, and I believe this to be a sound view.

All I understand those last paragraphs of sections 84 and 148 to say is, that when an intervenor has succeeded in a revenue suit in convincing a Revenue Court that he has been in receipt and enjoyment of certain rent distrained for or claimed, or vice versa, that the plaintiff or the unsuccessful intervenor may go to the Civil Court with a suit to have it declared that he had a title to receive that particular rent, which the Revenue Court refused to give him, and that if he does institute such a suit, he must do so within one year from the date of the Revenue Court's decision. I cannot hold that by the terms of either of those paragraphs, the period of limitation provided for a suit for a declaration of title to and possession of immoveable property, in the limitation law, is thus summarily abridged.

Such being the view I take, it follows that this appeal should succeed, and that the question of the proprietary title to the land should be determined upon the merits by the lower Court. ## REVISIONAL CRIMINAL.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. AJUDHIA SINGH AND OTHERS.
[25th January, 1888.]

Limitation—Sanction to prosecution—Application for such sanction—Criminal Procedure Code, s. 195—Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act), sch. ii, art. 178.

Rules of limitation are foreign to the administration of criminal justice, and it is only by express statutory provision that any rule of limitation could be made applicable to criminal cases.

Article 178, sch. ii, Limitation Act (XV of 1877), must be construed with reference to the wording of the other articles, and can relate only to applications ejusdem generis.

A suit was instituted for possession of certain land on which stood a factory. In proof of the claim the plaintiffs filed in court a sarkhat or lease, which was pronounced by the Munsiff to be a forgery. Plaintiffs appealed up to the High Court, where, on the 24th June, 1886, the Munsiff's decree was affirmed. Defendants then [351] applied to the Munsiff for sanction to prosecute the plaintiffs for the offence of using a forged document knowing the same to be forged. Munsiff refused to sanction the prosecution prayed for; but on application to the Sessions Judge such sanction was granted. On application to revise the Sessions Judge's order granting sanction, it was contended that, after the lapse of nearly three years, sanction to prosecute should not have been granted.

Held: that there is no fixed period of limitation for making applications for sanction under section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

THIS was an application under section 489 of the Criminal Procedure Code to revise the order of the Officiating Sessions Judge of Gorakhpur, granting sanction to prosecute the petitioners for an offence punishable under section 471 of the Indian Penal Code. The facts under which the application was made are stated in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Niblett, for the petitioners.

The Government Pleader (Munshi Ram Prasad), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

MAHMOOD, J.—This is an application which invokes the interference of this Court, in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction, on behalf of the petitioners, in respect of whom permission was given by the learned Sessions Judge to the opposite party for prosecuting the petitioners under section 471 of the Indian Penal Code. The petitioners produced in a former litigation a document which has been held by both the lower Courts to be a forgery, and that litigation came to an end on the 24th June, 1886, by a decision of this Court which was adverse to the interests of the present petitioners. Then, on the 6th November, 1886, the present application was made for a sanction to prosecute, such as is contemplated by section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code, but the Munsif declined to give permission. The learned Sessions Judge, in the exercise of the powers of a Court of appeal, has, however, granted the sanction prayed for, and, in disputing the propriety of this order, Mr. Niblett has relied mainly upon two points. In the first place, the learned pleader contends that there was such unreasonable delay as to bar the application, and, in the next place, he argues that under section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code it was important for the Court granting sanction to obey strictly the provisions as to the specification of the circumstances as to the place where and the time when the offence was committed.

[352] As to the first of these points, I am not aware of any rule of law which subjects such applications to any period of limitation. Mr. Niblett relies on the general provisions of art. 178 of the second schedule of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) and contends that the clause gives indications of a period of three years within which such application should be made. I cannot accept this contention, because rules of limitation are foreign to the administration of criminal justice, and it is only by specific legislation that periods of limitation can be rendered applicable to criminal proceedings.

For instance in the second division of schedule II of the Limitation Act specific provision as to the period of limitation is made in respect of criminal appeals, and, it is no doubt, by reason of those express provisions that limitation is applicable to such appeals. But supposing no such provisions existed, I should probably have been inclined to hold that even in the case of appeals arising out of criminal proceedings, no period of limitation was applicable on general principles of the law; and the result of such a view would, no doubt be, to render it possible for a person convicted of a criminal offence to appeal at any time, at least during the continuance of the sentence passed upon him.

The present, however, is not a case of appeal, but only one of an application to obtain sanction for prosecution under section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and I have to consider whether article 178, schedule II, of the Limitation Act is applicable to the case. For the purposes of deciding this question, I need not determine "when the right to apply accrued" within the meaning of the third column of that article. The substantive portion of the article in describing the class of cases to which it is applicable runs as follows:—

"Applications for which no period of limitation is provided elsewhere in this schedule, or by the Code of Civil Procedure, section 230."

In order to interpret this clause, it is important to realize that the preamble of the Act itself, whilst making provision as to limitation governing "suits" and "appeal," expressly limits the scope of the enactment to "certain applications." In other words, the Act does not profess to provide for all kinds of applications what-[353] soever. This being so, it is important to notice that throughout the third division of schedule II of the Act no reference is made to any application arising out of proceedings under the Code of Criminal Procedure, and this circumstance taken with the language employed in the preamble of the statute, and also with the words of article 178 itself, leads me to the conclusion, that, that article is not applicable to applications under section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This view proceeds upon the same principle as the ruling of Westropp, C. J., in 1888 Bai Manakbai v. Manakji Kavasji (1), and of Wilson, J., in Govind Chunder Goswami v. Rungunmoney (2). The effect of those rulings is, that the general words of article 178 must not be read irrespective of the latter part of the article, which refers to the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the applications contemplated by the article must be taken to mean applications under that Code. Similar is the principle of the ruling of the Madras High Court in Kylasa Gaundan v. Ramasami Ayyar (3), and of the Bombay High Court in Vithal Janardan v. Vithojirav Putlajirav (4), and the Calcutta High Court in the case of Ishan Chunder Roy (5), where (1888) 92 = Tottenham, J., laid down the general rule that article 178 must be construed with reference to the wording of the other articles and can relate only to applications ejusdem generis.

8 A.W.N.
(1888) 92 =
13 Ind. Jur. 36.

As to the next part of Mr. Niblett's argument, I have to consider the effect of the following paragraph of section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure:—

"The sanction referred in this section may be expressed in general terms, and need not name the accused person; but it shall, so far as practicable, specify the Court or other place in which, and the occasion on which, the offence was committed."

It seems to me that the terms in which the learned Judge gave sanction in this case complied sufficiently with the provisions of this clause, because it specifies the Court and the occasion on which the offence is alleged to have been committed. Mr Niblett's argument seems to proceed upon the contention, that the learned Judge in giving sanction, should have specified the place and occasion on which the alleged forgery was committed. But this contention is [354] clearly unsound, because the offence charged is that described in section 471 of the Indian Penal Code, which refers to the use of a forged document, and such an offence in a case like the present would take place in the Court where the document is used and not at the place where it has been forged.

For the purposes of this case, I am not required to enter into the merits of the case as to how far the prosecution, if instituted, is likely to succeed, and it is enough to say that Mr. Niblett's argument on the points of law raised by him having failed, I see no reason to interfere with the order of the learned Judge, in exercising the revisional jurisdiction of this Court.

The application is, therefore, rejected.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

*Before Mr. Justice Brodhurst and Mr. Justice Tyrrell.*ISHUR DAS AND ANOTHER (Defendants) v. KOJI RAM (Plaintiff).* [27th January, 1888.]Question for Court executing decree—Money paid into Court by pre-emptor under Civil Procedure Code, s. 214—Suit for pre-emption dismissed on appeal—Suit for refund of money paid into Court—Civil Procedure Code, s. 244.

A suit for pre-emption was decreed conditionally on the plaintiff paying Rs. 1,595, which the Court determined was the amount of the sale-consideration. He paid the amount to the vendees and the payment was certified under s. 258 of the Civil Procedure Code. Subsequently the decree was modified on appeal by increasing the amount of sale-consideration to Rs. 1,995, which the plaintiff was required to pay as the condition of pre-emption. He never paid the difference between the amount fixed by the first Court and the sum fixed as the true price by the appellate Court and the suit consequently stood dismissed. He then assigned to the plaintiff in the suit his right to recover the amount, Rs. 1,595, from the vendees, who after unsuccessful application made to the Court of first instance, under s. 244 of the Civil Procedure Code, to recover the amount, instituted this suit.

Held, that the assignee was a representative of the plaintiff in the pre-emption suit, within the meaning of s. 244 of the Civil Procedure Code, and the suit was therefore barred under the provisions of that section.

One Balwant sold his right in Mauza Sakri to Kewal Ram and Ishur Das. Ram Lal brought a suit for pre-emption. On the [355] 11th of February, 1880, he obtained a decree conditionally on the payment within thirty days of the sum of Rs. 1,595, the amount of the purchase-money as determined by the Court. The vendees appealed to the Judge urging that the purchase-money was Rs. 1,994-4-0. On the 22nd of April, 1880, their appeal was dismissed. Ram Lal paid Rs. 1,595 to the vendees, and a receipt was filed in Court on 16th August, 1880. The vendees, however, appealed to the High Court urging that Rs. 1,994-4-0 and not Rs. 1,595 was the true amount of purchase-money, and on the 13th April, 1881, their appeal was allowed and Ram Lal was declared entitled to possession on payment of Rs. 1,994-4-0, within a month of the date of the receipt by the District Court of the decree of the High Court. Ram Lal did not pay the difference between the amount he paid, namely, Rs. 1,595 and the amount determined by the High Court as the true price, Rs. 1,994-4-0.

On the 15th of February, 1882, Ram Lal assigned to the plaintiff in this suit his right to get back the sum of Rs. 1,595, for the consideration of Rs. 1,500, and on the 21st March, 1882, plaintiff made an application to the Court of first instance to get back the amount Ram Lal had paid to the vendees. The application was contested by the vendees on the ground that plaintiff was not a representative of Ram Lal within the meaning of s. 244 of the Civil Procedure Code and it was refused. Plaintiff then instituted the present suit for recovery of the amount so paid by him as aforesaid, and the Subordinate Judge overruling all the objections of the defendants (vendees) decreed the claim. On appeal by the defendants the Judge holding that art. 62, sch. ii, of the Limitation Act (XV of 1887), applied to the suit, dismissed it. Plaintiff then appealed

JUDGMENT.

BRODHURST AND TYRRELL, JJ.—The plaintiff in this action is the purchaser of an actionable claim held by one Ram Lal under the following circumstances. Ram Lal brought a pre-emption suit against the appellants here and obtained a decree from the first Court, conditionally on his payment to the appellants of Rs. 1,595, the price of the property that he was interested in. He procured the payment to the appellants of this money by a third person, and in concert with the appellants, he certified this payment to the Court in the sense of sections 257 and 258, Civil Procedure Code. But in the meantime, and prior to such payment, the appellants had appealed against the decree, fixing the price of the property which they had purchased at Rs. 1,595, and they obtained from the appellate Court a decree, raising that price, and declaring Rs. 1,994-4 to be the true price payable by Ram Lal to the appellants for the estate. Ram Lal never paid the difference between his deposit, Rs. 1,595, and the sum fixed as the true price by the appellate Court. He also did not take possession of the property, which he had sought to pre-empt. He made no application under section 244 of the Code for the recovery of his money paid to the appellants, under the mistaken belief on his part, that this price would not be altered by the Court in appeal. He assigned his rights to the recovery of his money from the appellants, to Koji Ram, the plaintiff in this suit and the respondent here, who brought the present action and has got a decree for part of his claim from the Court below.

The defendants have brought this second appeal and contend that the plaintiff has purchased an actionable claim from Ram Lal, which Ram Lal could not have sustained himself, and that, therefore, the plaintiff's suit was unmaintainable. It cannot be questioned for a moment that the plaintiff is in all respects in the shoes of his assignor Ram Lal, and that he cannot maintain any action of the kind which has been brought here which his assignor Ram Lal could not have sustained. We have only then to consider whether the present action would have been barred, [357] if Ram Lal had brought it, by the rule of section 244 of the Civil Procedure Code. It seems to us, that the claim of Ram Lal against the appellant, for the refund of the price of the property which he did not choose to take possession of, in consequence of the alteration of the price fixed for the same by the appellate Court, is a question arising between Ram Lal plaintiff in that former suit, and the present appellants defendants in that suit, in which the pre-emptive decree was passed, in obedience to which Ram Lal deposited Rs. 1,595, and that this question related to the execution, discharge, or satisfaction of the decree. It is obvious that when the money was paid, the payment related to the execution, discharge, or satisfaction of the decree. But it is argued that when the time fixed by the appellate Court, for the payment of the increased price had expired, there was no decree in existence, and that, therefore, no question of section 244 can arise.

This is not a sound contention, for by the provisions of section 214 it is enacted, that when in a pre-emption suit "the Court finds for the plaintiff, if the amount of the purchase-money has not been paid into Court, the decree shall specify a day on or before which it shall be so paid, and shall declare that on payment of such purchase-money, together with the costs (if any) decreed against him, the plaintiff shall obtain possession of the property; but that if such money and costs are not so paid, the suit shall stand dismissed with costs." Accordingly, when at the expiry of the time fixed by the decree of the Court, the additional sum required to make up the full price, was not paid by Ram Lal, there stood and still stands the decree in the suit, dismissing Ram Lal's claim, and under that decree Ram Lal could have come under section 244, cl. (c), and could have raised the question whether Rs. 1,595, which he had paid in execution of the decree nisi, so to speak, was not repayable to him by the defendants, who had received it, when the decree assumed another aspect. It was argued by Mr. Jogindro Nath, on behalf of the respondent, that this question could not be called a question relating to the execution of the decree, inasmuch as, the execution of the decree was out of question at the time that Ram Lal could have applied for the restoration of the money; and secondly, because the payment [358] having been made out of Court, that payment was not such as to raise a question relating to the execution of the decree.

As for the first argument, there was and is a decree in the case to which the question of the refund of Rs. 1,595 wrongly drawn by the defendant appertains. As to the other point, it is sufficient to say that the payment was made in full conformity with the provisions of section 258 of the Code and was a payment into court. In this view of the matter, it seems to us that the action brought by Koji Ram, the representative and assignee of Ram Lal, is an action that was not sustainable under section 244 of the Code, and that the suit must be dismissed with costs; the result of which is that this appeal prevails with costs.

A customary right of privacy, under certain conditions, exists in India and in the North-Western Provinces, and is not unreasonable, but merely an application of the maxims sic utero tuo ut alienum non ledas and edificare in tuo proprio solo non licet quod alteri noceat.

A substantial interference with such a right, where it exists, if without the consent or acquiescence of the owner of the dominant tenement, affords such owner a good cause of action.

Each case in which such a right is in dispute, must be decided upon its own facts, the primary question in all cases being, whether, the privacy in fact, and substantially exists, and has been and in fact enjoyed. If this is answered in the negative, no further question arises. If in the affirmative, the next question is, whether, the privacy has been substantially interfered with by acts done by the defendant, without the consent or acquiescence of the person seeking relief against such acts.

In the case of a building for parda purposes, newly erected without the acquiescence of the owner of an adjacent building site, a custom preventing such owner from so building as to interfere with the privacy of the first new building would be unreasonable and consequently bad in law. But if such adjacent owner, without protest or notice, allowed his neighbour to erect and consequently to incur expenses in connection with a building for the use of pardanashin women, a custom preventing him from interfering with the privacy of such new building would not, in India, be unreasonable. The Indian case-law relating to the right of privacy reviewed.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—In this case the plaintiff brought his action alleging that the defendant had wrongfully built a new house in such a way that certain eaves of that new house projected over the plaintiff's land, and that a verandah and certain doors of that house interfered with the privacy of those portions of the plaintiff's house and premises which were occupied and used by the females of the plaintiff's family, and claimed to have the eaves in question, and the verandah removed, and the doors which were complained of closed. The females of the plaintiff's family are pardanashin women. The plaintiff's house was admittedly an old one. The eaves of the defendant's new house do in fact project over the plaintiff's land. The doors in question open on to and afford access to the verandah. The doors, as admitted by the defendant in her deposition, interfere with the privacy of the plaintiff's female apartments. The Officiating Munsiff of Allahabad, having considered some of the authorities bearing on the case, decreed the plaintiff's claim, as above stated, with costs. The District Judge of Allahabad, on appeal, reversed the decree of the Officiating Munsiff. As to the claim for the removal of the eaves, the District Judge acted on a petition which was filed by the defendant in his Court. The petition was to the effect, that in case the plaintiff should hereafter desire to raise his wall, she, the defendant, would not object to the removal of the eaves complained of. It is obvious that instead of that petition affording a reason for the dismissing of that part of the plaintiff's suit which related to the removal of the eaves, it was practically an admission by the defendant that the plaintiff was entitled to have those eaves removed. As to that portion of the suit which related to the interference with the privacy of the plaintiff's premises, the District Judge, overlooking the admission of the defendant in his evidence and being influenced by a personal inspection, came to the conclusion that the "doors could scarcely be said to inconvenience the plaintiff at all." The District [360] Judge appears to have confined his attention in the inspection, to the effect of the doors in question on the privacy of the courtyard of the plaintiff, and to the position of that courtyard with regard to other houses in the neighbourhood. The District Judge in reversing the decree of the Officiating Munsif, dismissed the plaintiff's suit. From that decree of the District Judge this appeal has been brought.

As to the eaves, it is clear that the Munsif's decree was right and must be restored. As to the plaintiff's claim in respect of the interference with the privacy of his premises, we heard the arguments of the vakils on each side and took time to consider our judgment, not because my brother Mahmood or I had any doubts as to how we should decide, but because, owing to the conflicting authorities which were cited and to the importance in these Provinces of the question before us, we thought it advisable to consider those authorities at some length and to see if the records in this Court threw any additional light upon the subject.

The Indian Easements Act (V of 1882) has not been applied to these Provinces. This compels us to ascertain whether a right or easement of privacy is a right or easement which can be recognised by, what I may call, the common or customary law of India or of these Provinces, and further, whether such a right or easement does exist in these Provinces. With these objects in view, I have, so far as I am aware, considered all the reported decisions of the Courts in India to which I have access, and also the records of the unreported decisions of this Court which appeared to bear upon these questions. I shall now attempt to show, as shortly as I can, what have been the decisions in the cases which I have been able to examine. I shall, in the first place, go through the decisions of the Sadr Diwani Adalat of the North-Western Provinces and of the High Court; then I shall take such of the reported decisions of the High Courts at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, respectively, and of the Chief Court of the Punjab, as I have been able to find in the library of this Court.

The earliest reported case, decided by the Sadr Diwani Adalat of the North-Western Provinces in which the question of a right [361] of privacy arose, is that of Nuth Mull v. Zuka-oollah Beg (1), in which Begbie, Smith and Jackson, JJ., held in 1855, on appeal from the decree of the Principal Sadr Amin of Delhi, that the erecting by the defendant of a new house, so that the plaintiff's premises were overlooked from the roof of the new house and their privacy thereby interfered with, gave the plaintiff a cause of action against the defendants. The Judges in that case differed only as to the nature of the relief to be granted.

In Gunga Pershad v. Salik Pershad (2) the plaintiff sued to close a window newly opened by the defendant, on the ground that it was an innovation which interfered with his privacy. The Munsif who tried the suit found that the window did not interfere with the privacy of the plaintiff as alleged, but held that the existence of the window was not to be made a plea by the defendant for hindering the plaintiff from, at any time, building a wall on his own land, which would have the effect of shutting up the defendant's window. The plaintiff did not appeal. The defendant appealed against so much of the decree as gave the plaintiff a right at any time to build a wall to shut up his window. Consequently the finding of the Munsif, that the defendant's window did not interfere with the plaintiff's privacy, stood. The Principal Sadr Amin of Allahabad on appeal reversed that portion of the Munsif's decree, the subject of the appeal. On special appeal to the Sadr Diwani Adalat of the North-Western Provinces, Ross and Roberts, JJ., in 1862, affirmed the decree of the Principal Sadr Amin, on the grounds that the relief decreed by the Munsif had not been sought by the plaintiff, and that the granting of that relief might interfere with the defendant's acquiring by prescription the right to enjoy the air and light afforded by the window which he had made. In that case it was not suggested by the Munsif, the Principal Sadr Amin, or the Judges of the Sadr Diwani Adalat that a right of privacy could not be acquired, the wrongful interference with which would give a cause of action.

In Goor Dass v. Manohur Das (1), which was a special appeal to this Court from the decree of the Civil Judge of Benares reversing [362] a decree of the Principal Sadr Amin of Benares, Morgan, C. J., and Spankie, J., in 1867, clearly recognised the right of privacy as a right existing in these Provinces. The whole of this judgment is instructive. It is as follows:—

“The Judge holds that the plaintiff cannot obtain the relief asked for, that is, the closing of the windows. His observation that the defendant has no objection to the plaintiff's putting up an ornamental screen, opposite to and within a few feet of the windows, leads to the conclusion that the defendant's right had been established, and that it was by concession on his part that this degree of obstruction by the plaintiff would be permitted. But the question of right has not been duly considered by the Judge. If the windows are not new, or are mere substitutions for former openings which had long existed, the defendants may have a right to the access of light and air by their means. The Judge has not found whether the apertures are old or new. If they have been recently made, we think that it follows almost necessarily that they are injurious to the plaintiff. The plaintiff's right (supposing the house to be one used by him and his family as an occasional place of residence, and the place adjacent to the windows to be a place where the female members of the family pass to and fro) must to some extent be affected. It may be that the injury and inconvenience is slight. On the other hand, any infringement of privacy of the description may affect very seriously the comfort and value of a place of residence. Unless the defendant can establish some right from long usage to the apertures, we think that he cannot, merely because the comfort and ventilation of his own building is increased, claim to have them open, and that the burden of erecting a screen to secure the privacy, to which he is already entitled, cannot be imposed on the plaintiff. It is suggested that from the defendant's building, as well as from other points, a view is commanded of the place in question. But even if this be true, the immediate opening, close adjacent to the road, may be a serious injury. Whatever may be the extent of the injury, if the plaintiff has a right to be exempted from this invasion of his privacy, and if the Court is satisfied that privacy is invaded, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief claimed, namely, the closing of the windows. The case is remanded to the Judge for a new trial.”

[363] In Ram Baksh v. Ram Sookh (2), which was an appeal to this Court from the decree of the Principal Sadar Amin of Moradabad, amending the decree of the City Munsif of Moradabad, the grounds of appeal to which reference is made in the judgment were as follows:—

“1. That the said decision is contrary to the principles of jurisprudence, in that, the plaintiff has no right to put restrictions to defendant's enjoyment of his proprietary rights, to suit the imaginary convenience of the former.

(1) N. W. P. H. C. R. 1867, p. 269.

(2) N.W.P.H.C. 1868, p. 253.

"2. That the said decision is contrary to law, in that, the defendant has a prescriptive right to use the three windows which are in existence for the last 20 years in the same manner as he hitherto did.

"3. That the said decision is contrary to law, in that, the lower appellate Court, having found that the parda system does not prevail among the caste to which the parties to the suit belong, should not have ordered any restrictions as to the use of the windows by the defendant."

The judgment of Roberts and Pearson, JJ., delivered in 1868, was as follows :—

"It is contended that the injury alleged to have been caused to the plaintiff by the invasion of his privacy, is a sentimental grievance, rather than a substantial injury, for which relief can be claimed at law. Such a contention may be countenanced by English law ; but the doctrine contended for is scarcely in accordance with the feelings or suited to the habits of the natives of this country, and is not shown to have received judicial sanction from the Indian tribunals. On the contrary, we find that the first Bench of this Court on the 17th June last, in a case No. 742 of 1867, Gur Dass v. Monohar Dass (1), maintained the opposite view. We are not therefore prepared to allow the first plea in appeal. The second plea in our judgment fails, inasmuch as the lower Courts have not directed the three windows referred to, which have been used by the defendant for more than 20 years, to be entirely closed, but have merely provided that they shall not be used differently [364] from heretofore, in such a manner as to be prejudicial to the plaintiff's privacy.

"As to the third plea, the remark that the parties to the suit or the members of the caste to which they belong do not observe a strict parda, is not sufficient to deprive the plaintiff of the right to object to an innovation by which his comfort and that of his family is affected."

I infer from that judgment that the law in England as to easements had been discussed in the course of the arguments. I am unable to ascertain whether or not the Madras case of Kamathi v. Gurunada Pillai (2) had been referred to. As I read that judgment, Roberts and Pearson, JJ., had not at the time when it was delivered any doubt of the existence of a right of privacy in this part of India, or that for a substantial interference with such a right, an action could be maintained.

The next case in this Court, so far as I can ascertain, in which the question of a right of privacy arose was Khuderun Lal v. Jaggannath Prasad (3). That was a suit brought in the Court of the Munsif of the city of Jaunpur for permission or a declaration of a right to build in muhalla Mucharhatta in Jaunpur a two storied house, notwithstanding a Magistrate's order which apparently had prohibited the building of the house. I infer from the judgment of the Munsif that the defence was that on the site in question a one-storied house originally stood, but by an alleged usage the plaintiff was not entitled to erect on the site a two-storied house, that the plaintiff was prohibited by an order of a Magistrate from building a two-storied house on the site, and that the two-storied house, if erected, would invade the privacy of the defendant's house. On the question of privacy the Munsif found that "no inconvenience will be caused to the defendant, nor will the female apartments be exposed or the ventilation of his house stopped by the plaintiff's construction of the second story of his house, for it appears from the statement of the plaintiff's witnesses, from the tenor of that of the defendant's witnesses, and also from a local inspection made by myself, that the existing windows of the defendant's house are at a distance from the road [365] and fields and from the roofs of the one-storied house of the defendant, and also from the other roof of the plaintiff's house and of that of the other persons living in that quarter: so that if the females of the defendant's house will themselves come at the windows, they will of course be seen by all and their privacy destroyed, but if they do not, they will not be seen and their privacy will be preserved."

The Munsif decreed the plaintiff's claim. The District Judge of Jaunpur, on appeal, reversed the decree of the Munsif. The plaintiffs appealed to this Court from the decree of the District Judge. The judgment of the District Judge is not with the record, and I am unable to ascertain what were his reasons for dismissing the suit.

In delivering judgment in the plaintiff's special appeal to this Court, Pearson and Turner, JJ., said:—"We are of opinion that the claim of the defendant is unreasonable. By the raising of the plaintiff's roof as proposed the defendant will not be deprived of light and air. His only complaint is that the plaintiff will be thereby enabled to look through a window, which window lights the women's apartments. But against this the defendant can easily protect himself by a screen or curtain, or if he holds that protection insufficient, it seems not impossible to procure light and air by the opening of a window on either side of the house, which would not be accessible from the plaintiff's roof;" and they decreed the appeal. The judgment of Pearson and Turner, JJ., was delivered on the 19th of July, 1869. I infer from that judgment either that those learned Judges adopted the Munsif's findings of fact, or considered that the erection by the plaintiff of a second story would not cause any material or appreciable interference with the privacy of the female apartments of the defendant. That case does not throw much light on the question. It has not been reported.

In the case of Joogul Lal v. Musammat Jasoda Beebee (1), in which the plaintiff sought to close a door recently opened by the defendant, the judgment of Morgan, C. J., and Spankie, J., [366] delivered in 1871, on appeal from the decree of the District Judge of Allahabad, so far as it is material, was as follows:—

"We think that in no view of the law can the plaintiff be held to be entitled to the relief sought for. Her house is one of several houses ranged (it would seem from the terms of the Munsif's judgment and from the pleader's statement here) on either side of a narrow road or lane. Already, it, in the portion of it with which we are concerned, is within range of view from the opposite (that is, the defendant's) side of the way; for one at least of the adjacent houses commands it from the roof. It is said that the defendant has not only so altered or constructed and added to the upper part of his house as to command a view of the plaintiff's apartments, but that he has also made provision in the place newly constructed for persons to sit. No improper obstruction of light or air is stated to be occasioned. The case is really one in which a house-owner in a street, having changed the arrangement or construction of the upper part of his house in a manner otherwise consistent with his joint rights of enjoyment, is sought to be restrained, not by the holder of an adjacent house, but by a neighbour living on the other side of the road, who can allege against the defendant no more substantial cause of suit than this, that the newly-constructed place admits of persons who may temporarily occupy it seeing portions of the interior of the plaintiff's house through his windows. Even if this is so, it is no more than others may admittedly do. There can be no question in such case of loss of privacy. And the mere fact that the alteration gives to the defendant a wider range of vision than before can constitute no legal right of suit in the plaintiff."

That judgment has been cited as an authority for the contention that no right of privacy, for the interference with which a suit could be maintained, exists or can in law exist in this part of India. As I read the judgment, the learned Judges did not in it inferentially or otherwise lay down any such proposition. They were dealing with the facts of the case before them, and if any inference is to be drawn from what they said as to what might be the rights and liabilities of parties under other circumstances, I think it is that where a house does enjoy substantial and real privacy, [367] a substantial interference with that privacy might afford the owner a good cause of action. In the case before them, these learned Judges apparently found, that there was, owing to the position of the house and the way in which it was overlooked, no privacy to be maintained, and consequently no privacy to be interfered with. If those learned Judges held in 1871 a view of the law different to that which they had expressed in 1867 in their judgment in Goor Dass v. Manohar Dass (1), I would have expected that they would have referred to their judgment in that case and explained why they no longer considered that case as an authority, and in what respect and for what reasons they considered that the view of the law which they then held was erroneous.

Another unreported case decided by Pearson and Turner, JJ., in 1874 is that of Musammatt Kohla v. Purbhoo Dial (2). In that case the plaintiff sued the defendant for an injunction to compel her to close certain newly-opened windows in her house which interfered with the privacy of the female apartments of the plaintiff's house. As I gather from the judgment in first appeal of the District Judge of Cawnpore, the Munsif of Cawnpore, who tried the suit, following the rulings of the High Court at Calcutta in Mahomed Abdur Rahim and others v. Briju Sahu (3); Ramlal v. Mahes Baboo (4); Sheikh Golam Ali v. Kazeer Muhammad Zahur Alum (5), and of this High Court in Ram Buksh v. Ram Sookh (6); Kasim Ali Khan v. Brij Kishore (7), and Joogul Lal v. Musammatt Jasoda Bebee (8), dismissed the suit. From that decree the plaintiff appealed to the District Judge of Cawnpore. In the judgment which the District Judge delivered he said:—"One of the pleas adverts to the custom of the country and its particular observance in the town of Cawnpore, where the parties dwell, that no one is allowed to open out doors in newly-erected buildings which will expose the privacy of their neighbours. There is nothing on record to show that the custom prevails in Cawnpore more than any other place in India. The custom is undoubtedly respected and observed throughout this country and indeed among all oriental races, and if it were left to the Court to enforce a custom founded on long [368] social usage, there would be no difficulty in doing so; but the introduction of principles of English law, and the decisions of superior tribunals founded thereon, made it necessary to abide by the directions laid down therein for guidance. Had the suit been an ordinary one to have the newly-opened windows closed because of the want of privacy caused thereby, there would be no other course than to treat it as a sentimental grievance for which no relief could be granted, the right of privacy having been adjudged to be not of the nature of a legal right."

I infer from the judgment of the District Judge and the judgment of this Court on appeal here that the plaintiff's windows had been then recently opened and his verandah recently constructed. The District Judge of Cawnpore, however, allowed the appeal and decreed the plaintiff's claim on the ground that, as the defendant carried on the business of a prostitute in her house, the opening of the windows in question, would under the circumstance cause a nuisance to the plaintiff. From that decree the defendant brought a special appeal to this Court. On that appeal the judgment of Pearson and Turner, JJ., was as follows:—

"We cannot recognise the ground on which the Judge has considered that, in this case, he is at liberty to depart from what is now the established law, with regard to the opening of windows. The circumstance that the owner of the house opposite to that of the respondent is a courtesan does not deprive her of the ordinary rights of a proprietor. If persons who frequent her house conduct themselves in such a manner as to occasion a public nuisance, proceedings can be taken to put a stop to their misconduct; but so long as they merely look out of the windows of the house, using the windows as any other persons might use them, they cannot be interfered with, although the result may be that they disturb the respondent's privacy. He has, however, his remedy; he may, as has been suggested, block up the windows which he has himself recently opened"; and they allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit.

Those learned Judges cited no authority for the opinion which they expressed as to "what is now the established law with regard to the opening of windows." Pearson, J., had been one of the Judges [369] who had delivered judgment in Ram Buksh v. Ram Sookh (1), in which it was held that an invasion of privacy by the opening of windows was a substantial injury for which relief could be claimed at law; in which case also the decision of Morgan, C. J., and Spankie, J., in Goor Dass v. Manohur Dass (2), was followed apparently with approval. Pearson, J., did not refer to either of those authorities, nor, indeed, to any other authority. It is not apparent from this judgment, whether they considered that such a custom or usage, as the District Judge of Cawnpore stated to exist in Cawnpore, must be bad in law, or that no right of privacy could be acquired, or, if such a right could be acquired, that it had not been acquired under the circumstances of the case, or whether they treated the decree of the District Judge as being solely based on the possibility of those who might use the defendant's house causing a nuisance to the plaintiff.

Another unreported decision of this Court, to which we have been referred is that in Saiyid Amjad Ali v. Reyat Husain (3). In that case, so far as the present question is concerned, all that Stuart, C. J., and Oldfield, J., in 1877, decided was that the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction compelling the defendant to close certain windows, which had been recently opened by him and which looked into a private lane of the plaintiff's, but did not disturb the privacy of the plaintiff's family within his house. The lane there in question was apparently used merely as a lane or passage.

Another unreported case which has been cited, decided in this Court in 1878, is that of Lachmi Shankar v. Chet Ram (1). In that case the Munsif of Moradabad had found that the doors and windows, which the plaintiff sought to have closed up, were old doors and windows, and that the plaintiff had not objected at the time when they were opened or until a dispute had arisen between the plaintiff and the defendant concerning a stair. The Munsif dismissed the suit so far as it related to the closing of the doors and windows. The Subordinate Judge on appeal found that the windows had been recently opened and decreed the claim of the plaintiff to have them closed. On appeal to this Court, the vakil of the plaintiff must, for some reason which is not stated, have admitted [370] that the portion of the Subordinate Judge's decree which ordered the doors and windows to be closed could not be supported. The judgment of this Court on the question as to the closing of the doors and windows does not assist me on the question under consideration. That portion of the judgment is as follows :—"The decree of the lower appellate Court, so far as it orders the closing of the doors and windows, it is admitted, cannot be sustained, and in this respect the decree of the lower appellate Court must be reversed and that of the Munsif restored with costs."

Another unreported case decided in this Court in 1882 is that of Musamat Begam-ul-nissa v. Mahant Hardeo Das (2). The judgment of Straight and Brodhurst, JJ., so far as it is material to this point, is:—"There is nothing in the judgments of the lower Courts to justify them in interfering with the legal rights of the defendants to open a door in their own wall. This they were fully entitled to do, and the plaintiffs had no cause of action against them." The Munsif of Muttra had found that the door in question was a new one, and that "the house of the defendants is so large that there is no necessity of this new door for the admission of air or light, but it encroaches upon the privacy of the plaintiff's house, and certainly it is a source of inconvenience to him." The Subordinate Judge of Agra, on appeal, adopted so much of the Munsif's judgment as found that the door had been recently opened and was an inconvenience to the plaintiff. He did not find whether or not the opening of the door had interfered with the privacy of the female portion of the plaintiff's house, and on this point the finding of the Munsif was of the vaguest description. Neither the Munsif nor the Subordinate Judge found in what way the opening of the door would cause inconvenience to the plaintiff or to what extent such inconvenience would be caused.

I think the judgments of Straight and Mahmood, JJ., when they made the order of remand in Mata Prasad v. Behari Lal (3), show that they considered, that in these Provinces at least, a material interference by the opening of windows with the privacy of the premises occupied by the females of a neighbour, might afford that neighbour, a good cause of action. In that [371] case, my learned brothers, considering that the District Judge had not on the appeal to him really tried the case, remanded the case under section 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure for a trial on the merits. My brother Straight in delivering his judgment said:—"Upon the statements of the plaintiff and upon the answers made by the defendants, the substantial issue to be tried between the parties was, whether there had been by the act of which the plaintiff complained on the parts of the defendants an interference with the privacy of the plaintiff: and in order to arrive at a conclusion upon that point, it was essential for the Courts below very specifically to find in what way and in respect of what right of privacy the defendants had interfered with the plaintiff's right. Upon a clear and distinct finding in respect of that point, then, the question of law would properly have arisen and could have been properly argued, namely, whether, looking to the findings of fact, such a right subsisted in the plaintiff at the time the wrongful act was alleged to have been done, that the plaintiff had a right to maintain the suit and had a cause of action to maintain the same." In that case I infer from the judgment of the Munsif of Allahabad that the plaintiff alleged in his plaint that the defendants, with the object of depriving the plaintiff of the privacy of his house situate in muhalla Pan Dariha in the city of Allahabad, had recently, and contrary to the old custom and usage prevailing in parts inhabited by respectable persons, opened these doors from a room in his house on to a terrace.

In the case of Lachman Prasad v. Jamna Prasad (1) the plaintiffs, according to the judgment of the Munsif of Cawnpore, who tried the suit in the first instance, alleged that the defendant in rebuilding his house had opened a door in the western wall of his house in the second story, by reason of which there had been an invasion of the privacy of the plaintiffs, and claimed to have the door closed. The Munsif in his judgment said:—"It has been repeatedly held by the Honourable High Courts that a suit cannot be maintained to oblige the defendant to close doors recently opened in his house on the ground that they overlooked the zenana of the plaintiff—vide Mahomed Abdur Rahim v. Briju Sahu (2), Sheikh [372] Golam Ali v. Kazi Mahomed Zahur Alum (3), Jogul Lal v. Musammatt Jasoda Bebee (4). The issue is accordingly decided against the plaintiffs."

The Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore on appeal said:—"I hold that although the door affects the privacy of the plaintiff's house, yet as the defendant has set it up in his own wall, the plaintiffs have no right to have it closed. The remedy is in the hands of the plaintiffs. They can raise their wall so high that the door may not affect their privacy." The case came up on appeal to this Court. There were cross objections. On the 25th May, 1886, Oldfield and Mahmood, JJ., remitted an issue to the Subordinate Judge for a finding, as to how and to what extent, the door affected the privacy of the plaintiffs. The Subordinate Judge on the remand found that the window in dispute overlooked the whole of the plaintiffs' house, and in particular those portions which were reserved for females. Upon the return of this finding the defendant filed objections under section 567 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that the plaintiffs were not entitled to restrain him from opening and using his window on the ground of interference with their privacy in the absence of proof of twenty years' uninterrupted user. The case came on to be heard, on the return to the order of the remand, before Oldfield and Brodhurst, JJ., and they ordered a further remand, saying, "We think it desirable that an issue be tried whether by local custom, there is any right of easement, by which the plaintiffs have a right to have the privacy of their apartments maintained by the removal of the door and window." The Subordinate Judge on that further remand found that the existence in the mohalla where the parties lived of a customary easement of privacy was proved. On the return to that last remand, as Oldfield, J., had retired from the Bench, the case came before my brother Brodhurst and myself to be disposed of. In my judgment I said that "the findings on remand show that the plaintiff is entitled to have his right of privacy observed and to have a mandatory order to compel the appellant to permanently close the door or window complained of;" and my brother Brodhurst agreeing with my view of the law, we decreed accordingly.

[373] I now come to the cases relating to rights of privacy, decided by the High Court at Calcutta. In Sreenath Dutt v. Nand Kishore Bose (1) on appeal from the decree of the Judge of Hooghly, Bayley and Shumbhunath, JJ., in 1866, in their judgment say:—"We further notice that the plaintiff is said to have built an upper story to his house, overlooking the inner apartments of the defendant. Defendant on this built the wall which it is said has deprived the plaintiff of light and air. Even if it were shown that the light and air had long been enjoyed by the plaintiff and have now been cut off by the defendant's wall, still, as plaintiff had no right to build an upper story, with reference to the circumstances of domestic life in India, so as to intrude on the privacy of the females of the defendant's family, the plaintiff would have no relief in this respect, as he was the first and greater wrong-doer."

Those learned Judges could at that time have had no doubt that a right of privacy existed.

The next reported case in which the question as to a right of privacy arose which came before the High Court at Calcutta, so far as I have been able to ascertain, was that of Mahomed Abdur Rahim v. Birju Sahu (2). In the arguments and in the judgment in that case, amongst others, some unreported cases decided at Calcutta are referred to. In that case the Subordinate Judge on appeal had held that, according to the usage of this country, if the privacy of any house occupied by parda-nashin women be intruded upon, the parties thus injured could lay claim to the removal of such injury, and passed a decree ordering the windows complained of to be closed, and the defendant's verandah to be so screened as to prevent an exposure of the female apartments, and that in default thereof the verandah should be demolished. Judgment was delivered by Markby, J., Bayley, J., concurring.

The most important point which struck me on reading that judgment is that those learned Judges in deciding the appeal, which was a second appeal, either overlooked or ignored the finding of the Subordinate Judge as to the usage of the country, and decided the appeal as if no such usage or custom of privacy had been found. They considered that a right of privacy could [374] not be an inherent right of property in this country, and they allowed the defendant's appeal and dismissed the suit. I cannot ascertain from the judgment whether or not those learned Judges considered that there could be no valid custom of privacy in this country. They pass by the two Bombay cases, Manishankar Hargovan v. Trikam Narsi (3) and Kuvarji Premchand v. Bai Javer (4), with the observation that in those cases the right of privacy had been maintained on the express ground of a local usage in Guzerat. They also said: "It is remarkable that in the cases in which the right is upheld nothing is said of gaining by prescription a right to prevent your neighbour from building his house so as to overlook your premises, but the right of privacy is spoken of as if it was an inherent right of property, and the invasion of privacy is spoken of as something like a trespass. And in the present case the Subordinate Judge considers that intrusion on the privacy of the female apartments is an injury which the law will prevent." They apparently overlooked the fact that in an unreported case decided by Kemp and Seton-Karr, JJ., two Judges of the High Court at Calcutta, to which they in this judgment refer, Kemp and Seton-Karr, JJ., had said: "Both the Judges of the lower Courts have visited the spot and have satisfied themselves that the opening of the windows complained of is a violation of the privacy to which the plaintiff has a right. There is nothing contrary to the law in this finding, and it is certainly in conformity to the usage of the country." I do not know whether or not that judicial statement of Kemp and Seton-Karr, JJ., was founded on the findings of fact or the admission of the parties in the case before them, or upon a well-recognised custom of which they took judicial notice. Markby and Bayley, JJ., expressly did not dissent from the decision of Bayley and Shumbhunath, JJ., in Srinath Dutt v. Nand Kishore Bose (1). In fact, in reference to that case Markby, J., said: "I think that the opening of new windows affecting a neighbour's privacy may very possibly give him a right, according to the usage of the country, of protecting his privacy by any erection which he chooses to put upon his own land; and that a person who has opened these new windows cannot complain that [375] such erection interferes with his light and air." The proposition of law from which Markby and Bayley, JJ., were not prepared to dissent was this:—"The defendant, on this, built the wall which, it is said, deprived plaintiff of light and air. Even if it were shown that light and air had long been enjoyed by the plaintiff, and have now been cut off by the defendant's wall, still, as plaintiff had no right to build an upper story with reference to the circumstances of domestic life in India, so as to intrude on the privacy of the females of the defendant's family, the plaintiff would have no relief in this respect, as he was the first and greater wrong-doer." The plaintiff in that case could not have been treated as a wrong-doer, if the defendant had no right the violation of which constituted a wrong. It is not easy to understand how Bayley, Shumbhunath, and Markby, JJ., could have thought that the commission of a wrong by the plaintiff in that case excused the commission of another and a distinct and different wrong by the defendant, unless those learned Judges were of opinion that the principle of the plea of son assault demesne to an action of assault applied to the case before them. Markby and Bayley, JJ., in the case the decision in which I am now considering, appear to have thought that there can be no inherent right of property the interference with which would be an actionable wrong, unless such interference were a trespass. They apparently overlooked the existence of inherent rights of property known, at least, to the law of England, as for instance the right of lateral support for adjoining land.

The judgment delivered by Markby, J., and concurred in by Bayley, J., to which I am referring at present, and the judgments in some other cases, apparently suggested a distinction between the legal effect of a general custom and that of a purely local custom. As I understand the judgments, in some of the cases it has been assumed that although a general custom of the country or of the province as to privacy has been found or judicially declared, such general custom is not to be given effect to, whilst a local custom of privacy may be treated as establishing the right. It appears to me that a general custom of the country or of a province ought to have as much effect as a local custom, unless the local custom curtails or extends the general custom which prevails over the larger area of which the smaller area of the local custom is a portion. I [376] have always understood that the common law of England was, or was considered to be, founded upon the common custom of the realm, if it was not in fact the common custom of the realm judicially declared. The custom of Guzerat as to privacy, so far as I have been able to ascertain, appears to be applicable to all the towns in Guzerat and not to those towns only in Guzerat in which a local custom of privacy has been found to exist.

The next reported decision of the High Court at Calcutta on this subject which I have found is that of Sheikh Golam Ali v. Kazi Mahomed Zahur Alum (1) decided in 1870. It does not appear from the report of that case whether or not any custom of privacy had been found by the lower Courts. The judgment of Jackson, J., in that case was apparently based partly on a Judgment delivered by himself and Steer, J., in an unreported case decided by them on the 18th June, 1862, in which they said:

"We are not aware that where two owners of houses live contiguous, but separated by an intervening space, the custom of the country requires that neither party shall make any improvement on his property, if such improvement has the effect of depriving the other of a certain degree of privacy. We should rather say that when the one opens a window which overlooks the other, it is the custom of the country that the other raises a screen or adopts some other contrivance to counteract the effect of the opening made in his neighbour's house." This quotation I have taken from the Judgment of Markby, J., in Mahomed Abdur Rahim v. Birju Sahu (2). Jackson, J., in that unreported case did not say that if a custom of privacy was established, a substantial interference with that right would not give a cause of action. Jackson, J., in his judgment in the case of Sheikh Golam Ali v. Kazi Mahomed Zahur Alum (1), also relied upon the view of the law expressed by Markby, J., in Mahomed Abdur Rahim (2) and stated that he adhered to the view of the law expressed by Markby, J., in that case. Consequently my comments on that case apply to the judgment of Jackson, J., in Sheikh Golam Ali v. Kazi Mahomed Zahur Alum (1). The judgment of Glover, J., in Sheikh Golam Ali v. Kazi Mahomed Zahur Alum (1) was as follows:—"I concur. Privacy is not an inherent right of property like a right to ancient lights and air. In this case, more-[377]over, the houses of plaintiff and defendant are separated by a public road and by the house of a third party." As to this judgment, it is only necessary to observe that he differentiated the right of privacy claimed from a right to ancient lights and air, on the ground, that the latter was an inherent right of property. So far as I am aware, a right to light and air is a right which can only be acquired by grant, prescription, or estoppel: it may certainly be reserved, but it is not in any sense an inherent right of property. If a right of privacy can be acquired, I fail to see how the fact that a public road and the house of a third party intervenes between the house of a plaintiff and defendant can prevent a plaintiff having or acquiring in respect of his house as against a defendant a right of privacy.

The next reported case decided by the High Court at Calcutta on this subject is that of Kalee Pershad Shaha v. Ram Pershad Shaha (3) decided in 1872. In that case, Glover, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court (Kemp and Glover, JJ.), said:—"At the same time we agree with the Subordinate Judge in thinking that the right of privacy is not an inherent right; and that if it exists at all, it must be shown to exist by some local usage, by special permission, or by grant, and in this case there is no such local usage, permission or grant proved; and the decision in the case of Mahomed Abdur Rahim v. Birju Sahu (1) lays down what we consider to be the right view of the law in deciding questions of this sort; and following that decision, we must uphold the judgment of the Subordinate Judge." That case as reported in 14 Weekly Reporter 103, merely gives the judgment. If the attention of Kemp and Glover, JJ., had been drawn to the report of that case in the 5 Bengal Law Report, they would have found it stated at p. 677 that "on appeal, the Subordinate Judge held that the females of the plaintiff's family were parda-nashin women; and that, according to the usage of this country, if the privacy of any houses occupied by parda-nashin women be intruded upon, the parties thus injured could lay claim to the removal of such injury." Further, Kemp, J., was one of the two Judges (Kemp and Seton-Karr, JJ.) who, on the 10th of August, 1865, had held that "the opening of the windows complained of is a violation of the privacy to which the plaintiff has a [378] right. There is nothing contrary to law in this finding, and it is certainly in conformity to the usage of the country." Kemp, J., did not explain what it was which had caused him to alter his opinion between 1865 and 1872. In the decision which he in 1872 relied upon and followed, the Judges had overlooked or ignored a similar finding by the Subordinate Judge. I infer from the judgment of Kemp and Glover, JJ., in Kalee Pershad Shaha v. Ram Pershad Shaha (2) that they did not consider that a right of privacy could be acquired by prescription, although they considered that it might be acquired by a local usage, by a special permission, or by grant. If such a local usage was valid, I cannot see why the usage of the country "or the usage of this country" to the same effect should not be valid.

The only reported decision on the question of a right of privacy of the Courts at Madras of which I am aware is that of Kamathi v. Gurunada Pillai (3), which was decided on the 30th of June, 1866, by Holloway and Innes, JJ. Those learned Judges, applying the law of Westminster Hall and the House of Lords, dealing with a case of the rights of parties in England, and ignoring the decisions of the Courts in India on the subject, held that there is in India no right of privacy, the interference with which, is a wrong, for which a remedy is given. It does not, however, appear from the report of that case that the right of privacy was claimed by reason of any custom, grant, prescription, acquiescence, or estoppel; but I think it may be inferred from the judgments in that case that those learned Judges would have held that no such right could be acquired by custom, prescription, or otherwise. It was correctly said by Markby, J., in his Judgment in Mahomed Abdur Rahim v. Birju Sahu (1), that "in Kamathi v. Gurunada Pillai (3) the Madras High Court held that there was no right of privacy, but the question, for reasons which do not appear upon the face of the judgment, was discussed with reference to European and not with reference to Hindu or Muhammadan law." He might have added that it was decided not according to European law, but according to the law of England. For all that, it appears to me that that decision of the Madras High Court may have had a considerable influence [379] on those Judges who subsequently held that a right of privacy did not exist in India.

The usage of Guzerat relating to the right of privacy which the Bombay Courts held to be established and to be valid was by Tucker and Gibbs, JJ., in 1867, in Manishankar Hargovan v. Trikam Narsi (1), stated thus: "A series of decisions extending over a long number of years have settled the question that, in accordance with the usage of Guzerat, a man may not open new doors and windows in his house, or make any new apertures, or enlarge old ones, in a way which shall enable him to overlook those portions of his neighbour's premises which are ordinarily secluded from observation, and in this manner to intrude upon that neighbour's privacy; and that an invasion of privacy is an infraction of a right, for which the person injured has a remedy at law." Tucker and Gibbs, JJ., declined to follow the decision of the Madras High Court in Kamathi v. Gurunada Pillai (2).

In Kuvarji Premchand and others v. Bai Javer (3) decided in 1869, Warden and Lloyd, JJ., say: "We see no cause to interfere with the decision of the lower Court that the privacy of the plaintiff is invaded by the newly-opened windows. The existence of a public road between the houses makes no difference according to the custom of Guzerat."

All that was decided by Melvill and Kemball, JJ., in 1871, in Keshav Harkha v. Ganpat Hirachand (4), was that the opening by the defendant of a window which looked, not into the plaintiff's private apartments, but into an open courtyard outside his house, was not an invasion of the plaintiff's privacy which would entitle him to have the window closed.

In the case of Shrinivas Udpirav v. Reid and others (5) decided in 1872, the plaintiff, whose house was in Dharwar, had been prevented by a Magistrate's order from opening a window in a wall of his house. The Acting Judge of Dharwar found on the evidence that it was the custom in Dharwar that a person could not make a new aperture, which might invade the privacy of his neighbour, without his permission, and that, as a matter of fact, the plaintiff [380] making an opening in his wall would expose to view the women of the household of one of the defendants when they bathed at a well in the compound. The case came up in first appeal before Gibbs and Lloyd, JJ. Their judgment, so far as it is material to the point under consideration, was as follows:—"It may be taken to have been correctly found by the Judge that the window complained of would, to a certain extent, make the third defendant's compound less private than heretofore, but it is within the power of the defendant to adopt some arrangement by which the inconvenience arising therefrom, if any, may be avoided; and it is more reasonable that the defendant should protect himself, than that the plaintiff should be deterred from improving his own house, for, as was observed by Mr. Justice Markby in the case reported at p. 676 of 5 B.L.R., 'to hold that privacy is a right and the invasion of it an injury would lead, as it appears to me, to the most alarming consequences to the owners of house-property in towns.' It has been recently held by this Court (S. A. Nos. 307 of 1871 and 339 of 1871) that the mere opening of a door in a person's own premises does not constitute a cause of action, and after consulting all the authorities that have been referred to, we think, unless we can coincide with the Judge that the local custom has been established, the plaintiff should succeed. With reference to this alleged custom, it must be observed that it was not set up in the written statement, and though certain witnesses depose to the effect that it was not customary to allow doors and windows to be opened without permission, if the privacy of neighbours is thereby interfered with, it appears to us that their evidence is too vague, and that to establish the point it should be shown that the custom was approved or immemorial, or that it had been judicially recognised. The various decisions quoted by the Judge refer solely to a custom prevailing in Guzerat, and this Court, as has been said, would be very unwilling to extend this exceptional privilege without the most satisfactory proof that it prevailed elsewhere." The authorities which had been referred to in the arguments in that case were Gibbon v. Abdur Rahman (1); Mahomed Abdur Rahim v. Birju Sahu (2); Kamathi v. Gurunada [381] Pillai (3), two unreported judgments of Melvill and Kemball, JJ.; Kuvarji v. Bai Javer (4) and Mani Shankar v. Trikam Narsi (5). Gibbs and Lloyd, JJ., apparently considered that a custom of privacy, if proved, would be valid.

In Gibbon v. Abdur Rahman (1) no question of privacy appears to have arisen. The females, if any, of the plaintiff's family, judging by his name, were not likely to have been parda-nashin women. It was an anticipated trespass, not an interference with a right of privacy of which the plaintiff complained.

Owing to the copies of the Punjab Record for 1869 and 1876 not being in the Library of this Court, I have been unable to examine the decisions of the Chief Court of the Punjab, 21 and 91 of Punjab Record, 1869, and 90 of Punjab Record, 1876, in which Sir Meredyth Plowden in his judgment in Yasin v. Gokal Chand, No. 19 of 17, Punjab Record civil judgments 72, states that the right of privacy has "beyond doubt been acknowledged." I shall give two short extracts from that judgment. At page 72 Sir Meredyth Plowden says:—

"The object of this suit is to compel the defendant to build a screen on the top of the upper story recently added to his house, so that persons using the roof of the latter shall not command a view of the interior of the plaintiff's premises." And at page 73 he says:—"When, therefore, a suit is brought to restrain the owner of a house from adding an upper story to his own house, or to compel him to make some addition for the protection of the plaintiff's privacy, it is only just to demand from the plaintiff strict proof, first, that the custom of domestic privacy is observed among that section of society of which he is a member, and in his own household; and secondly, that the domestic privacy of individuals is generally regarded among the community of the locality where the plaintiff resides, as being of so much importance that by common consent it is considered incumbent upon owners of land and houses either to abstain from elevating their houses, or to elevate them with precautions against the violation of such privacy." And further on he says:—"This right when it exists is in its nature an easement, but I am not aware that any attempt has yet been [382] made to define or describe it. Being founded upon local usage, it seems to me that the Courts are fully justified in demanding that the proof of the customary right shall extend to and include proof of the customary mode of recognition."

In that case Plowden and Brandreth, JJ., dismissed the plaintiff's appeal, being of opinion that the plaintiff had failed to prove a custom in Basti Ghuzan, where the houses were, by which a proprietor was compelled to build a screen or desist from building. I infer from their judgments that in their opinion such a custom might be proved, or, if proved, would be good in law.

The decisions of the Judges of the High Court at Calcutta on the question as to whether any right of privacy exists or can exist by custom or otherwise, or at all, are conflicting; but I think it may be inferred from some of those decisions that where a custom of privacy has been clearly proved, any substantial interference with it would be an actionable wrong, provided of course that such interference was not by the consent or acquiescence of the party complaining.

The solitary decision of which I am aware of the High Court at Madras on the question of privacy apparently ignores the possibility in law of a right of privacy existing in India.

The High Court at Bombay has clearly recognised and given effect to the custom in Guzerat by which a right of privacy is enjoyed where that custom prevails.

The High Court at Bombay, in Shrinivas Udupirav v. Reid and others (1) recognised the possibility in law of a custom similar to that of Guzerat existing elsewhere, and in Mani Shankar Hargovan v. Trikan Narsi and others (2) refused to consider the decision of the High Court at Madras in Kamathi v. Gurunada Pillai (3) as an authority which could be followed, where, by the usage of the district, a right of privacy exists.

The Chief Court of the Punjab has acknowledged that a custom of privacy can exist and can be enforced.

I have consulted all the reports available to me of the cases in the High Courts at Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, and of the [383] Chief Court of the Punjab of which I am aware, which deal with the question of a right of privacy. Owing to the absence from our Library of the reports which contain the series of decisions referred to by the High Court at Bombay in Mani Shankar Hargovan v. Trikan Narsi (4) as having settled the question as to the usage of Guzerat, I have been unable to ascertain whether that custom was first established by a finding of fact on evidence given in Court, or whether it was a well-known and immemorial custom of which the Judges of the High Court at Bombay or their predecessors took judicial notice.

Shortly put, the decisions of the Sadr Diwani Adalat of the North-Western Provinces and of this High Court where the question of the right of privacy has arisen may be summarized as follows :—

In 1855, in a Delhi case, Begbie, Smith and Jackson, JJ., recognised the existence of a right of privacy.

In 1862, in an Allahabad case, Ross and Roberts, JJ., did not suggest any doubt that a right of privacy could exist.

In 1867, in a Benares case, Morgan, C. J., and Spankie, J., expressly recognised the existence of a right of privacy.

In 1868, in a Moradabad case, Roberts and Pearson, JJ., expressly recognised the existence of a right of privacy.

In 1869, in a Jaunpur case, Pearson and Turner, JJ., either adopted the finding of the Munsif that there would be no interference with the privacy claimed, or they may have thought that there would be no material interference. They did not expressly hold that there could be no right of privacy.

In 1871, in an Allahabad case, Morgan, C. J., and Spankie, J., decided the appeal apparently on the ground that there was in that case no privacy to be interfered with, and not on the ground that no right of privacy could exist.

In 1874, in a Cawnpore case, in which the District Judge of Cawnpore had in his judgment stated that the custom of the country recognised a right of privacy, Pearson and Turner, JJ., either [384] ignored that finding or treated it as a finding of a custom which could not exist in law.

In 1877, Stuart, C. J., and Oldfield, J., merely decided that the right of privacy claimed in respect of a lane did not exist. They did not suggest that no right of privacy could exist in these Provinces.

In 1878, in a Moradabad case, the claim of privacy was on appeal abandoned for some reason which is not stated.

In 1882, in an Agra case, Straight and Brodhurst, JJ., apparently considered that a right of privacy might exist, but that the facts found did not show how any such right was interfered with.

In S. A. No. 8 of 1886, Straight and Mahmood, JJ., evidently considered that a right of privacy could exist in respect of a house in the city of Allahabad.

In a Cawnpore case, Lachman Prasad v. Jamna Prasad (1), Oldfield and Mahmood, JJ., when making the first order of remand, evidently considered that a right of privacy could exist; and Oldfield and Brodhurst, JJ., when making the second order of remand, must have considered that such a right could exist by custom. On the second remand, the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore found that such a custom was proved, and on that finding Brodhurst, J., and I decreed the relief asked for.

Owing to the destruction of records during the Mutiny of 1857 I am unable to ascertain whether the existence of a custom of privacy in this part of India had ever been proved or called in question prior to 1855; and owing to the same cause and to the absence from the report of the case of Nuth Mull v. Zuka-oollah Beg and Kureem-oollah Beg (2) of information on the point, I am unable to ascertain whether the Judges of the Sadr Diwani Adalat of the North-Western provinces were in that case following the law as they found it existing, or were deciding that case on facts found.

With the exception of the Jaunpur case in 1869 and the Cawnpore case in 1874, which were decided by Pearson and Turner, JJ., I have not found any case in which any Judge of the [385] Sadr Diwani Adalat of the North-Western Provinces or this Court has expressed any opinion from which even an inference could be drawn that he considered that a right of privacy could not exist in law, or could not be obtained by custom; indeed, with the exception of those two cases, the inference has been the other way. It is a matter worthy of notice that the finding of the District Judge of Cawnpore as to a custom of privacy which

(1) A. W. N. (1887) 295=10 A. 162.

(2) S. D. A. N. W. P. 1855, p. 92.

Pearson and Turner, JJ., in 1874, either overlooked, ignored, or treated as a finding of a custom which could not exist in law, has been supported by the finding of the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore in Lachman Prasad v. Jumna Prasad (1). If Pearson and Turner, JJ., in the cases decided by them in 1869 and 1874, meant to decide that there could be no custom and no right of privacy in these Provinces, they neither discussed nor referred to any authorities on the subject as I would have expected them to have done, having regard to the previous decisions on that point.

In my opinion, the fact that there is no such custom of privacy known to the law of England can have no bearing on the question whether there can be in India an usage or custom of privacy valid in law. The conditions of domestic life in the two countries have from remote times been essentially different, and in my opinion, it is owing to that difference in the conditions of domestic life alone that a custom which appears to me to be a perfectly reasonable one in India should be unknown in England. In India, or at any rate in these Provinces, the custom of the parda has for centuries been strictly observed by all Hindus except those of the lowest castes, and by all Muhammadans except the poorest. It cannot be doubted that the male relations of a parda-nashin woman and the woman herself would consider it a disgrace were her face to be exposed to the gaze of male strangers, and whilst that is the view of those amongst whom the custom of the parda prevails, I think it is more reasonable that a neighbour should not be allowed to erect new buildings or to open or extend doors or windows in old buildings in such a way as would substantially interfere with those parts of his neighbour's house or premises which are used by parda-nashin women of the latter's family than to hold [386] that the latter's only remedy is to build a wall on his own land, which, although it would maintain his privacy, might deprive his house of light and air and render it uninhabitable, or to screen his windows with probably the same result. We know as a matter of common knowledge that in these Provinces great numbers of parda nashin women in the hot weather are, I may say, compelled from the severity of the climate to sleep in the open air, that is, either in the courtyards or the verandahs of their houses. In such cases, where the privacy in fact exists and is or has been enjoyed, I can see nothing unreasonable in a custom that such privacy shall be protected.

I cannot see that by holding that a right of privacy may exist; any such alarming consequences to the owners of house property in towns as apparently influenced the mind of Markby, J., in Mahomed Abdur Rahim v. Birju Sahu (2) will ensue. Every case must depend on its own facts. A primary question must in all cases be:—Does the privacy in fact and substantially exist and has it been and is it in fact enjoyed? If it were found that no privacy substantially exists or is enjoyed, there would be no further question in an ordinary case to decide. If, on the other hand, it were found that privacy did substantially exist and was enjoyed, the next question would be:—Was that privacy substantially or materially interfered with by acts of the defendant done without the consent or acquiescence of the person seeking relief against those acts? In the case of old buildings, what can an owner of one of the old buildings have to complain of, if a usage or custom exists, by which he cannot so alter his old building, as to deprive his neighbour's old building, of the privacy which has been enjoyed, and make it unavailable as a zenana, or, in other words, deprive it of all residential value and in this way depreciate its market value? Such a custom where it exists in India is merely an application of the maxims "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas" and "Ædificare in tuo proprio solo non licet quod alteri noceat."

I do not suggest that these maxims would, in a case like this, be applicable in England, where no such right of privacy is known to the law. In the case of a building for parda purposes newly erected, [387] without the acquiescence of the owner of an adjacent building site, it appears to me, that a custom which would prevent the owner of such an adjacent site from building so as to interfere with the privacy of the first new building, would be an unreasonable, and consequently, a bad custom in law. If, however, the owner of such an adjacent building site, were without protest or notice, to allow his neighbour to erect, and consequently to incur expenses in erecting buildings or premises for the use of parda-nashin women, I think a custom which would prevent him subsequently interfering with the privacy of such new building, would not be unreasonable in this country.

Having given the best consideration which I can to this question, I am of opinion that such a right of privacy as that to which I have already referred exists, and has existed in these Provinces, apparently by usage, or, to use another word, by custom, and that substantial interference with such a right of privacy where it exists, if the interference be without the consent of the owner of dominant tenement affords such owner a good cause of action.

In the present case, the defendant in her deposition distinctly admitted that the southern doors of her newly-erected house, and consequently her verandah, overlooked and intruded upon the privacy of the female apartments of the plaintiff's house. After that admission her vakil decided to call no further witnesses on her behalf. It was contended before us by the defendant's vakil that as the other portions of the plaintiff's house and part of the courtyard of his house were overlooked from the houses of other people, there could be no substantial interference with any privacy of the plaintiff's house. If the facts on which that contention is founded exist, then it appears to me that the doors and the verandah of the defendant's house, which interfere with the privacy which the defendant has admitted that the plaintiff's premises have enjoyed, must materially interfere with such privacy as has existed, and that the result of allowing that contention to be valid would be to deprive the plaintiff's house of all privacy.

I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed with costs, the decree of the District Judge set aside with costs, and the decree of the Munsif restored.

[388] MAHMOOD, J.—The learned Chief Justice has fully and exhaustively dealt with the difficulties which arise in this case owing to the conflicting nature of the case-law, and I agree with him so fully that it is not necessary for me to deliver a separate judgment. But as a native of India myself, I may without hesitation say that in the territories subject to the jurisdiction of this Court the parda system prevails alike among Hindus and Muhammadans, and that both these sections of the community by immemorial usage and custom, regard invasion of privacy as actionable. Indeed, if we were to hold any view other than that which the learned Chief Justice has expounded, we should really be reducing even the market value of thousands of houses inhabited by the female portion of the population, if not also the value of houses used by male members of the Hindu and the Muhammadan population of these Provinces. There is no statute-law applicable to these Provinces to govern the decision of a case such as this, and I fully concur with the learned Chief Justice in his opinion that the importation of the English law, as to the invasion of privacy being unactionable, is not only not justified, but positively opposed to the customs, habits, and conditions of life of the populations living under the jurisdiction of this Court. Even in Europe, countries whose principles of law are derived from or founded on the civil law, recognise invasion of privacy as an actionable wrong, a doctrine which no doubt owes its origin to the conditions of life in those countries, regulated as their conditions must necessarily be by the climate and the social and religious habits of the population.

The parda system which in India is based both on religious and social notions may have its faults; but Judges take facts as they are, and we, sitting here as Judges with a duty to adjudicate upon such disputes, must take cognizance of those facts, and administer justice between the parties.

The learned Chief Justice has pointed out that under conditions of life, such as they are in these provinces, the custom that invasion of privacy is actionable far from being an unreasonable custom, and the custom itself is so well recognised, that Mr. Moti Lal for the respondent in the course of his argument stated that it [389] was wholly unnecessary to remand the case for ascertaining the custom.

I concur in all the views to which the learned Chief Justice has given expression. I have no doubt that those views will be greeted by the entire Hindu and Muhammadan population of these Provinces; and I hope that his Lordship's exhaustive judgment will place the law, as administered by this Court, upon a firm and ascertainable footing rendering ineffective the rulings to the contrary, which have unfortunately done much to disturb the comfort of neighbours in towns, and have, I am afraid, encouraged unnecessary invasion of the immemorial right of privacy, and consequent litigation.

Execution of decree—Stay of execution pending suit between decree holder and judgment-debtor—Appeal from order staying execution—Civil Procedure Code, s. 243—“Such Court”—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 235 (d), 581, 583.

An appeal lies from an order passed under s. 243 of the Civil Procedure Code staying execution of a decree pending a suit between the decree-holder and judgment-debtor.

The words “such Court” in s. 243 of the Civil Procedure Code do not limit the exercise of the powers given by that section only to decrees passed by the Court in which the suit is pending, but with reference to ss. 235 (d), 581 and

The plaintiff instituted a suit against defendant for recovery of money and other reliefs which was ultimately dismissed in appeal by the High Court, and he was ordered to pay defendant Rs. 1,000 as cost of the litigation. Plaintiff then brought this suit against defendant in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Farukhabad, and while it was pending defendant applied to the Court to execute his decree for costs. Plaintiff then applied for stay of the execution, and his application was refused by the first Court but granted by the District Court. On appeal by defendant to the High Court, held that an appeal lies from the order, and the Judge's order was correct.

[390] THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

Munshi Kashi Prasad and Babu Jogindro Nath, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts necessary for the disposal of this appeal are the following :—A suit was instituted by Musammat Gopi, plaintiff-respondent, judgment-debtor, for recovery of money and other reliefs of a cognate character to which I need not refer. The suit was finally dismissed in appeal by this Court on the 27th November, 1886, by which decree a sum of about Rs. 1,000 was found due by the said Musammat Gopi to Kassa Mal, the decree-holder, appellant, before me.

Thereupon, it is admitted before me by Pandit Sundar Lal on the one hand and Mr. Kashi Prasad on the other, that a suit was instituted by the aforesaid Musammat Gopi against the aforesaid Kassa Mal in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Farukhabad, and during the pendency of the suit an application was made by the decree-holder, Kassa Mal, on the 4th January, 1887, for the recovery of the above-mentioned item of Rs. 1,000, costs of the former litigation. Thereupon, Musammat Gopi, by her application of the 25th January, 1887, applied under s. 243 of the Civil Procedure Code for stay of execution of the decree, but the application was rejected by the Court in which the second suit was pending, namely, the Court of first instance, on the 25th January, 1887, that is, the same day as the one upon which the application was made.

From this order Musammat Gopi preferred an appeal to the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court, and, by his order of the 16th April, 1887, he held that, under the circumstances of the case, the execution of the decree of the 27th November, 1886, should have been stayed pending the decision of the new suit.

From that order, this second appeal has been preferred, and in supporting it Pandit Sundar Lal has argued, in the first place, that inasmuch as the order of the Subordinate Judge of the 25th January, 1887, was passed under s. 243 of the Civil Procedure Code, no appeal lay to the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court [391] and in support of this contention he relies upon a ruling of a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Nehal Chand v. Rameshari Dasse (2), in which it was held that in a case such as this no appeal would lie, because the order passed under s. 243, Civil Procedure Code, was not such an order as would fall within the purview of cl. (c) s. 244, of the Code, so as to render it appealable as a "decree" within the meaning of the definition of the word in s. 2 of the Code.

(1) 8 W.R. 392.

(2) 9 C. 214.

The ruling is no doubt in favour of the learned pleader's contention, but in a judgment of my own in the case of Ghazidin v. Fakir Bakhsh (1) I, with the concurrence of my brother Straight, held an opposite view, of the law; and that view, I find, was adopted by another Division Bench of the Calcutta Court itself in O. Steel & Co. v. Ichhamoyi Chowdhraïn (2) in which the view laid down in the case of Nehal Chand v. Rameshvari Dassee (3) was repudiated. I still adhere to the views which I expressed in the case of Ghazidin v. Fakir Bakhsh, (1) and I have no doubt that an appeal did lie to the lower appellate Court.

And holding this view, I need not deal with the contention pressed upon me by Mr. Kashi Prasad, on behalf of the respondent, that if an appeal did not lie to the lower appellate Court, this appeal would, a fortiori, not lie, and the only possible remedy for the appellant, in that event, would have been, perhaps, an application under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code for revision.

The next point which has been argued before me at considerable length by Pandit Sundar Lal on behalf of the appellant, is that the words "such Court" as they occur in s. 243, Civil Procedure Code, limit the exercise of the powers contemplated by that section to decrees passed by the Court in which the suit is pending; and upon this ground the learned pleader goes further and contends that the decree sought to be executed, namely, the decree of the 27th November, 1886, being a decree passed in appeal by the High Court, the Court of first instance, even as a Court executing this Court's appellate decree, could not apply the provisions of s. 243 to such a case. The reason of the contention put before me by the learned pleader is that a Full Bench of this Court in Shohrut Singh [392] v. Bridgman (4) has held that the decree of the Court of last instance is the only decree susceptible of execution, and the specifications of the decrees of the lower Court or Courts, as such, may not be referred to and applied by the Court executing such decree. Taking the Full Bench ruling as the central point of the argument, the learned pleader contends that the decree of the 27th November, 1886, could not be dealt with under s. 243, as it was not a decree passed by the Court in which the suit was pending.

I cannot accept this contention. There is no doubt that I am bound to accept the authority of the Full Bench ruling upon which the learned pleader relies, but it is not inconsistent with that ruling to say that the decrees of the Courts of appellate jurisdiction are, by reason of ss. 581 and 583 of the Civil Procedure Code, subject to the same rules as those decrees which have been passed by the Court of original jurisdiction. S. 581 of the Code simply specifies how appellate decrees are to be dealt with, and inter alia it goes on to say that such decree "shall be filed with the original proceedings in the suit, and an entry of the judgment of the appellate Court shall be made in the register of civil suits."

Now the next matter which has to be considered is, how such decrees are to be executed; and upon this point, I think Mr. Kashi Prasad was right in calling my attention to s. 235, cl. (d), which in stating the contents of application for execution of decree, directly contemplates that the application for execution is to state any modifications or reversals, &c., which the appellate Court's decree may have introduced in the decree. What Pandit Sundar Lal contends is that, notwithstanding the provisions of ss. 581 and 583 of the Code, a Court in exercising the powers under s. 243 of the Civil Procedure Code is limited to its own decrees, and that such powers do not apply to decrees passed either by a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, or by a Court of appeal, even though such decrees may, under the rules of procedure, have to be executed by the Court to which an application under s. 243 is presented. In supporting this contention the learned pleader has, in the first place, called my attention to s. 228 of the Code, which relates to the execution of decrees transmitted by other Courts for execution to a Court, and he argues that it is only because that section specifically [393] states that the powers possessed by the Court to which the decree is sent, are to be co-extensive and similar in respect of such decrees that the provisions of s. 243 would be applicable, and he contends that because s. 243 does not contain any specification of such a character with reference to appellate decrees, therefore that section would not be applicable to this case. But it seems to me that this contention is somewhat inconsistent, because as Mr. Kashi Prasad has contended, provisions corresponding to s. 228, so far as their application to the general rules as to execution of decrees is concerned, are to be found in s. 583 of the Code.

That section, in stating how an appellate Court's decree is to be executed, goes on to say that "such Court shall proceed to execute the decree passed in appeal according to the rules hereinbefore prescribed for the execution of decrees in suits."

Just as I have before now held that the provisions of s. 582 of the Civil Procedure Code render the earlier rules as to original suits applicable mutatis mutandis also to the procedure in appeals, so I also hold that the effect of the provisions of s. 583 is to render all the antecedent rules as to execution of decrees in Courts of original jurisdiction, applicable also to the execution of decrees passed by Courts of appellate jurisdiction.

And once this view is accepted, not only the provisions of s. 243 but of various other parts of the Code become applicable. For instance, the proviso to s. 246, which in stating how cross-decrees are to be dealt with for the purposes of setting off one decree against another, goes on to say (consistently with the principle which I have accepted as the basis of the rule), that "the decrees contemplated by this section are decrees capable of execution at the same time, and by the same Court." I think it is clear that by reason of this rule, the provisions of s. 228, as also of s. 243, as also of s. 583, would become applicable, and the Court executing its own decree could set off that decree against the decree passed by another Court, if that decree has been transmitted to it or is a decree of the appellate Court, when such decree is before the Court for execution. This reasoning, however, is applicable only by analogy, because the exact point before me is simply whether or not, within the meaning of s. 243 read with s. 583 of the [394] Code, are included in the decrees not only of the Court in which the suit is pending but also decrees of appellate Courts. As I have already said, I hold that the suit being pending before the Subordinate Judge of Farukhabad, and the High Court's decree of the 27th November, 1886, being before the Court for execution, that Court or the Court to which an appeal would lie for the purpose of the decree, had jurisdiction to stay execution within the meaning of s. 243 of the Civil Procedure Code.

The only ruling against this view which Pandit Sundar Lal has cited to me is the case of Mittun Bibi v. Bazloor Khan (1), which turned upon the interpretation of s. 209 of the old Code of Civil Procedure (Act VIII of 1859), which section corresponds to s. 243 of the present Code of Civil Procedure. It was in interpreting that section that Jackson, J., laid down the rule that "when an application to stay execution of a decree is made to a Court in which a suit is pending against the decree-holder, the Court's competency under s. 209, Act VIII of 1859, to grant the application depends on the decree being its own decree." The other learned Judge before whom the case was argued was Hobhouse, J., who began his judgment by stating that he had some doubts in consequence of the provisions of s. 362 of the same Code (Act VIII of 1859) which section corresponds to s. 583 of the present Code upon which Mr. Kashi Prasad has relied. It seems to me that the doubts of Hobhouse, J., were well founded, and although he deferred to the views of Jackson, J., the rule of law laid down in the case is, as I respectfully think, unsound, opposed as that rule seems to me to the broad and fundamental principles of the equitable doctrines of compensation and set-off upon which I dwelt at some length, with the approval of my brother Straight in Ishri v. Gopal Saran (2), which, though a suit for pre-emption, involved considerations not dissimilar to those in the case, so far as the question of principle is concerned. It is doubtful whether the ruling of Jackson, J., has since been followed by the Calcutta Court itself, because Pandit Sundar Lal has not been able to show me any such ruling. On the contrary, the general ratio decidendi upon which the ruling of my brother Straight and myself in Ghazidin v. Fakir Bakhsh (3) [395] proceeded and the ratio decidendi of the cases to which it refers, are opposed to the ruling of Jackson, J., in the case above cited, and the ruling of my brother Straight and myself, as I have already said, was adopted by the Calcutta Court in the latest case of O. Steel & Co. v. Ichhamoy Chowdhraïn (4).

The only other point which I have got to deal with is whether or not, upon the merits of the case, the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court was right in staying execution of decree pending the decision of the present suit. Upon this point I think I need not say much, because it is admitted before me that the suit which ended in dismissal by this Court on the 27th November, 1886, was a suit filed by Musammat Gopi, the present judgment-debtor respondent, that the suit failed on a technical point of law as to whether or not the suit in its then form was maintainable, that the suit now pending before the Subordinate Judge of Farakhabad is a suit by the same Musammat Gopi against the same Kassa Mal, for purposes of a remedy which is now prayed for in lieu of that which was prayed for in the former unsuccessful litigation; that the costs awarded by the decree of the 27th November, 1886, are costs in the former decree of the older litigation, and that if the suit now pending before the Subordinate Judge succeeds, the costs might not have to be paid by Musammat Gopi, but on the contrary, she might have to recover considerable sums of money from the present decree-holder appellant, Kassa Mal, or at least, might be entitled to claim set-off for her decree against the decree for costs held by the appellant.

If the costs were a simple debt instead of being a judgment debt, the defendant might possibly have pleaded the amount as a set off under s. 111, Civil Procedure Code, against the claim of Musammat Gopi in the suit now pending; but without deciding this question, I may add, that whilst it is not shown that the stay of execution will materially prejudice the decree-holder appellant, there are indications in the circumstances of the case, to suggest the suspicion that the execution has been prayed for by the decree-holder, mainly with the object of hampering the respondent Musammat Gopi, in prosecuting the suit now pending against the decree-holder.

[396] I think, under these circumstances, the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court exercised a sound discretion in staying execution of the decree of the 27th November, 1886. I dismiss the appeal with costs.

NAGAR MAL AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. ALI AHMAD AND OTHERS
(Defendants).* [9th February, 1888.]

Act XXIII of 1871 (Pensions Act), ss. 3, 4, 6, 9—Grant of land revenue—Suit by assignees zamindars for arrears—Right of plaintiffs admitted by Government—Suit not barred for want of Collector's certificate.

The sections of the Pensions Act (XXIII of 1871) restricting the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts to entertain suits relating to pensions of grants of money or land revenue must be construed strictly.

Held, that a suit by the assignees from Government of land revenue, whose rights were admitted by Government, to recover arrears from persons admittedly liable to pay revenue to somebody, but who disputed plaintiffs' right thereto, came within section 9 of the Pension Act (XXIII of 1871) and was not barred by sections 4 and 6 by reason of no certificate having been obtained as therein provided.

By a proceeding of the Special Commissioner for the districts of Meerut, Agra, Bareilly and Delhi, held on the 26th July, 1843, the lands described in the plaint filed in the suit, as also other lands which together formed the area of mauza Dumchandpur in pargana Deoband, were released from payment of revenue to Government in perpetuity, such revenue being assigned by Government to certain persons who were muafidars of the village, among whom the assignors of the plaintiffs in this suit were some. In the year 1861, when the settlement of the village was renewed, the zemindars of the village in their engagement with Government promised to pay the revenue assessed on it to the muafidars according to a separate statement prepared at the time.

The defendants, who are some of the zemindars of the village, did not pay to the plaintiffs for the three fasli years from 15th November, 1882, to 15th June, 1885, the portion of revenue payable to them, and so the sum of Rs. 301-8-9, became due. The [397] plaintiffs therefore instituted this suit for recovery of the amount and also for a declaration of their rights as representatives of the original assignees from Government of the revenue payable in respect of certain land to receive the same. They based their suit on the wajib-ul-arz of the year 1861 and the muafi statement then prepared.

The defendants pleaded several matters, namely, that the suit was not cognizable by the Civil Court; that the certificate mentioned in section 6 of the Pensions Act (XXIII of 1871) not having been obtained, a Civil Court cannot take cognizance of the claim, and that the plaintiffs have no right to sue them for the amount.

Munsif of Deoband, who tried the suit in the first instance, overruling all the pleas in bar, found on the merits for the plaintiffs and decreed their claim. On appeal by the defendants the District Judge, relying on the authority of Babji Ram v. Raja Ram (1), held that the claim was not cognizable by the Civil Court without a certificate from the Collector and dismissed the suit.

On behalf of the plaintiffs it was contended in second appeal that the suit was saved by the provisions of section 9 of the Act, and therefore cognizable by the Civil Court without the certificate from the Collector.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, and Tyrrell, JJ.—In this case the plaintiffs claim to have paid to them a sum of Rs. 301-8-3 for three years' arrears due to them from the zamindars, defendants, by a declaration of their right thereto, as the representatives of the original assignee from Government, of the revenue payable in respect of certain land. The amount of this revenue was determined at the settlement, and by paragraph 12 of the wajib-ul-arz the zamindars promised to pay it. The Munsif decreed the claim, and the learned Judge, in appeal by the defendants, decided all the pleas against them, but being of opinion that the suit was barred by the provisions of s. 4 of the Pensions Act (XXIII of 1871), the plaintiffs not having obtained the sanction required by that section, decreed the appeal [398] and dismissed the suit. The propriety of this decision is the sole point raised in second appeal.

Now it is the well-understood rule that the Civil Courts have jurisdiction to try all suits of a civil nature, the cognizance whereof is not prohibited by any positive enactment, and upon the face of the plaint in the present case it is obvious that the claim of the plaintiffs would ordinarily fall within their jurisdiction. It must further be taken as conceded that the Government has not only recognised the right asserted by the plaintiffs by the action of the officer who conducted the settlement, but at the present moment admits them; that the zamindars themselves undertook to pay the revenue assessed to the plaintiffs, and that the defendants, who stand in the shoes of those zamindars, are under the same liability, but have repudiated it as alleged by the plaintiffs. There is obviously, therefore, no question between the plaintiffs and the Government, but their only dispute is with the defendants, who have denied their right. We have then to examine Act XXIII of 1871 to see if it contains any prohibition to such a dispute being made the subject of determination by a Civil Court, and in doing so it is appropriate to bear in mind what was said by Westropp, C.J., in Rarji Mandlik v. Dadaji Desai (1), that "an enactment of a character so arbitrary as Act XXIII of 1871, which purports to deprive the subject of his right to resort to the ordinary courts of justice for relief in certain cases, ought to be construed strictly, and the Court should not extend its operation further than the language of the Legislature requires." (See also Gurushidgavda v. Rudragavdati) (2). It must be admitted that the moneys claimed by the plaintiffs are a grant of land revenue, which by s. 3 of the Act in question "includes anything payable on the part of Government in respect of any right," &c., and that prima facie they would come within the prohibitions of s. 4 and the accompanying provision of ss. 5 and 6, and the suit would accordingly be barred, no sanction confessedly having been obtained to its institution. It remains then to be seen whether there is any saving clause in the Act to relieve the plaintiffs from the difficulty, and it is obvious that if s. 9 does not help them, there is no other provision that will. It is to be observed in regard to s. 6 that, [399] while a Civil Court may take cognizance of claims to money payable on the part of Government in respect of a right upon receiving a certificate, "it shall not make any order or decree in any suit whatever by which the liability of Government to pay any such pension or grant as aforesaid is affected directly or indirectly."

Now it seems to us that taking s. 6 in contradistinction to s. 9, the kind of claim which is contemplated by the former section is one where, a pension or grant being admitted by Government, there are several claimants to the right to receive it, in whole or in part, the merits of whose respective claims may well be adjudicated upon by a Civil Court, for the purpose of informing Government as to the proper person or persons, to whom, so long as such pension or grant is continued, it shall be paid, though such adjudication in no way binds Government to continue, to pay it. In such a suit it can readily be seen why Government should be regarded as having an interest in the sense that, being ready and willing to pay the pension or grant, it desires to pay it to the right person. Reading ss. 5 and 6 together, they seem to us to provide for two alternative methods of treatment for claims of the kind we have mentioned: first, by application to the Collector and by an order made by him, or, if he thinks it more suitable, by a trial of the claim in a Civil Court on his certificate. In the present case, however, the existence of the grant, the right to which is claimed by the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs' right thereto, are not only not denied by Government, but, on the contrary, they are admitted, and the matter simply stands thus, that the plaintiffs, as the assignees of the Government revenue payable on certain land, whose right thereto is admitted by Government, are primarily suing the defendants, who admittedly are bound to pay such revenue to somebody, for arrears due to them as such assignees. Were the suit limited to this relief merely, it would, under the terms of s. 93 of the Rent Act, lie exclusively in the Revenue Court. But the defendants, not claiming that the land is revenue-free, have denied the title of the plaintiffs as assignees, and have thus driven them into a Civil Court to establish their title, not as against counter-claimants to the assignees' right, but as against persons who withhold revenue, which is incontestably payable by them, to others, whose right thereto is admitted by Government. It seems to us [400] that such a suit only lies in the Civil Court, that it is one within the spirit of s. 9, and, as such, is saved from the prohibition of s. 4, and that the learned Judge's view was erroneous, and that the suit to which the ruling of the Bombay Court in Babaji Hari v. Rajaram Bullab (1), upon which he relied applies, is distinguishable from the present in the particulars to which we have referred.

We decree the appeal and, reversing the decree of the Judge, restore that of the first Court. The plaintiffs to have their costs in all Courts.

BALMUKAND (Decree-holder) v. PANCHAM (Judgment-debtor).*
[17th February, 1888.]

A Court of first instance decreed a claim for pre-emption conditionally, on the pre-emptor paying into Court Rs. 125 within a specified period, and also awarded the pre-emptor Rs. 39-9-0 as his costs in the suit. Within the specified period the pre-emptor paid into Court the Rs. 125, and subsequently executed his decree for costs, by drawing out therefrom the Rs. 39-9-0. After this the decree was modified on appeal, the appellate Court raising the Rs. 125 payable as the condition of pre-emption to Rs. 200, and reversing the first Court's order as to costs. Within the period specified in the appellate Court's decree the pre-emptor paid into Court the further sum of Rs. 75. Subsequently the vendee, defendant, applied to the Court under s. 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure to have the property in suit restored to him, contending that the pre-emptor had failed to pay the full Rs. 200 within the prescribed period.

Held by Straight, J., affirming the judgment of Mahmood, J., that this contention must fail; that the payment of Rs. 125 due under the first Court's decree could not be said to have been reduced by the pre-emptor subsequently executing against the amount so paid the order of that Court in his favour for costs, and that the subsequent payment of Rs. 75 within the period prescribed by the appellate Court satisfied the requirements of that Court's decree, subject to the judgment-debtor's right to recover the costs realized in execution of the first Court's decree.

Held by Tyrrell, J., contra, that although the pre-emptor had once made a payment, which for a few days was a compliance with the first Court's decree, such compliance became immaterial when that decree was modified on appeal, and as he had never had in any Court a credit for Rs. 200, as required by the appellate Court's decree, which alone was the decree in the cause, he had failed to fulfil the condition essential to pre-emption, and therefore the defendant's application should be allowed.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts necessary for the disposal of this appeal may be briefly recapitulated as follows:—

One Musammatt Umedi Kuar, by a sale-deed executed on the 10th July, 1883, sold the property now in suit in favour of Balmukand, the appellant before me. That sale appears to have been made in contravention of the pre-emptive right possessed by Pancham, the respondent before me, and he sued for the enforcement of that right, and on the 20th December, 1883, obtained a decree awarding him the pre-emptive right and possession of the property on payment of a sum of Rs. 125, together with costs. From that decree an appeal was preferred by the purchaser, Balmukand, and the lower appellate Court, which had to deal with that case, decreed the appeal so far as to increase the sum of Rs. 125 to Rs. 200 as consideration of the sale, and in regard to costs that Court decreed that the parties should pay their own costs. The decree specified that the sum of Rs. 200 was to be deposited by the pre-emptor within a month of the time when that Court's decree would become final, by which it must be understood, as has been held in more than one ruling, to be the date upon which the period of limitation for an appeal would expire.

In the meantime it appears that Pancham, respondent, having obtained the decree of the first Court dated the 20th December, 1883, went with Rs. 125 to the Court which passed that decree, on the 15th January, 1884, and on that date deposited the sum of Rs. 125 which that decree directed. The deposit was undoubtedly within the time allowed by that decree, and there is no question that it was a valid deposit of the purchase-money. But the decree under which the deposit was made also awarded costs amounting to Rs. 39-9-0 to Pancham, and it appears that subsequently, by executing that decree, he realized the sum last mentioned from the Court on the 5th March, 1884. Both these facts [402] are antecedent, of course, to the appellate Court's decree of the 18th April, 1884. It then appears that, in obedience to the latter decree, the said Pancham deposited a sum of Rs. 75 on the 14th May, 1884, in order to make up the earlier deposit of Rs. 125 up to the sum of Rs. 200 as required by the appellate Court's decree.

Certain proceedings then appear to have taken place in the Court of first instance, to which it is not necessary to refer beyond saying that they led to an application for review of judgment preferred by Balmukand, the present appellant, to the lower appellate Court, praying for review of that Court's decree of the 18th April, 1884. The application appears to have been granted, and the decree of the 18th April, 1884, was considerably modified in respect of the order as to costs, and such modification is indicated in the order passed upon review dated the 3rd February, 1885.

It is the decree as modified by this last-mentioned order in respect of which Balmukand presented the application from which this appeal has arisen. The application was made on the 6th June, 1885, praying that the property in respect of which Pancham had succeeded in enforcing pre-emption might be restored to the applicant, because Pancham had not deposited the whole amount of Rs. 200 within the period limited either by the decree of the 18th April, 1884, or by the amended decree of the 3rd February, 1885, inasmuch as he had taken away the sum of Rs. 39-9-0 as costs under the decree of the first Court dated the 20th December, 1883, which decree, as I have already mentioned, had been modified by the lower appellate Court as to costs.

Both the Courts have rejected this contention upon the ground that, under the circumstances of the case, Pancham, the pre-emptor, had fulfilled the conditions of the lower appellate Court's decree in respect of the deposit of Rs. 200.

I am of opinion that the conclusion at which the lower Courts have arrived is sound under the circumstances of this case. In the first place, the first Court's decree of the 20th December, 1883, was duly obeyed by the pre-emptor Pancham when he made the deposit of Rs. 125 on the 15th January, 1884, and it was in due obedience to that same decree that he realized the sum of Rs. 39 9-0 on the 5th March, 1884, as the costs of the litigation to which he [403] was declared entitled by that Court's decree. The lower appellate Court's decree of the 18th April, 1884, which increased the amount of Rs. 125 to the sum of Rs. 200, was also duly obeyed by Pancham, the pre-emptor, when he made the additional deposit of Rs. 75 on the 14th May, 1884. The effect of such deposit was that, as a matter of fact, Rs. 200 were deposited in obedience to the decree of the 18th April, 1884, which decree in this respect was not modified by the decree passed on review dated 3rd February, 1885.

What is argued now is simply the question that because on the 5th March, 1884, Pancham, the pre-emptor, took away the sum of Rs. 39-9 0 in execution of the decree of the 20th December, 1883, it was his duty, in obeying the decree of the appellate Court of the 18th April, 1884, to have deposited on the 14th May, 1884, not only the sum of Rs. 75 but also the sum of Rs. 39-9-0 which he had already taken away as I have mentioned. It appears to me that this contention involves a conclusion between two different matters which require consideration in this case. Whether or not the order whereunder Pancham took away Rs. 39-9-0 on the 5th March, 1884, was a legal and valid order is one question, and the question whether the deposit of Rs. 125 made on the 15th January, 1884, and the additional deposit of Rs. 75 made on the 14th May, 1884, did or did not amount to a deposit of Rs. 200 within the meaning of the appellate Court's decree, is another. It is only the last question I am called upon to consider. I hold that the lower appellate Court's decree being dated the 8th April, 1884, and the two deposits aggregating to Rs. 200 having been made within the time fixed, the pre-emptor did not forfeit the pre-emptive rights which had been declared in his favour by that decree. The terms of s. 214 of the Code which relate to such matters contain no provisions that under conditions of this character the right already established, proved, and decreed should be vitiated simply because by an order of the Court, erroneous or not, a portion of the price deposited was returned in execution of a decree. It is not necessary for me to decide any question as to the order whereunder Rs. 39-9-0 were taken by Pancham, but I think I may say, that in circumstances such as these, it is likely, there is still open to the present purchaser Balmu-[404] kand, appellant, the remedy to obtain restitution of the sum of Rs. 39-9 which Pancham took away under the order of the Court, and that such remedy could be obtained by him under the appellate decree of the 18th April, 1884, amended as it was on the 3rd February, 1885. Upon the general principles relating to the doctrine of restitution, I need only refer to the case of Jaswant Singh v. Dip Singh (1). This being so, I do not think that the plea urged on behalf of the appellant is sustainable. I dismiss this appeal with costs.

The parties were represented as before.

on the 15th of January, 1884, as satisfying the condition contained in the decree of the 20th December, 1883, and put the pre-emptor in possession, the purchase price directed thereby to be paid must be taken to have been then and there pro tanto discharged, and the payment ought, in my opinion, to hold good, in any event, as and for the full amount of Rs. 125. The fact that upon another application and by way of executing the decree, which by the payment of the Rs. 125 had become absolute in favour of the pre-emptor and so capable of execution for his costs, a sum of Rs. 39-9-0 was on the 5th March, 1884, paid to the decree-holder in respect of such costs, does not appear to me to alter or qualify the nature of such payment any more than could be the case where a debtor who has paid a sum of money to his creditor for the liquidation of a specific debt, which is accordingly written off as specified, can be said to reduce such payment by the amount of any subsequent loan taken by him from the creditor. Quia the Munsif's Court which admitted the decree to execution on payment of the Rs. 125, the whole amount was held to the credit of the vendee from the 15th January, 1884, to the 1st of March, 1884, and he might have withdrawn it at any moment. On the 1st of March it stood as money belonging to the vendee, against which the pre-emptor was entitled to execute for his costs, and that the [405] Court so regarded it is evident by its first paying out the Rs. 39-9 and subsequently receiving the Rs. 75 on the 14th May, 1884, as sufficiently making up the Rs. 200, which the appellate Court had found to be the true price and had called upon the pre-emptor to deposit. The Court having accepted the Rs. 75 as satisfying the requirements of the appellate decree, it would, in my opinion, be most inequitable to hold that it did not, more particularly as the pre-emptor has in the proceedings the subject of the present appeal, expressed his willingness to refund the costs he realized, and for aught that appears to the contrary, has all along been ready to do so. In dealing with the appellate decree, I think the Courts were justified in regarding the Rs. 125, paid in compliance with the Munsif's decree, as a payment to that amount on account of the Rs. 200 subsequently ordered to be paid by the appellate Court, and as in no way involved in distinct questions arising between the parties in reference to costs. I am not prepared, therefore, to hold that the Courts below, whose orders my brother Mahmood has upheld, were wrong in taking the view that there had been no default on the part of the pre-emptor, and I therefore dismiss the appeal with costs.

TYRRELL, J.—On the 20th December, 1883, Pancham, respondent, got a decree under s. 214 of the Civil Procedure Code, enforcing his right, of pre-emption as against Balmukand, appellant, on condition of his paying Rs. 125 as purchase-money within a specified time. This decree also awarded Rs. 39-9-0 as costs by Balmukand to Pancham.

On the 15th January, 1884, Pancham paid this purchase-money of Rs. 125 into Court and obtained from the Court possession of the estate in suit.

On the 5th March, 1884, Pancham drew out of the hands of the Court Rs. 39 9 0 from the purchase-money he had deposited, reducing it thus to a sum of Rs. 85-7-0.

On the 18th April, 1884, the appellate Court, on the appeal of the vendee Balmukand, decreed that the true purchase-money payable to the latter by Pancham was Rs. 200 instead of Rs. 125, and it cancelled the award of Rs. 39-9-0 as costs payable by Balmukand to Pancham. By this decree then, which is the only [406] decree to be looked to in the execution of the case, Pancham's possession of the estate was made conditional on his putting the Court executing the decree in a position to pay over Rs. 200, and no less sum, to Balmukand. Now at the date of this decree Pancham had a credit by way of deposit in the Court of first instance, which was charged with executing the decree, to the amount of Rs. 85-7-0 only.

On the 13th May, 1884, he deposited Rs. 75 only, making a total deposit of Rs 160-7-0 only as the purchase-money of the estate. On the 3rd February, 1885, it was brought to the notice of the appellate Court that its decree of the 18th April, 1884, had omitted to provide for the costs of the vendee on the contingency of the pre-emptor not paying the purchase-money. The Court amended its decree by declaring that the pre-emptor failing to pay the purchase-money decreed should pay the vendee Rs. 36-11-0 as his costs. It is obvious that the appellate Court would not have allowed this motion for review, which would have been futile and superfluous, if it had regarded Pancham as having complied with its order by depositing Rs. 75, only as mentioned above. On the 6th June, 1885, the vendee Balmukand applied to the Court, under s. 583 of the Civil Procedure Code, to have the property restored to him in consequence of Pancham's failure to pay the full purchase-money within the decretal period. Both the Courts below, and Mahmood J., here, sitting in jurisdiction over second appeals of small value, have held that Pancham had complied with the decree ordering him to pay Rs. 200 as purchase-money to Balmukand. The main reason for this view seems to be that Pancham did actually once make a payment which at the moment, and for a few days, was a compliance with the decree of the Court of first instance. But it seems to me to be undeniable that Pancham has never complied with the decretal condition of the true decree in the case, the decree directing payment of Rs. 200. The decree of the Court of first instance passed out of existence on the 18th April, 1884, and we need not consider whether the pre-emptor may have complied with its terms or not. It seems to me to be undeniable that the pre-emptor has not at any moment of time from the date [407] of the institution of his suit, to the present hour, had a credit in any Court for Rs. 200, and that he has, therefore, failed to fulfil the condition essential to his possession of the vendee's estate under the decree in the suit. I fail to see how his profession of willingness now, to complete the payment long after the expiry of the decretal period, can alter his position for the better in this respect.

Under these circumstances, I think the Courts below were wrong, but as my brother Straight's decree is decisive of the appeal to the contrary, it is unnecessary to formulate the order which, from my point of view, should have been made in the case.

RAMADHIN AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs) v. MATHURA SINGH AND OTHERS (Defendants).* [2nd March 1888.]

Hindu Law—Hindu widow—Gift by Hindu widow of her own interest and that of consenting reversioner.

A Hindu widow in possession can, with the consent of a reversioner, make a valid gift which will operate so far as the interest of the widow and that of the consenting reversioner are concerned. Rany Srimuty Dibeah v. Rany Koond Luta (1) Rooer Goolab Singh v. Rao Kurun Singh (2) Sia Dasi v. Gur Sahai (3) and Raj Bullubh Sen v. Oomesh Chunder Roos, (4) referred to.

Ramphal Rai v. Tula Kuari (5) distinguished.

One Lachman Singh died some years ago leaving a widow Dharm Kuar, and a daughter, Piari Kuar. He was possessed of an eight-anna share in mauza Kharsa and some houses and gardens. On his death his widow inherited the same, and her name was recorded in respect thereof. On 25th March, 1879, she executed a deed of gift of the property in favor of one Himmut Singh, a son of her daughter, Piari Kuar. It was stated in the deed that the gift was made with the consent of Piari Kuar. Dharm Kuar died in September, 1879, leaving her daughter and two sons by her, viz., the said Himmut Singh and Bhawani Singh.

[408] By a sale deed dated 26th June, 1879, Himmut Singh conveyed half of the eight-anna share in the mauza to the plaintiffs in consideration of Rupees 7,700. Soon after this Himmut Singh died, and he could not therefore get the sale-deed registered.

After his death the plaintiffs applied to the Revenue Court for entry of their names in respect of the four-anna share conveyed to them, but on the objection of the minor son of Himmut Singh the application was refused. Plaintiffs thereupon instituted this suit for possession of the said four annas with mesne profits, against Mathura Singh, the minor son of Himmut Singh, Piari Kuar, and Bhawani Singh, brother of Himmut Singh.

Mathura Singh contended that Dharm Kuar was not competent to make the gift, and on the death of Dharm Kuar the entire estate devolved on Piari Kuar, and the sale deed executed by Himmut Singh became void on the death of Dharm Kuar.

Piari Kuar also contested the suit on the above grounds, but she had in a previous suit admitted that the gift by her mother was made with her consent.

The subordinate Judge holding that property inherited by a Hindu widow cannot be alienated by her, and relying on Ramphal Rai v. Tula Kuari (5) dismissed the suit. Plaintiff appealed and defendants contended that the only interest that passed under the gift was the life-interest of the widow, and that the consent by the daughter to the gift by her mother would not affect her interest. It was further contended that there could be no gift by the daughter of her reversionary interest.

JUDGMENT.

APPEL-
CIVIL.

EDGE, C. J., and TYRRELL, J.—This is an action for possession of a four-anna share and for mesne profits.

The case of the plaintiff is that one Dharam Kuar, the Hindu widow of Lachman Singh, on the 25th March, 1879, with the consent of her daughter Peari Kuar, a defendant, made a gift of an eight-anna zemindari share to Peari Kuar's son Himmat Singh, and that on the 26th July, 1879, Himmat Singh, having obtained [409] possession, sold a four-anna share of the eight annas to the plaintiff for Rs. 7,700. The plaintiffs applied in 1880 or 1881 for mutation of names. That application was successfully resisted by Himmat Singh's son Mathura Singh. Mathura Singh was the original defendant in the action. After the commencement of the action, Peari Kuar, Himmat Singh's mother, and Bhawani Singh, a son of Peari Kuar and brother of Himmat Singh, were made defendants. It is here admitted on the arguments that Peari Kuar did in fact consent to the gift which was made by Dharam Kuar, and not only consented to the gift by Dharam Kuar of her life interest but also of the life interest of Peari Kuar. It could not have been contended on the evidence in this case that Peari Kuar did not consent to that extent. We have before us the written statement which was filed by Peari Kuar in the case of Modho Singh and others on 25th July, 1879. That statement, as explained by Peari Kuar's evidence, is conclusive on the point, and corroborates the statement contained in the deed of gift of March, 1879. Dharam Kuar died in September, 1879. On these facts it has been contended that the only interest which passed under the deed of gift to Himmat Singh was the life interest of Dharam Kuar, and that the consent of Peari Kuar to the gift made by her mother would not affect Peari Kuar's interest. It has also been contended that there could be no gift by Peari Kuar of her reversionary interest; as she could not give possession of the property at the time of the gift in 1879. The Subordinate Judge found in favour of the defendant on the ground that Dharam Kuar had no power to make the gift, and that Peari Kuar was not competent to give her consent if in fact she had done so, and he relied in support of that finding in law on the case of Ramphal Rai v. Tula Kuari (1). The case there, was one in which another reversioner was impeaching a gift made by a Hindu widow in possession with the consent of her then next reversioner. That case would no doubt have a bearing on the present, if it were necessary for us to decide, whether or not the plaintiffs became entitled to more than the life interests of Dharam Kuar and Peari Kuar. In this case we have only to consider whether the plaintiffs were entitled to possession and to the mesne profits claimed, and we are invited only to consider [410] that question. We have not here to consider who will be the person entitled to the four annas share on the death of Peari kuar. That is a question which we leave to be decided in a further action when the time comes. We are of opinion that it is quite clear that a Hindu widow in possession can, with the consent of a reversioner, make a valid gift, which will operate so far as the interest of the widow and that of the consenting reversioner, in this case Peari Kuar, are concerned. It appears to us that that is the principle to be found in the judgment in the Privy Council case of Rany Srimuty Dibeah v. Rany Koond

We decree accordingly, and we direct an enquiry under s. 212 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be made by the Subordinate Judge as to the amount of mesne profits and direct him to report to us, when we will make further orders. RAM NARAIN (Defendant) v, BISHESHAR PRASAD (Plaintiff).
[27th March, 1888.]

Civil Procedure Code, s. 13, explanation v.—Joint Hindu family—Suit against two members—Second suit against third member—Resjudicata.

The plaintiff sued the father and [brother of defendant for trespass to a wall. His right to the wall was denied, but he obtained a decree. On executing the decree he was resisted by the defendant, who claimed the wall as his ancestral property and alleged that he was no party to the suit in which decree had been obtained against his father and brother. His claim was registered as a suit under s. 331 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Plaintiff contended that defendant was concluded by the decree obtained against his father and brother.

Held that a Hindu son in a joint family becomes entitled by reason of his birth and in his own right, a right which he can enforce against his father; he does not claim under his father within the meaning of s. 13 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Held also that the defendants in the former suit did not claim any right in common for themselves and others within the meaning of Explanation V. of s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

one of his sons, Ram Prasad. They alleged that the wall did not belong to the plaintiff, but to them. The dispute was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrator decided in favour of the plaintiff, who obtained a decree in accordance therewith. When the plaintiff took out execution of his decree, he was resisted by Ram Narayan, the second son of Chhotu, on the ground that the wall was ancestral property, and he was no party to the decree obtained against his father and brother. The result of this obstruction was the registration of Ram Narayan's claim as a suit between the plaintiff and him. The plaintiff pleaded resjudicata, this plea being founded on the decree he had obtained against Chhotu and Ram Prasad. The Court of first instance disallowed his plea, and found that the wall did not belong to the plaintiff, and altered the former decree. On appeal by the plaintiff the lower appellate Court held that the former decree was binding on Ram Narayan, defendant, [412] and reversed the decree of the first Court in this case in so far as it altered the former decree.

The defendant appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—The plaintiff in this suit had in a previous suit sued a father and son, alleging that they had wrongfully opened a door in a certain wall which stood on his land. That was really an act of trespass. The defendants, amongst other defences, alleged that the wall in question was their property and stood on their land. The matter was referred to an arbitrator. The plaintiff got an award in his favour and on that award a decree was passed on the 26th September, 1885. The defendant in this action opposed the execution of the decree upon that award and on the ground that he was no party to the action. It appears that the defendants in the former action and the defendant in this action were and are members of a joint Hindu family; one of the defendants in the former action being the father, the other being the son. The lower appellate Court considered that this case came within Explanation V of s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and held that the present defendant was concluded by the findings of the arbitrator, although personally he had not been a party to the former action or award. The lower appellate Court also found that the present defendant was aware of the proceedings which were being taken in the former action. I think that we should be careful in applying Explanation V. of s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the Explanation should not be applied to any case which does not come within the very wording of that Explanation. The defendants in the former action did not claim any right in common for themselves or others within the meaning of Explanation V. What they said was, you cannot maintain your action because the wall is ours. They said nothing about other persons being equally interested in the wall, nor does it appear that they were sued or defended the action as representatives of the family. Mr. Juala Prasad for the respondent frankly admitted that Explanation V. did not apply to this case. We think it does not. He, however, contended that s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure did apply. The parties here were [413] not the same parties as those in the former action, nor can the defendant here be said to claim under either of the defendants in the former action. The Hindu son in a joint family, as I understand the law, becomes entitled by reason of his birth and in his own right, to a right which he can enforce against his father.

He does not claim under his father within the meaning of s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A person is said to claim under another when he derives his title through that other by assignment or otherwise. We have been pressed with the case of Narayan Gop Habbu v. Pandurang Ganu (1). In that case the learned Judges found that the other members of the Hindu family whom they held to be bound by the previous proceedings had been actually assenting members of the Hindu family, who had assisted in the previous proceeding the manager of the Hindu family. They evidently treated that manager as a person who had conducted the previous litigation as the representative and on behalf of the whole family. Here the only thing that appears is that the present defendant knew that the previous action and arbitration was going on. We have also been pressed with cases in which it has been held that a decree obtained against a Hindu father for a debt, is binding against the other members of a Hindu family. Those cases are not analogous to the present. They depend, I think, more on the obligation of a Hindu son to pay his father's debts not improperly incurred, and upon the presumption in some of those cases that the action was brought against the father as the representative of the family and the family property. On the face of this case I see no such presumption. In fact, if the father was sued as representative of the Hindu family, it is not easy to see why one of his sons, namely, Ram Prasad, was made a defendant with him. In my opinion s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply to this case, and in coming to this conclusion, I am supported by the judgment of my brother Straight in Ramanand v. Koleshar (2). The lower Appellate Court has not gone into the merits of the case. The case will be remanded for trial under s. 562. This appeal is decreed, and the decree of the lower Appellate Court set aside; the costs will abide the event.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. MUNNA LAL AND ANOTHER.*

[27th March 1888.]

Criminal Procedure Code, s. 289—"No evidence"—Acquittal of accused without taking opinions of assessors—Criminal Procedure Code, s. 537.

The words "there is no evidence" in s. 289 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, cannot be extended to mean no satisfactory, trustworthy or conclusive evidence; but the third paragraph of the section means that if at a certain stage of a Sessions trial the Court is satisfied that there is not on the record, any evidence which, even if it were perfectly true, would amount to legal proof of the offence charged, then the Court has power, without consulting the assessors, to record a finding of not guilty.

But where a Court so acts only because it considers the evidence for the prosecution unsatisfactory, untrustworthy, or inconclusive, it acts without jurisdiction, and its order discharging the accused is illegal. Even if not illegal for want of jurisdiction, such action is a serious irregularity, which may or perhaps must have caused a failure of justice within the meaning of s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

In the matter of the petition of Narain Das (1) referred to.

IN this case two persons, named Munna Lal and Badri, were tried before the Sessions Judge of Cawnpore on a charge of murder. The Judge, at the close of the case for the prosecution, and without taking the opinions of the assessors, acquitted the accused by a judgment in the following terms:—

"I have without hesitation closed the proceedings in this case, without calling upon the accused to enter on their defence; and I proceed, under the third clause of s. 289 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to record a finding without taking the opinion of the assessors. The deceased, Sahib Din, was taken out of a well in the accused's compound, or Ihatah, dead. The medical evidence shows that there was one slight bruise on the deceased's forehead and no other marks of injury. The surgeon gave it as his opinion that death had been caused by drowning, but could not speak positively on this point. The theory of the prosecution is this: that deceased was sent for by the accused on account of a dispute pending between them; that he was beaten by the two accused with sticks in a large enclosure, or Ihatah, adjoining their house; that this Ihatah is [415] commonly used as a thoroughfare by all sorts of people going to and fro, and that it can also be easily seen into from various outside points; that the beating took place at 10 A.M. on market day; that the deceased was killed or stunned by the beating, and was then carried by the two accused to the large pucca well close by and thrown in; that this crime was witnessed by a number of eye witnesses, most of them friendly to the deceased; that not one of these witnesses interfered to prevent the murder; that none of them made any remark on the subject to one another or to the accused; that they, each and all, went quietly home and mentioned what they had seen to none until sent for by the police, when the inquiry into the case began.

"Such a wildly improbable theory would have to be supported by the most absolutely reliable, consistent, and unprejudiced evidence to gain any belief whatever. But in this case, not only are the witnesses mostly prejudiced against the accused, but there are gross discrepancies between the statements which they have made at various times, and improbabilities in their method of explaining difficulties, which would be sufficient to discredit a really probable and reasonable theory.

"It is not difficult to guess what really occurred in this case. But it is no part of the duty of this Court to frame conjectures unsupported by formal evidence.

"It is enough to say that the deceased must have either fallen into the well or thrown himself into it, for some reason which has not been fully disclosed. The whole body of evidence for the prosecution being utterly discredited, there are no grounds for framing any charge of a lesser offence, such as assault or hurt, against the accused. They must be acquitted."

The complainant in the case, one Misri Lal, son of the deceased, applied to the High Court for revision of the Sessions Judge's order, principally on the following grounds:—

JUDGMENT

TYRRELL, J.—This is an application arising out of a Sessions trial held at Cawnpore, in which Munna Lal and Badri were tried on a charge of murder, in a prosecution instituted on the complaint of one Misri Lal, the son of Sahib Din, deceased. The case for the prosecution appears to have been closed, the trial being held with the aid of assessors; the examination of the accused had been put in evidence, and the accused had expressed their intention of calling witnesses, when the presiding Judge closed the trial holding that there was no evidence that the accused had committed the offence of murder, and the Judge proceeded to record a finding of acquittal. This application is made for revision of this order, on the ground that the Judge was not competent, under the circumstances of this case, to make such an order. The order was made under the third paragraph of s. 289 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. If there had been no evidence on behalf of the prosecution, the order was right and legal. On the other hand, if there was any evidence which would be legal proof of the guilt of the accused in the event of the evidence being held to be trustworthy, the order was illegal.

Now, the Judge recorded that "a number of eye-witnesses" had deposed to seeing Sahib Din murdered, but he refused to believe them, because he thought them prejudiced and discrepant in their statements. It has been argued by Mr. Spankie for the acquitted persons, Munna Lal and Badri, that the words "there is no evidence" in s. 289 of the Criminal Procedure Code may be extended so as to mean no satisfactory, trustworthy, or conclusive evidence; but I do not think that this view is correct. If we were [417] to understand the words in this sense, it would be competent to a Sessions Judge to exclude his assessors from their share of the trial whenever he thought the evidence unsatisfactory or inconclusive. He might terminate any trial before him without consulting the opinion and using the judgment of the assessors, by finding that the evidence was not to be believed, and by directing a verdict of acquittal to be recorded. It is clear that it is not the intention of the Legislature that the Sessions Judges should have such a power, or that assessors might be confined to the function of giving their opinions on the evidence, in those cases only, in which the Judge was inclined to believe the evidence for the prosecution. Several rulings have been cited here to-day in support of the contrary proposition. They are to be found in Queen v. Musammatt Mina Nuggerbhatin (1), Queen v. Bhugwan Lall (2), Queen v. Rutton Dass (3), in re Hurro Shaha (1), and Queen v. Matam Mal (2). I have no doubt that the meaning of the third paragraph of s. 289 of the Criminal Procedure Code is, that if at a certain stage of a Sessions trial the Court is satisfied that there is not upon the record any evidence which, even if it were perfectly true, would amount to legal proof of the offence charged against the accused, then the Court has power, without consulting the assessors, to record a finding of not guilty. But the Sessions Judge, acting with the aid of assessors, has no such power because only he considers the evidence unsatisfactory, untrustworthy, or inconclusive. In my view a Court acting in this way acts without jurisdiction, and its order in discharging the accused is illegal. But I have been referred by the learned counsel for the acquitted persons to a ruling of this Court in the matter of the petition of Narain Dass, (3), in which procedure of this kind was designated as "a serious irregularity." I am willing to treat the order made by the Sessions Judge of Cawnpore, in this case, as being no more than a serious irregularity; and it would then be necessary to see whether, under s. 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the irregularity was one which has occasioned a failure of justice. To my mind it is obvious that there may have been, and perhaps must have been, a failure of justice in consequence of the way in which the [418] trial has been held. It is obvious that the prosecution must have been prejudiced by the omission of some important steps in the progress of the trial. The prosecution was debarred from summing up the case, and the Sessions Judge precluded himself from the advantage of taking the opinion of the assessors upon the evidence. Serious effects might have been produced upon his mind, if he had had the advantage of the opinion of the assessors, in a case, in which the whole question was, whether a considerable number of native witnesses of the lower ranks of life, had or had not told probable stories on behalf of the prosecution. And further, it is conceivable that if the case had proceeded to its legal termination, the proceedings which have since, in consequence of the Judge's order of acquittal, been taken against the son of Sahib Din and against his witnesses, might not have been instituted. But whether the Sessions Judge's order is illegal, as made without jurisdiction, or is a serious irregularity, I hold that it must be set aside, and I hereby set it aside and cancel all the proceedings held in the trial which terminated on the 13th September, 1887.

JUDGMENT.

[419] BRODHURST and TYRRELL, JJ.—The appellants are owners of a cloth business in Mirzapur. They sued the members of a firm called Sheoambar-Ram Narain for a balance, due on an account signed for the firm, by a member thereof named Mata Prasad. The Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur, who tried the original suit, gave the plaintiffs a decree against Mata Prasad only, exempting the other member of the firm, named Durga Prasad. The learned District Judge of Mirzapur in first appeal confirmed this view and refused the plaintiffs relief against Durga Prasad.

Durga Prasad died after the institution of this appeal in this Court, and upon the application of the appellants, Parsotam, a minor under the guardianship of his mother, was brought into the appeal as respondent by an order of one of the Judges of this Court. A preliminary objection was taken to-day to the hearing of this appeal by the learned pleader of the respondent, who contended that the application to bring the legal representative of the deceased Durga Prasad on the record, not having been made within the period allowed by law, the appeal had abated. We disallowed this objection, as we held that the appellants had shown sufficient cause why the application was not made within the term allowed. We are satisfied that the appellants had no knowledge of the death of Durga Prasad, and under their peculiar circumstances, had no ordinary means of knowing about the death of Durga Prasad, until after the period of limitation for making the application had expired.

As to the appeal itself, the learned District Judge found upon the evidence before him that Durga Prasad was a member of the Sheoambar-Ram Narain firm. He also found that Mata Prasad had unquestionably acknowledged a balance of Rs. 1,036-9-0 to be due on Pus badi 15, Sambat 1940, from the firm of Sheoambar-Ram Narain to the plaintiffs in this case. He said:—"I have compared and found this correct—Mata Prasad." The learned Judge also found that this examination, comparison, and acknowledgment of the debt due by the Sheoambar-Ram Narain firm to the plaintiffs, was effected by this Mata Prasad in the ordinary course of the partnership business of that firm. He found that Durga Prasad had similarly signed for the firm and made acknowledgments for the firm on other occasions. He held that Durga Prasad by his [420] conduct indicated that he had authority to act as the agent of his partner, Mata Prasad, and similarly Mata Prasad had authority to act as the agent of his partner Durga Prasad. In other words, the learned Judge found that the acknowledgment and signature of this entry was a transaction such as is contemplated in s. 251 of the Indian Contract Act. Having found these facts, the learned Judge would have proceeded to give the plaintiffs the relief they claimed against Durga Prasad, if he had not conceived that he was precluded by the terms of s. 21 of the Indian Limitation Act, from giving effect to the acknowledgment against Durga Prasad. We think that in this point the learned District Judge was wrong. The section in question is as follows:—

"Nothing in ss. 19 and 20 renders one of several joint contractors partners, executors or mortgagees chargeable by reason only of a written acknowledgment signed, or of a payment made by, or by the agent of, any other or others of them."

Apparently the Court below reads this section as if the word "only" did not stand in it—that is to say, reads the section as prescribing that nothing in ss. 19 and 20 would render a written acknowledgment of one joint contractor an acknowledgment on behalf of his brother contractors. But the word "only" is not to be treated as surplusage. The meaning of the word "only" in that section, in our opinion, is that the mere writing or signing of an acknowledgment by one partner does not necessarily of itself bind his co-partners, unless also it can be shown that he had power to bind that partner for the purpose of making such an acknowledgment, and in effect purported so to bind him. This view of the section has been taken in the ruling of Premji Ludha v. Dossa Doongersey (1), and is in conformity with the law laid down in similar cases by the English Courts. It appears to us that, upon the finding of the learned District Judge, Mata Prasad was competent to acknowledge the balance, not only for himself, but for his partner, and that he did so when he wrote the words "Pus badi 15, Sambat 1940, balance of Rs. 1,086-9-0, signed by Sheoambar-Ram Narain, compared and found correct by pen of Mata Prasad."

[421] This being so, the decree of the Court below was wrong, and the appellants should have obtained the relief they sought, not only against Mata Prasad, but against his deceased partner Durga Prasad. We set aside the decree of the Court below and decree the plaintiff's claim and also this appeal with costs.

*Evidence—Exclusion of evidence of oral agreement—Act I of 1872 (Evidence Act), s. 92—

The words in s. 92 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872) "between the parties to any such instrument" refer to the persons who on the one side and the other came together to make the contract or disposition of property, and would not apply to questions raised between the parties on the one side only of a deed, regarding their relations to each other under the contract. The words do not preclude one of two persons in whose favor a deed of sale purported to be executed, from proving by oral evidence in a suit by the one against the other, that the defendant was not a real but a nominal party only to the purchase, and that the plaintiff was solely entitled to the property to which it related.

M. conveyed certain houses and premises to plaintiff and defendant jointly by a sale-deed. Plaintiff sued defendant for ejection from the premises, alleging that he alone was the real purchaser, and that defendant was only nominally associated with him in the deed. Held that s. 92 of the Evidence Act will not preclude plaintiff from showing by oral evidence that he alone was the real

THE facts of this case were as follows :—On the 13th March, 1877, a deed of sale of certain houses and other premises was executed by one Murlidhar, and purported to be in favour of two brothers, named Ganga Prasad and Mulchand, jointly, for Rs. 1,000. The deed was registered on the 14th March, 1877, and one of the endorsements made at the time of registration set forth that Murlidhar, the vendor, acknowledged that Rs. 200 had been previously paid, and that the balance of Rs 800 had now been paid to him, before the Sub-Registrar, by both Ganga Prasad and Mulchand.

On the 6th January, 1886, the present suit was brought by Ganga Prasad against Mulchand, the plaintiff, praying in substance [422] for a declaration that he alone was the real purchaser from Murlidhar under the deed of the 13th March, 1877, and for the ejectment of Mulchand and his son Babu Ram from a portion of the premises of which they had some years previously obtained possession by his license, but to which they now asserted a proprietary title. The plaintiff alleged that although Mulchand's name also was entered in the deed, the whole of the purchase-money had come out of his (the plaintiff's) pocket; that he alone had for some time subsequent to the sale been in possession of the property in suit; that he had subsequently lent a sitting-room to the defendants, and that when he asked them to vacate it for the purpose of having certain part of the premises rebuilt, they refused to do so, and obstructed him in the rebuilding. In defence, the defendants pleaded that Mulchand was in fact, and not merely nominally, a purchaser under the deed of the 13th March, 1877, that he had paid Rs. 500 of the purchase-money out of his own pocket, and that he had been in proprietary possession of the premises in his occupation from the date of purchase. Pending the suit the plaintiff died, and his son Madho Ram was brought on the record in his place.

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Moradabad) found that the plaintiff's allegations were established by the evidence, and decreed the claim. On appeal, the District Judge of Moradabad affirmed the Subordinate Judge's decree, relying mainly if not wholly upon the fact, which he apparently held to be established, that the plaintiff had paid the whole amount of the consideration for the sale.

From the lower appellate Court's decree the defendants appealed to the High Court.

ORDER.

BRODHURST and TYRRELL, JJ.—We had heard this appeal out on the merits on both sides, and were proceeding to remand some issues or questions of fact to the lower appellate Court, which had determined the single question of payment of the sale price only, when a legal plea in bar of the action was raised by the learned [423] vakil for the defendants. It is based on the rule of s. 92 of the Indian Evidence Act, which excludes evidence of an oral agreement as between the parties to any instrument of the kind contemplated in that section, for the purpose of contradicting, varying, adding to, or subtracting from its terms. It was contended that the inquiries which we propose to make will involve the consideration of oral evidence, which may have the effect of varying the terms of the sale-deed under which the plaintiff and defendants jointly acquired the premises in suit. We heard argument and gave careful consideration to this proposition, and we have had the advantage of conferring with the learned Chief Justice and our brother Straight on the point. We are of opinion that the answer to the learned Pandit's contention is to be found in the proper interpretation of the phrase, "as between the parties to any such instruments," the words "the parties" being rightly read to imply the persons who on one side and on the other came together to make the contract. In the case before us, the "parties" in this sense would be the vendor on the one part and the two vendees on the other part. "As between" the vendor and themselves, neither of the vendees would be heard to plead, or would be allowed to offer, oral evidence to show that both were not parties to the buying of his house. Neither vendees could resist the vendor's claim for the price, or for any other relief properly arising to him out of the contract, on a plea intended to show that one of the two was a nominal party only to the contract. Similarly one of the several obligors of a bond or bill of exchange would not be allowed in answer to the obligee's action on the joint instrument to maintain a plea that he was a surety only; except of course in a case where a money-lender made advances on the security of a joint and separate note, being well aware at the time that one of its makers was a surety only. In such a case, notwithstanding the form of the note, the surety has been allowed to plead, as an equitable defence and prove that he was known by the lender to be a surety when the note was made, and that without his consent, the principal had had time given to him by the lender. (See the cases cited in note 6, para. 1054, p. 1004, Taylor on Evidence, vol. ii, ed. 1872). Such a case as this would fall probably under proviso 1 to s. 92. But on the other hand, we think that this section would not apply to [424] questions, like that of the present case, raised by the parties on one side inter se, and not affecting the other party to the contract, touching their relations to each other in the transaction. The evidence in this respect would be offered not to vary, contradict, add to or subtract from the terms of the vendees' joint liability under the contract of purchase and sale from their vendor, but only to show as between themselves, the two vendees to wit, which was the real purchaser, or rather whether Mulchand was not the trustee only of his brother Ganga Prasad. Analogously in the case of the promisors of a joint note, it is competent to one of them, who has had to pay the entire debt, to show in variation of the terms of the note, as against a co-promisor, that the payer was a surety only, and proving this to get a decree for indemnification against his co-promisor. If we were to give to the terms of s. 92 a more extended interpretation, and to read them as excluding the admission of oral evidence to vary the terms of an instrument as between the parties on one side only thereto, as much and in the same way as the section certainly excludes the admission of such evidence as between the parties on both sides to the instrument, we should have, we fear, to close our Courts to many applications, no matter how justly founded, for equitable relief in cases such as we noticed passingly above: cases between co-promisors, co-obligors, co-debtors of accommodation bills, and the like, in which our Courts daily interfere to relieve parties in variation or even in contradiction of the written terms of an instrument of contract. to which they were parties on the one side together.

Taking this view, we over-rule the contention of the appellants on this point, and we must dispose of the appeal of Mulchand on the merits. The Court of first instance on a review of all the evidence found, that he was not a real but was a nominal party only to the purchase of the house property in question, and it gave the plaintiff a decree. The lower appellate Court confirming this decision, has left several important issues undetermined. It has decided in uncertain terms, and on somewhat inconclusive grounds, that the sale price, Rs. 800, was found by Ganga Prasad, no part of the fund having been contributed, at the time of the sale at least, by Mulchand. But obviously this finding does not conclude the question. The brothers were apparently joint purchasers, [425] with joint interests, and the payment by one may have been for both, or may have been open to subsequent adjustment inter se. To enable us to decide whether Mulchand was a substantial party to the purchase or nominal only, whether he stands in the sale deed as a beneficial owner, or merely as a trustee for Ganga Prasad, we must have findings on certain other questions, namely:—

1. If Mulchand had no substantial interest in the contract, why was he associated with Ganga Prasad, in the making, execution, and registration thereof?

2. At the date of the contract, were Ganga Prasad and Mulchand associated as joint in any respect, in living, in estate, or in particular business?

3. When did Mulchand get possession of any part of the premises?

4. In what way did he enter?

(a) By right in the ordinary course of things as beneficially interested?

(b) By license of Ganga Prasad or by trespass?

Ten days will be allowed for objections.

DAWAN SINGH (Defendant) v. MAHIP SINGH (Plaintiff).
[2nd July, 1888.]

Defamation—Personal insult—Cause of action—Verbal abuse—Special damage—Witness—Privilege.

The plaintiff was cited as a witness by one S. in a suit instituted by him against defendant. After plaintiff's evidence had been concluded, in which he stated that there was no enmity between him and defendant; the defendant was examined by the Court, and stated that there was enmity between him and plaintiff, and on the Court inquiring to know what was the cause of enmity, defendant used words conveying the meaning that plaintiff's descent was illegitimate.

Held, by Brodhurst, J., that, under the circumstances, the statement complained of was made by defendant while deposing in the witness-box, and therefore absolutely privileged.

[426] Per Mahmood, J. (contra), that the question whether or not the statement complained of was made by defendant in course of his deposition, or after it was finished and when he was no longer in the witness-box, has not been tried, and the order remanding the case for trial on the merits was right.

* First Appeal No. 2 of 1888 from an order of Maulvi Mahmood Said Khan, Subordinate Judge of Jaunpur, dated the 13th December, 1887.

Further, that the English law of slander as forming part of the law of defamation, and, as such, drawing somewhat arbitrary distinctions between words actionable per se and words requiring proof of special or actual damage, is not applicable to this country, either by reason of any statutory provision or by any uniform course of decision sufficient to establish such distinctions as part of the common law of British India.

That whilst the English law of defamation recognises no distinction between defamation as such and personal insult in civil liability, the law of British India recognises personal insult conveyed by abusive language as actionable per se without proof of special or actual damage.

That such abusive and insulting language, unless excused or protected by any other rule of law, is in itself a substantive cause of action and a civil injury, apart from defamation, and that malice is an element of liability for abusive and insulting language, and that such malice will be presumed or inferred, unless the contrary is shown.

That when the defendant is not absolutely privileged and protected by reason of the office or occasion on which he employed such language, he renders himself subject to a civil liability for damage, irrespective of any plea of justification based upon proving the truth of the statements contained in the abusive and insulting language complained of.

That the rule of English law as to the privilege or protection of a witness in regard to defamatory statements made in the witness-box is based upon a public policy which is equally applicable to insulting and abusive language used by such witness; and such statements when made in the witness-box are privileged and protected, even though made maliciously and falsely, so long as they are relevant to the inquiry in the broadest sense of the phrase.

That even where such statements have no reference to the inquiry, the defendant may prove the absence of malice and that they were made in good faith for the public good.

The following cases were referred to in the judgments—Scott v. Stansfield (1) Munster v. Lamb (2), Mackay v. Ford (3), Seaman v. Netherclift (4), Dawkins v. Rokeby (5), *Henderson v. ONE Sheobadan Singh had instituted a suit in the Court of the City Munsif of Jaunpur against defendant and cited plaintiff as a witness. Plaintiff's evidence was taken on the 10th May, 1887, and he concluded it by deposing that there was no ill-feeling between him and defendant. Thereupon the Munsif examined the defendant, who stated that there was enmity between him and plaintiff in respect to eating and drinking, and in explanation thereof he stated, referring to plaintiff:—"Iske ma bap me farq hai; aur is wajeh se khana pina nahi hai."

In consequence of these words plaintiff instituted this suit, alleging that on 10th May, 1887, while he was giving evidence in the above case, "defendant abused him, making imputations upon his mother; that, the abuse caused great insult to him and he suffered much mentally and there was loss of respect amongst the brotherhood."

Defendant denied using any abusive language and averred that, in reply to a question asked by the Court, he made a statement explaining why he had ceased to eat with plaintiff, and why there consequently was enmity between him and the plaintiff. Munsif framed three issues, viz. :—

(1) Whether defendant abused the plaintiff, and if so, whether a suit would lie for slander.

(2) Whether the imputation was as a matter of fact true, and, (3) What ought to be the measure of damages.

Then examining the parties and without taking any evidence in the case he recorded the following judgment dismissing the suit:—"I took down the statement on oath of the plaintiff. He stated in his cross-examination that when Dawan Singh, defendant, was being examined by this Court in the former case he was questioned by the Munsif Sahab 'Then what was the reason that Mahip Singh came to swear against you? In answer he said—Iske ma bap me farq hai; aur is wajeh se khana pina nahi hai.' Hence it is proved that defendant then was in the witness-box, and as such he was [428] bona fide answering a question put to him. I am therefore of opinion that he was privileged, and the suit does not lie, for statement of witnesses can never be the subject of an action."

The plaintiff in appeal contended that the abusive language used towards him was uttered by the defendant after his deposition had already been taken by the Court, and that abusive language insulting to him was actionable.

The Subordinate Judge, holding that the use of abusive language was actionable, and defendant made the statement complained of after his examination as a witness in the case had been over, remanded the case for trial on the points left undetermined by the Munsif. The defendant appealed.

Munshi Kashi Prasad, for the appellant.

Mr. Abdul Majid, for the respondent.

JUDGMENTS.

BRODHURST, J.—In this case Mahip Singh, the plaintiff-respondent, stated in his plaint that one Sheobadan Singh had instituted a suit in the Court of the City Munsif of Jaunpur against Dawan Singh, the present defendant-appellant, and that in that suit Sheobadan Singh had cited him (Mahip Singh) as a witness; that on the 10th May, 1887, whilst he was being examined as a witness before the Munsif, Dawan Singh abused him, making imputations against his mother, whereby he (Mahip Singh) was greatly defamed, was subjected to mental pain, and suffered loss of honour and of respect among his equals, and he therefore prayed that, with reference to the defendant's means, a decree might be passed in favour of him, (the plaintiff), against the defendant for Rs. 300, with costs.

Dawan Singh, in his written statement, denied that he had used any abusive language and averred that he had, in reply to a question asked by the Court, made a statement explaining why he had ceased to eat with Mahip Singh, and why there consequently was enmity between Mahip Singh and himself.

The Munsif recorded the deposition of each of the parties.

Mahip Singh stated:—"The defendant abused me whereby I was dishonoured among the members of my brotherhood. As I was considered before the defendant abused me, so am I now also [429] considered; no loss has occurred in this respect. He abused me, imputing bad conduct to my mother. At the time of giving evidence on a question asked by the then Munsif, the defendant gave abuse to me. On the deposition being concluded the Munsif asked Dawan Singh the question, 'What is the reason that so respectable a man (as the witness Mahip Singh) came to tell a lie,' and thereupon Dawan Singh uttered abuse. He said:—'Mahip Singh ke ma bap me farq hai; is wajeh se khana pina nahin hai.' "

Dawan Singh deposed:—"I was being examined in my case, in which the plaintiff had come to give evidence on behalf of my opponent. I told the Munsif that there existed enmity between Mahip Singh and myself. The Munsif asked me,—'What is the enmity?' I replied: There is enmity between myself and Mahip Singh in respect to eating and drinking. The Munsif again asked 'What is the enmity and why has eating and drinking (together) ceased?' Thereupon I replied that food and drink were forsaken on account of Mahip Singh's mother."

Of three issues framed by the Munsif, the first and the only one that need be specially referred to is,—"Did the defendant abuse the plaintiff, and if he did, does the suit lie for slander?"

"Issue I.—I took down the statement on oath of the plaintiff. He stated in his cross-examination that when Dawan Singh, defendant, was being examined by this Court in the former case, he was questioned by the Munsif Sahib—'Then what was the reason that Mahip Singh came to swear against you?' In answer he said: 'Iske ma bap me farq hai; aur is wajeh se khana pina nahin hai.' Hence it is proved that the defendant then was in the witness-box, and, as such, he was bona fide answering a question put to him. I am therefore of opinion that he was privileged and the suit does not lie, for statements of witnesses can never be the subject of an action (vide para. 2, p. 117, Underhill's Torts). There are many cases in Addison's Torts. The plaintiff's pleader quoted I. L. R. 12, Calc., 109. That ruling has no bearing upon this case, for here the defendant was in the witness-box, whereas in the case cited the defendant abused when the plaintiff was in a mandir or temple, and so on. I need not, therefore, enter into the merits of the other issues.

[430] "It is therefore ordered that the plaintiff's suit be dismissed with costs. He is to bear his own costs."

From this judgment the plaintiff preferred an appeal. The appeal was disposed of by the Subordinate Judge. He framed the following issues:—

1. Is abuse actionable?
2. Was the defendant privileged in uttering it?

And in his judgment the Subordinate Judge observed: "On the first point I find that abuse in this country is certainly actionable. A suit for damages can be preferred against the persons who take so much liberty in Court without any provocation. The defendant pleads that he was privileged in doing so. He was bound to produce a copy of his deposition in support of his contention that he had used abuse while he was standing in the witness-box and answering questions put to him, of this there being no iota of evidence. The plaintiff, in his deposition, has plainly stated that he was abused after the defendant's deposition was over. If this is a fact, and probably it is so in absence of any evidence to the contrary, then, in my opinion, he had no right to use the ill expression towards the plaintiff, a respectable person in his retired life. The Court of first instance has misconstrued his deposition, in which he stated that after the deposition of the defendant, in answer to the question put to him by the Court, and not during the course of his examination in the witness-box, he was abused. The privilege of a witness lasts so long only as he is deposing on oath in the witness-box, but not after it."

With reference to these remarks the Subordinate Judge allowed the appeal and remanded the case to the first Court, under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code, for re-trial on the merits.

The pleas taken before us in second appeal are :—

(1) Because the Court below has erred in ruling that abuse is actionable.

(2) Because the learned Subordinate Judge has misconstrued the respondent's deposition, which, taken as a whole, fails to disclose any cause of action.

(3) Because the statement was admittedly made in answer to a question put by the Court.

[431] The suit, as shown by the plaint, was brought merely with reference to statements made by Dawan Singh on the 10th May, 1887, in the Court of the City Munsif of Jaunpur. We have called for the former record and have examined it. The deposition of Dawan Singh does not contain any question or answer as referred to above and as admitted by both the parties to this suit. The evidence of Mahip Singh, however, is concluded with the following remarks :—"There is no dispute between me and Dawan Singh."

This tends to show that ill-feeling between Mahip Singh and Dawan Singh had been alleged, and it affords corroboration to the statements of the parties.

The whole of the parol evidence was recorded on the 10th May, 1887, and in the following order :—

Plaintiff's witnesses.

Mahip Singh.

Dhan Lal Dubey.

Defendant's witnesses.

Jugrup Dasondhi.

Debi Dayal Singh.

Persons examined by the Court.

Dawan Singh, defendant.

Sheobadan Singh, plaintiff.

Not only was Dawan Singh examined in compliance with the order of the Munsif, but his evidence, as recorded in the vernacular, clearly shows that he was certainly twice called up and examined by the Munsif on the 10th May, 1887.

It was optional with the Munsif to re-examine Dawan Singh as often as he thought necessary whilst Dawan Singh was in Court and the suit was pending.

It will be noticed that Mahip Singh's evidence was recorded first of all and that of Dawan Singh last but one. From the concurrent statements of the parties to this suit there is not, I think, any room for doubt that the Munsiff, after having recorded the evidence of Dawan Singh as shown in the vernacular record, asked him why Mahip Singh had given evidence against him, and that, in reply to the Munsif's question, Dawan Singh stated that [432] there was enmity between them, and when pressed by the Munsif to explain the cause of enmity, answered that there was enmity in respect to eating and drinking, and on being further pressed to explain what the reason for discontinuing eating and drinking together was, he replied, "Iske ma bap me farq hai; aur is wajah se khana pina nahin hai," which no doubt means there is a difference (of caste) between his father and mother, and on this account there is no eating and drinking ('together between him and myself').

I see no reason to think that Dawan Singh would have made use of the expressions taken objection to had he not been required to reply to questions put to him by the presiding Munsif. It is not Dawan Singh's fault that the Munsif asked him those questions and did not record the questions he put and the answers he received.

That such questions were asked of Dawan Singh by the Munsif is proved by the statements of both parties, and to punish Dawan Singh because the Munsif omitted to record the questions would be most inequitable.

Dawan Singh is a mere cultivator. Apparently he replied to the Munsif's questions on the spur of the moment. In doing so he did not make use of any coarse expression, and, in fact, it would be almost impossible for any witness who, in answer to questions put to him by the presiding Judge, thought himself called upon to state that another witness, referred to by the Judge, was illegitimate, to convey his meaning in more delicate language than was used for that purpose by this illiterate peasant.

When the Munsif asked the questions of Dawan Singh, he doubtless did not expect to elicit the answer he finally received; and when that answer was given, the Munsif may, not unnaturally, have thought that all the questions and answers on that point had better be omitted from the record.

Witness-boxes are not amongst the articles of furniture supplied to our Civil Courts, but when a witness, after having been duly sworn, is during the pendency of the suit being examined or re-examined in Court, either by counsel, by vakil, or by the presiding Judge, he is, in the "witness-box" within the ordinary acceptation of the phrase, and, with reference to what I have above written, I have no hesitation in holding that Dawan Singh at the time he [433] answered the questions put to him by the Munsif, was in the "witness-box."

The only point now remaining for consideration is whether, under the circumstances I have mentioned, Dawan Singh, in deposing as he admits he did, was privileged or not.

In Seaman v. Netherclift (1) the head-note is as follows:—

"A witness in a Court of justice is absolutely privileged as to anything he may say as a witness having reference to the inquiry on which he is called as a witness.

"A statement as to another matter, made to justify the witness in consequence of a question going to the witness's credit, has reference to the enquiry within the above rule.

"Defendant, an expert in hand-writing, gave evidence in the trial of D. v. M. that, in his opinion, the signature to the will in question was a forgery. The jury found in favour of the will, and the presiding Judge made some very disparaging remarks on defendant's evidence. Soon afterwards defendant was called as a witness in favour of the genuineness of a document, on a charge of forgery before a Magistrate. In cross-examination he was asked whether he had given evidence in the suit of D. v. M.

and whether he had read the Judge's remarks on his evidence. He answered 'yes'; counsel asked no more questions, and defendant insisted on adding, though told by the Magistrate not to make any further statement as to D. v. M., 'I believe that will to be a rank forgery, and shall believe so to the day of my death.'

"An action of slander having been brought by one of the attesting witnesses to the will:—

"Held, that the words were spoken by defendant as a witness and had reference to the inquiry before the Magistrate, as they tended to justify the defendant, whose credit as a witness had been impugned, and that the defendant was absolutely privileged."

Cockburn, C.J., observed: "If there is anything as to which the authority is overwhelming, it is that a witness is privileged to the extent of what he says in the course of his examination. Neither is that privilege affected by the relevancy or irrelevancy [434] of what he says; for then he would be obliged to judge of what is relevant or irrelevant, and questions might be, and are, constantly asked which are not strictly relevant to the issue. But that beyond all question this unqualified privilege extends to a witness is established by a long series of cases, the last of which is Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1), after which to contend to the contrary is hopeless. It was there expressly decided that the evidence of a witness with reference to the inquiry is privileged, notwithstanding it may be malicious, and to ask us to decide to the contrary is to ask what is beyond our power. But I agree that if in this case, beyond being spoken maliciously, the words had not been spoken in the character of a witness or not while he was giving evidence in the case, the result might have been different."

With reference to the circumstances of this case and to the above ruling, I am of opinion that Dawan Singh was absolutely privileged in making the statements that he admittedly did make when he was examined as a witness in the Court of the City Munsif of Jaunpur.

I would therefore allow the appeal, reverse the judgment of the lower appellate Court, and restore the decree of the first Court dismissing the suit, and I would further order that all costs should be borne by the plaintiff-respondent.

MAHMOOD, J.—The plaintiff in this case came into Court alleging what has been briefly stated by the Munsif in this case in the following words:—

"That the plaintiff is a respectable person and was in the service of the Government. Sheobadan Singh had brought a suit against the defendant in this Court, and in that case Sheobadan had cited the plaintiff (present) as his witness; that on the 10th May, 1887, the plaintiff was giving his deposition when the defendant abused him, making imputations upon his mother; that the abuse caused great insult to him and he suffered much mentally, and there was loss of respect amongst the brotherhood: hence the suit."

The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court in describing the suit has stated it to be one "for recovery of Rs. 300, the compensation of pain to plaintiff's soul and defamation," by which [435] terms I understand that the action is one ex delicto for recovery of damages arising out of the action of the defendant in having used insulting expressions on the 10th May, 1887. The expressions then used were, as stated in the judgment of the first Court, that, with reference to the plaintiff, the defendant said: "Iske ma bap me farq hai; aur is wajeh se khana pina nahin hai," which, as interpreted in English, means that the plaintiff's descent was illegitimate, and that he was therefore out of caste. This language was used in open Court and in answer to a question put to the defendant by the Court itself.

It does not appear that in the suit brought by Sheobadan Singh against the defendant Dawan Singh any question as to the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the plaintiff, or as to his being in or out of caste was a matter in issue, or otherwise relevant in the strict sense of the law of evidence, and indeed Mr. Kashi Prasad, who appears for the defendant in this Court, has conceded that the language was in its signification abusive, and that the grounds upon which it would not furnish a cause of action for a suit such as this would be only two—the first being that no special damage having accrued to the plaintiff by reason of the abusive language having been used, no action would lie; and, secondly, that even if the language by itself were to be taken as abusive and actionable, it was privileged and such as would not furnish a cause of action for recovery of damages in a suit such as this.

It is not disputed that the language, taken in its ordinary Hindustani meaning, was abusive and, as such, calculated to hurt the feelings of the plaintiff, to lower him in the estimation of his fellow castemen, and such as might involve his being out-casted, if these statements were believed.

The defence set up is represented by the Munsiff in the following words:—

"The defendant contends that he did not abuse the plaintiff; that the plaintiff had deposed that he could not eat with the defendant whereupon the defendant had thrown some hints about its cause; that the suit cannot lie for slander; that the plaintiff has inflated his status: he is a cultivator and a pensioner."

[436] Upon this state of the pleadings the Munsif as the Court of first instance framed three issues, the first being whether the defendant abused the plaintiff, and if so, whether a suit would lie for slander; the second issue was whether the imputation was, as a matter of fact, true, and the third issue related to the measure of damages.

The Munsif however, after examining the parties, did not take evidence upon the issues, but held that the statement was made in the witness box, and that the defendant "was bona fide answering a question put to him," and, as such, was not liable to the action, because such statement was privileged. In holding this view the Munsif has relied upon the cases cited at page 117 of Underhill's Law of Torts, where the summary of the cases is to the effect that "statements of a Judge acting judicially, whether relevant or not, are absolutely privileged: Scott v. Stansfield (1); and so are those of counsel, however irrelevant and however malicious: Munster v. Lamb (2). Solicitors acting as advocates have a like privilege: ibid and Mackay v. Ford (3). Statement of witnesses can never be the subject of an action: Seaman v. Netherclift (4); and a military man giving evidence before a military Court of enquiry, which has not power to administer an oath, is entitled to the same protection as that enjoyed by a witness under examination in a Court of justice: Dawkins v. Rokeby (5). If the evidence is false, the remedy is by indictment: Henderson v.

Broomhead (1).” The Munsif has also relied upon the English Law of Torts as contained in the work of Addison on that subject.

Upon this ground of law alone the Munsif, without entering into the merits of the case or taking any evidence in it other than the statements of the parties, dismissed the suit; but upon appeal the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court, reversing that order, has remanded the case for trial under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code. The view taken by the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court seems to be based upon two propositions, one being that the abusive language used by the defendant was in itself actionable without proof of special or actual damage; and the other that the defendant could not be held to be privileged in making the statement which he did make. In remanding the case, the learned [437] Judge of the lower appellate Court was inclined to hold that the abusive language used by the defendant towards the plaintiff was uttered after the defendant's deposition had already been taken in the Court, and the learned Judge goes on to say: “The privilege of a witness lasts so long only as he has been deposing on oath in the witness-box, but not after it.”

Holding this view, the learned Judge was of opinion that this particular point as to whether or not the use of abusive language above mentioned was made under circumstances of privilege had not been duly dealt with by the first Court on evidence, as no evidence on the issue had duly been taken. And the remand proceeds upon that hypothesis.

What we have to determine in this case are two important questions of law:—

The first is whether abusive language which aims at insulting a person is not per se actionable in tort under the law of British India (when the language is such that it causes injury to the feelings of the person towards whom it is used), without proof of any special or actual damage.

The second question is, whether under the circumstances of this case the words used by the defendant were such as can be held to be privileged by any rule prevailing in this country as a rule of law.

Upon the first of these points Mr. Kashi Prasad in arguing the case for the appellant, has relied upon the authority of English cases as they are represented in the latest edition of Addison on Torts, the general effect of which cases is that abusive language is not per se actionable, unless it falls within certain limitations imposed by the common law of England. Indeed, all that Mr. Kashi Prasad relies upon is best formulated in Folkard's Treatise (2) and in the most recent work upon the law of tort by Mr. Frederick Pollock at page 206 of his work, where the law of England, as it now stands, is laid down in the following words:—

“Slander is an actionable wrong when special damage can be shown to have followed from the utterance of the words complained of, and also in the following cases:—

“Where the words impute a criminal offence.

[438] “Where they impute having a contagious disease which would cause the person having it to be excluded from society.

“Where they convey a charge of unfitness, dishonesty, or incompetence in an office, profession, or trade, in short, where they manifestly tend to prejudice a man in his calling.”

(1) 28 L. J. Ex. 860.

(2) Starkie's Law of Slander and Libel, by Folkard, 4th ed. 70.

Relying upon the authority of English law, the learned pleader argues that, inasmuch as in this case no special damage is either alleged in the plaint or proved, the action was in itself not maintainable, because it did not furnish sufficient elements for a cause of action in tort. I have no doubt that the learned pleader is perfectly right so far as the English law of torts is concerned upon this particular point, and that if the suit had to be dealt with by me as a Judge sitting in England, I should have accepted his contention and decreed this appeal, the effect of which would be to dismiss the suit. But the matter, in my opinion, does not rest upon the exact position taken up by either the common law of England or the cases decided there. There is no authority with which I am acquainted which entitles any Court of justice sitting here in India to apply the English common law to the lives and liberties of the people of this country, irrespective of statutory provisions and of the rule of "justice, equity and good conscience," where no statutory provisions are available. There is no statute which renders that law applicable to this country, and if difficulties arise in dealing with questions such as those with which we have to deal in this case, it is because the Legislature has not yet thought fit to frame any special rules which would govern actions of this character. And further difficulty which arises in such cases is what, in the absence of statutory provisions, should be the line of action upon which the Courts of justice should proceed in British India. Speaking for myself, I am perfectly willing, sitting here as one of Her Majesty's Judges, to take the responsibility of saying that for the purpose of deciding such questions which affect a population vastly different to that of England in nationality, creed, and social conditions, the English common law, though it must always be referred to for guidance in questions of difficulty and regarded with respect, is not necessarily fit to be adopted in its integrity, irrespective of the conditions of this country. These, [439] however, are views which affect the Legislature more than the Bench, and holding as I do that the law of British India upon this particular point is silent so far as legislative enactments are concerned, I proceed to state, or rather repeat what I have said before now as to what should be the rule in determining such questions when they arise for adjudication.

There is, indeed, a series of decisions to be found in the published reports upon the subject, but they are so silent as to general principles and so conflicting with each other that I cannot accept them to represent any defined rule of the common law of India. The state of the present law and my views thereupon are represented in what I have before now said elsewhere in the following words:—

"Defamation, as representing slander and libel consolidated, is an offence against reputation only, and, therefore, as the English law now stands, publication to a third person or persons is a condition precedent to its being regarded as actionable wrong; so that insulting words of however grave a nature, when addressed only to the plaintiff, do not amount to a tort, even though the insult be directly followed by mental distress or vexation leading to inability to attend to one's ordinary avocations of life. Again, even where insulting words are orally uttered in public, proof of special or actual damage is necessary, except in certain well-defined cases, to render them actionable. An imputation, for example, by words however gross and on an occasion however public, on the chastity of a modest matron or a pure virgin is not actionable, without proof that it has actually produced special temporal damage to her;

neither it is actionable to call a man a swindler or a cheat, a blackguard or a rogue, or to say that he is a low fellow, a disgrace to the town, and unfit for decent society, unless it can be proved that actual legal damage has resulted to the plaintiff from the slander' (Addison on Torts p. 37).

"The truth seems to be that the English law of tort, whilst attaching considerable importance to physical injuries and to matters which result in pecuniary loss, does not attach sufficient significance to mental distress, and does not, therefore, afford sufficient protection against personal insult as distinguished from [440] bodily injury and defamation. It is a question of no small consequence whether this characteristic of the English system should be introduced in India. I use the word "introduced," because, as the case-law now stands, the weight of authority is undoubtedly in favour of recognizing mental distress caused by insulting words as in itself actionable, irrespective of special or actual damage. The following rulings of the Calcutta High Court are authorities for this proposition:—

- (1) Kanoo Mundul v. Rahumoullah Mundul.
- (2) Moulvie Ghulam Hossein, Vakeel v. Hur Gobind Doss, Tashildar.
- (3) Shaikh Tukee v. Shaikh Khoshadel Biswas.
- (4) Osseemooden v. Fatch Mahomed.
- (5) Gour Chander Puteetundee v. A. L. Clay.
- (6) Sreenath Mookerjee v. Komol Kurmokar.
- (7) Kalee Coomar Mitter v. Ramguttee Bhattacharjee.

"The reports of these various cases are not very complete, but so far as they go they leave no doubt that injury to feelings has been held as sufficient in itself to constitute a cause of action for recovery of damages, regardless of actual loss or harm. In the first of these cases, Norman, C. J., observing that 'the words, which are of the coarsest abuse, do undoubtedly impute that to the plaintiff which would, if believed, have been hurtful to the feelings of his family and have lowered his character in respect of his caste,' goes on to say: 'No doubt, actions for slander are often vexatious. But to prevent people from taking the law into their own hands, and for the preservation of peace and order, it is a matter of the greatest importance that Courts of justice should afford an effectual remedy to persons feeling themselves aggrieved by wanton and virulent abuse.' In the second and the third cases it was held that actual injury and damage was not necessary to render the action maintainable, and it was observed in the latter case that [441] 'injury might result to a man's feelings such as would entitle him to damages' and the same view was adopted in the fourth case. These rulings were followed in the fifth case, where it was observed that 'it does not follow that because a man's professional position or gains are not injured by abuse received by him that his feelings are not injured and outraged.' Again, in the sixth and the seventh cases similar rules were laid down, mental distress being taken to be a sufficient cause of action. Similarly, the Bombay High Court in Kashi Ram v. Bhadu Bopuji (8), after stating that the English law upon the subject was different, adopted the view of the Calcutta High Court, as the suit was brought in the mufassal and the parties to it were Hindus.

regarded as the sole ground of action. On the other hand in Phoolbasee Koer v. Barjun Singh (1) and Chundarnath Dhur v. Issurree Dasse (2) the Calcutta High Court, without noticing any of its previous rulings, laid down the rule that abusive and threatening language without proof of actual damage did not constitute a cause of action at all for recovery of damages. Again, a learned Judge of the same Court (Pontifex, J.) in Nilmadhub Mookerjee v. Dookeeram Khottah (3) observed that 'actions for verbal slander ought not, in my opinion, to be encouraged, and that, unless there are special damages proved, the Court will be very reluctant to give any damages.'

"It can scarcely be doubted that these various rulings leave the law in a very unsatisfactory condition and there is need for legislative interference. What form that interference should take is a question which, in my opinion, should be determined according to the conditions of life and the feelings of the people of India. And, looking at the matter from this point of view, I have no doubt that the seven rulings of the Calcutta High Court which I have enumerated above lay down the rule most suitable for India, though it is more in conformity with the Roman than the English law. There [442] is a passage* in Starkie's Law of Slander and Libel, by Folkard, 4th ed., p. 19, which shows that even in Scotland any thing defamatory is the foundation of an action without proof of special damage. The case of Aitken v. Read (4) is relied upon for this proposition, and it is stated that in the case of Mackenzie v. Read (5) the Court, after observing that the law on the subject of slander in England was very particularly defined, added that any thing that produces uneasiness of mind is actionable in Scotland.

"I confess I can see no reason why personal insult and consequent mental distress should not be recognized as constituting a substantive cause of action in our proposed law of torts. In enumerating personal rights the Civil Code of New York (s. 27) lays down that every person has * "Many incidents were founded on the doctrine of the Roman law, that contumely was the ground of action, in which it differs from the law of England. If an infant, or one in a state of intoxication, defamed another, the action failed, for the mens rea, the contumelious intention, was wanting; in England such a defence, if the act were voluntary, would be unavailable. By the Roman law, a party was not only entitled to sustain an action for contumelious words spoken concerning himself, but also in respect of those spoken of others of his family, if they tended collaterally to subject him to degradation and contempt. Thus, a father was entitled to recover, in respect of a contumelious injury offered to his wife, children, or domestics, provided the offender knew the relationship of the party so offended. So far was the principle carried by the Roman law, that even the heir was entitled to an action for an insult to the remains, or even the memory of the deceased. Et is forte cadaveri defuncti fit injuria cui heredes bonorum possessores exstitimus, injuriarum nostro nomine habemus actionem. Spectat enim ad existimationem nostram si quæ ei fiat injuria. Idemque et si fama ejus cui heredes exstitimus accessatur. The same degree of indefiniteness which characterizes this branch of the Roman law naturally pervades, also, the codes of those nations which have adopted the principles of that law. In Scotland, for instance, the limits of civil as well as criminal liability are exceedingly wide. Thus, in the case of Aitken v. Read and Fleming (4), the Judge observed, 'There are disadvantages in allowing actions of this sort, where there is no accusation of a crime, or allegation of specific damage. By the law of Scotland, however, any thing defamatory is the foundation of an action.' In the case of Mackenzie v. Read (5) the Court, after observing that the law on the subject of slander in England was very particularly defined, added 'here any thing that produces uneasiness of mind is actionable.'"

'the right of protection from bodily restraint or harm, from personal insult from defamation, and from injury to his personal relations.' If, then, personal insult is a wrong as distinct from defamation as assault, there seems no reason why it should not be regarded as distinct tort. A tort is [443] only an injury to a legal right not arising out of contract between the wrong-doer and the person wronged; and, in my opinion, if the right of protection from personal insult is violated, such violation should be recognized as a cause of action for recovery of damages as much as assault. Such is apparently the rule of the Roman Civil law and of the law of Scotland, both of which recognize mental distress as in itself constituting an injury. Moreover, the view which I have here ventured to express would, if adopted, be in keeping with the notion of injury as understood in the Indian Penal Code (s. 44), where it is taken to denote 'any harm whatever illegally caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or property.'

"The observations which I have ventured to make above do not, however, necessarily lead to the conclusion that anything should be added to the law of defamation in which the doctrine of publication to third persons naturally occupies an essentially important position. According to my view, the exigencies of the matter would be sufficiently met by adding 'personal insult' as a distinct head under the category of personal wrongs, the question whether the insult is offered in public or in private being left to take its place as an element bearing upon the assessment of damages, as in cases of assault. The effect of this would, of course, be that personal insult would be a wrong in itself, irrespective of the question whether the abusive language is published or not and whether it is expressed orally or in writing. As an illustration of my meaning, two cases to be found in the Indian Reports may be referred to. In Kumul Chunder Bose v. Nobin Chunder Ghose (1) Macpherson, J., held that a letter addressed to the plaintiff himself, though containing insulting and abusive language, did not constitute a cause of action in tort, because 'the only damage alleged is damage to the feelings of the plaintiff caused by the receipt of the letter' and 'such injury is not in itself a ground for giving damages in a civil action.' The ruling was followed by the Allahabad High Court in Mahomed Ismail Khan v. Mahomed Tahir (2) and is no doubt in conformity with the English law. In the latter of these cases I was myself engaged as counsel for the plaintiff, and I well remember how I failed to induce the Bench to [444] depart from the rule of English law and to adopt the view that personal insult causing mental distress should in itself be recognized as actionable wrong in India, apart from the subject of defamation.

"The reasons ordinarily employed against this view are that 'abusive, insulting and unmannerly language which affects not a man's liberty or estate are of too indefinite and uncertain a character to be the subject of an action for pecuniary damages. Such injuries, rather affronts to the feelings, are as incapable of definition as they are of admeasurement. They depend upon the rank, situation and condition of the parties, and on circumstances which may be felt but not defined; they may depend on the tone of voice, the gestures, even looks by which they are accompanied, and, in some instances, silence may be more contemptuous and insulting than direct expressions' (Starkie, p. 17). It is submitted that these objections apply equally to almost all personal injuries (such as assault, defamation, false imprisonment, &c.) in which mental suffering is recognised as an element of assessing damages; so much so that there is no fixed rule for estimating damages in such cases, and the matter is usually left to the discretion of the jury with reference to the circumstances of aggravation or mitigation as the case may be. In India such questions would have to be decided by the Judge, and I can anticipate no impossibility in arriving at a fair assessment of damages in cases of personal insult as distinguished from defamation. The cases cited in Addison's Treatise (p. 151) show that the state of the English case-law as to what words are actionable is of a most unsatisfactory and contradictory nature; and judicial opinion seems to have wavered from time to time between discouraging actions for slander and favouring them. 'The opinions of later times,' observes Holt, C. J., 'have been in many instances different from those of former days in relation to action for words, and judgments have gone different ways; but, for my part, whenever words tend to take away a man's reputation, I will encourage such actions, because so doing will contribute much to the preservation of peace.'

"If, then, rendering verbal slander actionable contributes to the preservation of the peace, the recognition of personal insult would [445] a fortiori achieve a similar result. Defamation is an offence against reputation, having falsehood or misrepresentation as its instrument. Personal insult, on the other hand, would be an offence independent of the element of misrepresentation, the primary object of the offender being not injury to reputation, but the humiliation of his victim or injury to his peace of mind. This distinction, which does not seem to be clear in the English law, has probably gone far to throw personal insult into the background and to prevent its being recognised as a tort in itself. Thus distinct wrong remained practically without a remedy; and Bentham, in his Principles of Penal Law, Chap. XIV, has shown how the practice of duelling arose out of this circumstance. In India violent breach of the peace often results from abusive language; and, indeed, the Indian Penal Code (s. 504) recognises insult as a distinct offence from defamation (s. 499), provided that it is likely to cause breach of the peace. This limitation is no doubt suited to the genius of the criminal law, but why should this limitation be imposed upon personal insult as a civil wrong? Mr. Starkie, as usual with English text writers, does not recognise personal insult as a wrong distinct from defamation, and after stating that 'the only mode of proceeding in respect of mere abusive and unmannerly and insulting language is by causing the offender to be bound over to good behaviour,' goes on to say that 'it is expedient on principles of general policy and convenience that the law should define by sufficient limits, in what instances simple defamation unaccompanied by special damage should constitute a substantive ground of action.' But whatever limitations it may be expedient to impose upon defamation, it does not necessarily follow that those same limitations should be imposed upon the law of personal insult, because, as already observed, the one is an injury to reputation, and the other constitutes an offence against mental comfort. Mr. Starkie himself admits that 'it is obvious that the application of these principles in particular instances must, in a great measure, depend on the state and circumstances, manners and habits of the society for whose use such rules are to be applied.' And bearing this in mind, it seems to me that unadvanced countries like India present a state of society where personal insult needs more checks than in more civilized countries like England.

[446] "Another objection, so far as I can gather from the English text-books, to recognising personal insult as a distinct tort, is that it 'would afford far too large a scope for vexatious litigation, and the ordinary intercourse of society would be impeded and fettered by the apprehension of vexatious and harassing suit for trifling causes.' The answer to such an argument is, I think, furnished best by the celebrated dictum of Lord Holt in Ashby v. White (1): 'As in an action for slanderous words, though a man does not lose a penny by reason of the speaking them, yet he shall have an action. So if a man gives another a cuff on the ear, though it cost him nothing, no, not so much as a little diachylon, yet he shall have this action, for it is a personal injury. And it is no objection to say that it will occasion multiplicity of actions; for if men will multiply injuries, actions must be multiplied too; for every man that is injured ought to have his recompense.' Indeed, the objection that vexatious litigation will be multiplied if personal insult is recognised as a civil wrong, seems to me to raise a general question applicable to all kinds of torts, viz., the question whether slight injuries should not form an exception to the general principles of liability for civil wrongs. The Indian Penal Code (s. 95) lays down the general rule that 'nothing is an offence by reason that it causes, or that it is intended to cause, or that it is known to be likely to cause any harm, if that harm is so slight that no person of ordinary sense and temper would complain of such harm.' Whether this rule should be adopted wholly or in a modified form in the law of civil wrongs is a question which I shall discuss later on; but I may observe here that in most cases the ordinary common sense of mankind may be taken as a sufficient guarantee against trifles being made the subject of litigation.

[I may add that if any further guarantee is required, it is furnished by the discretionary power conferred by the rules of procedure in England and America, and by s. 220 of our own Code of Civil Procedure in regard to the apportionment of costs.]

"The real question seems to be whether personal insult causing mental distress deserves a substantive place in the list of civil wrongs. In other words, should protection from personal insult be [447] recognised as a right in itself distinct from the right of protection from defamation? If no such right exists, personal insult cannot, of course, constitute civil injury, nor would any remedy be needed. Such, however, is practically the state of the English law of torts, which provides no remedy for unpublished insult, which does not recognise mental distress in itself as a civil wrong, and which even, where the insult is publicly offered causing distress of mind, insists, except in certain well-defined cases, upon proof of special or actual damage before granting any remedy. Speaking of personal insults, I may quote the language of Bentham in support of my view:—

"In order to understand all the evil which results from these offences, they must be considered without reference to any remedies: it must be supposed that there are none. According to this supposition, these offences might be repeated at will; an unlimited career would thus be opened to insolence; the person insulted to-day might be insulted to-morrow, and the day after, every day and every hour; and each new affront would facilitate the next, and render more probable a succession of outrages of the same class.....Thus the individual obliged by his relative weakness to submit at the pleasure of his persecutor to similar vexations, and deprived, as we have supposed, of legal protection, would be reduced to the most miserable condition. Nothing more is required for establishing on the one part an absolute despotism and on the other an entire slavery'."

I still adhere to the views expressed by me in the above quotation, and I am of opinion that personal insult and abusive language by itself, whether such insult or abuse does or does not amount to actionable slander in England, is in this country a cause of action for maintaining a suit such as the present. In this view I am supported by the authority not only of the cases which have already been referred to in the above quotation, but also by more recent rulings. Among these perhaps the most important is the case of Srikant Roy v. Satcori Shaha (1), in a foot-note to the report of which case many of the previous rulings have been referred to, and which case was followed by the Calcutta Court in Ibu Hosein [448] v. Haider (2). The effect of this last case seems to me to be somewhat misrepresented in the head-note. I say this because I understand the effect of this last ruling to be that (to use the words of Field, J., who delivered the judgment of the Court in that case) "language which, having regard to the respectability and position of the person abused, is calculated to outrage his feelings, lower the estimation in which he is held by persons of his own class, and so bring him into disrepute, is actionable." In the case before the learned Judges it does not appear from the report that any special or actual damage was proved, and the judgment appears to have proceeded upon the ground that injury to personal feelings, that is, mental distress, caused by abusive language, is per se a cause of action for a suit of this character, and, as such, actionable without proof of any further damages, pecuniary or temporal, in any other sense.

I am of opinion that the view taken in the case last cited is the right view of the law as applicable to British India, that view being consistent with the ruling of Mitter, J., and Maclean, J., in the case of Srikant Roy v. Satcori Shaha (1) which it followed. In the case last mentioned the question seems to have been similar to the one with which we are concerned in this case, because here, as in the case last referred to, the obvious object in using the abusive language was due to discredit the plaintiff, who had been summoned as a witness. But among the Indian reported cases upon the subject none is more important than the ruling of the Madras High Court in Parvathi v. Mannar (3), where Turner, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, held that the rule of English law which prohibits, except in certain cases, an action for damages for oral defamation unless special damage is alleged, being founded on no reasonable basis, should not be adopted by Courts of British India; and that learned Chief Justice, in considering the matter, went on to say, with the concurrence of Mr. Justice Muttusami Ayyar:—

"In this country we are not bound to adopt the rules regulating compensation for injuries which are recognized by the English Courts, though it has been the practice of Judges in British India to regard the decisions of the English Courts with the highest [449] respect as embodying the wisdom and experience of a judiciary whose reputation is second to none for independence and ability. But the distinction drawn by the English law between written or printed and oral slander, which is said to have its origin in the circumstance that the most frequent instances of oral slander were at one time punishable by Ecclesiastical Courts (2 Salked, 694), has been condemned by many eminent English lawyers. Mr. Starkie observes that the distinction must be regarded as an absolute peremptory rule not founded on any obvious reason or principle. In Roberts v. Roberts (1) Cockburn, C. J., and Crompton and Blackburn, JJ., pronounced the law of England unsatisfactory and regretted they were bound by it. In Lynch v. Knight (2) the Lord Chancellor Campbell expressed the same views, and Lord Brougham, in the same case, declared that the English law was in this respect not only unsatisfactory but barbarous. The Indian Law Commission, of which Lord Macaulay was a member, in its report on the proposed Penal Code, demonstrated that the English law regarding defamation was inconsistent and unreasonable (Introductory Report, Note, p. 7; Macaulay's Works, p. 546). The civil law does not recognize the distinction, nor does the law of Scotland; and the recommendations of Lord Macaulay's commission were approved and accepted by the British Indian Legislature. We therefore feel justified in giving effect to our conviction that the rule we are considering is not founded on natural justice and should not be imported into the law of British India."

There is thus ample authority in the Indian case-law to show that the English law of torts, as to verbal abuse and slander, is not the law of British India, and that we should be importing that law, regardless of the conditions of the people, if we were to apply wholesale the very peculiar rules of that law, on this point denounced by many eminent English lawyers themselves, and called by Lord Brougham as "not only unsatisfactory but barbarous."

There is one more point which was pressed upon us by Mr. Kashi Prasad, and that is, that if the statement of the defendant as to the plaintiff being "illegitimate and out of caste" (because such is the only interpretation which the idiom of Hindustani [450] would warrant in respect of the words used by the defendant) be true, no cause of action arises for such an action. Now, in the first place, this contention, which amounts to raising a plea of justification, was not clearly raised in the defence, and in the next place, even if it had been clearly set up, I hold, for reasons to be presently stated, that such a plea could not by itself furnish a full defence to the action.

It is perfectly true that under the English law of defamation a plea of justification supported by proving the truth of the statement is a valid defence to a civil action, though even under that law such plea was not allowed in criminal proceedings until recent legislation provided that "the truth of the matter charged may be inquired into, but shall not amount to a defence, unless it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published" (Starkie, p. 718). Similar is the effect of the criminal law of India (s. 499 of the Penal Code, Except. 1), and my brother Straight in Abdul Hakim v. Tej Chandar Mukarji (3) went the length of saying that "although the provisions of the Penal Code with regard to defamation are applicable to criminal charges, the principles therein embodied are well adapted to supply the tests by which the liability or otherwise of defendants to civil suits should be decided."

It is, however, not necessary for me to rule how far I am prepared to adopt either the English law of defamation as to the plea of justification in civil cases or the dictum of my brother Straight which I have just quoted; though I confess I incline to the latter view, as I think the distinction drawn by the English law between civil and criminal liability (so far as the plea of justification is concerned) proceeds upon grounds (Starkie, pp. 529, 718) which can scarcely be reconciled with juristic reasoning.

I do not regard the case now before me as one of defamation, pure and simple, but one of personal insult, though it may be that that insult was conveyed by words of a defamatory character.

In the long quotation which I have already made in this judgment I have stated my reasons for holding that defamation must not be confounded with personal insult: the one being an [451] offence against reputation having falsehood or misrepresentation as its instrument, the other an offence independent of the element of misrepresentation, the primary object of the offender being not injury to reputation but the humiliation of his victim or injury to his peace of mind. Personal insult therefore is in itself a substantive wrong, and independent either of the falsehood of the statements contained in the abusive language employed, or of publication, though the publicity of the occasion may be an element for consideration in assessing damages.

I am aware that in laying down this rule I am departing from the English common law, but there is no legislative authority for holding that that law is applicable to such cases in the mufassal, whilst the case-law of British India, as I have already shown, does not adopt the rules of the English law on the subject, the reason being that such rules in their entirety are not fitted for the conditions of the Indian population. Language may be abusive and insulting, though it states the truth, and it may cause grave injury to the most tender feelings of the human heart. No person who for example is illegitimate or an out-caste or has a bodily infirmity likes to be reminded of these facts in abusive terms, and if the gentlest touch or even attempt to touch under certain circumstances amounts to assault and battery and as such an actionable wrong, I fail to see why violent abuse should not be an actionable wrong, unless, indeed, it can be said that mental pain is not to be compared with bodily suffering in granting compensatory relief.

But whilst laying down this rule, I must guard myself against being understood to hold that malice is not a necessary element of the wrong, for I am of opinion, that when abusive and insulting language is employed, the law will infer and presume malice, unless the defendant proves his conduct to be bona fide or shows that the occasion was privileged. I wish also to point out that nothing that I have said is to be understood as contradicting the rule laid down by the Madras High Court in Sri Raja Sitarama Krishna Rayadappa Ranga Baz Bahadur Garu v. Sri Raja Sanyasi Razu Pedda Baliyara Simhulu Bahadur Garu (1), where it was held that the omission of a mere courtesy cannot be taken to be equivalent to [452] slandering or libelling a man and is not an actionable wrong. The case was not dealt with as one of personal insult nor was the question of malice or the question of special or actual damage considered in the case. It may have been that the omission complained of was bona fide and having been made in a judicial proceeding was privileged. Again, the ruling of this Court in Oodai v. Bhowanee Pershad (2) and of the Madras High Court in Subbaiyar v. Kristnaiyar (3) are no authorities against my view, because in both those cases the turning point of the decision was that male members of a family cannot sue for the injury or insult which they have sustained indirectly in consequence of ill-treatment of certain female members of the family. Indeed, in the former of these cases it was left an open question whether the female members of the family who had been insulted could not maintain an action in their own behalf, whilst the latter case, leaving the same question open, proceeded entirely upon the technical ground of the absence of locus standi in the plaintiff. How far I am prepared to accept the ground upon which those two rulings proceeded is a question which I am not called upon to determine in this case, though both those rulings are consonant with the English law, so far as I can understand those cases from the facts stated in the published reports. There is, however, another case to which I wish to refer—Pitumber Dass v. Dwarka Pershad (1), in which it was held that making and publicly exhibiting an effigy of a person, calling it by the person's name, and beating it with shoes, are acts amounting to defamation of character for which a suit for recovery of damages will lie. The case was no doubt dealt with as falling under the rule of the English law of libel, though the learned Judges in regarding the case as one of defamation do not appear to have considered how far the effigy and its maltreatment were subject to the plea of justification. Under the English law of libel, if no such plea could be raised, the conduct of the defendants would no doubt be actionable; but according to the view which I have taken, I should probably have regarded the case as not one of defamation as understood in the English law of slander and libel, for which falsehood and misrepresentation are necessary elements, but simply as a case of [453] personal insult and, as such, actionable, per se, as a substantive tort in itself, without proof of actual or special damage.

I now proceed to deal with the second question in this case, viz., the plea of privilege. And in dealing with this part of the case, I think the analogies of the English law furnish a good guide, though of course that law deals with the matter as relating to defamation, and not to mere abusive or insulting language, for that law does not recognize personal insult as in itself an actionable wrong. The grounds of privilege as to statements made in the course of judicial proceedings are stated to be those of public policy in the interests of justice, and they are well set forth at p. 173 of Starkie's work, and the same author summarizes the English law so far as it relates to the privilege of witnesses (p. 179) in the following words:—
"By the general policy of the law the witness is privileged; and therefore no action will lie for a statement made by him in the course of a judicial proceeding, whether by affidavit or viva voce, even though it be alleged to have been made falsely and maliciously, and without any reasonable or probable cause, and that the plaintiff has suffered damage in consequence." The same seems to be the effect of the cases cited by Mr. Bigelow (Leading Cases on Torts) at p. 162 of his work. The question of the extent of the privilege of a witness in making statements was, however, well considered in a more recent case—Seaman v. Netherclift (2), in which there are valuable dicta of Cockburn, C.J., Bramwell, J. A., and Amphlett, J.A., who presided in the Court of appeal. The judgments of those eminent Judges show that whilst they were not fully agreed upon all minor points, they were unanimous in laying down the broad proposition of law that the privilege of a witness is limited to the time when he is actually under examination. Whether such privilege has application to statements having no reference to the matter which the Court is investigating was left an open question in that case. Cockburn, C.J., after laying down that "a witness is privileged to the extent of what he says in course of his examination," went on to say: "Neither is that privilege affected by the relevancy or irrelevancy of what he says; for then he would be obliged to judge of what is relevant or irrelevant, and questions might be, and are, constantly asked which are [454] not strictly relevant to the issue." But he added: "I am very far from desiring to be considered as laying down as law that what a witness states altogether out of the character and sphere of a witness, or what he may say dehors the matter in hand, is necessarily protected." Upon the same point Bramwell, J. A., in delivering his judgment, drew a distinction between relevant facts in evidence and matters "having reference to the enquiry," and he held that the latter phrase was preferable to and wider than mere questions of relevancy, as defining the limits of the privilege of a witness. And in dealing with the argument of counsel, the learned Judge went on to say (p. 60):—"Mr. Clarke said he was prepared to maintain that as long as a witness spoke as a witness in the witness-box, he was protected, whether the matter had reference to the inquiry or not. I am reluctant to affirm so extreme a proposition. Suppose, while the witness is in the box, a man, were to come in at the door, and the witness were to exclaim 'that man picked my pocket.' I can hardly think that would be privileged. I can scarcely think a witness would be protected for any thing he might say in the witness-box wantonly and without reference to the inquiry. I do not say he would not be protected. It might be held that it was better that everything witness said as a witness should be protected than that witnesses should be under the impression that what they said in the witness-box might subject them to an action. I certainly should pause before I affirmed so extreme a proposition, but without affirming that I think the words 'having reference to the inquiry' ought to have a very wide and comprehensive application, and ought not to be limited to statements for which, if not true, a witness might be indicted for perjury, or the exclusion of which by the Judge would give ground for a new trial, but ought to extend to that which a witness might naturally and reasonably say when giving evidence with reference to the inquiry as to which he had been called as a witness."

Amphlett, J. A., in delivering his judgment in the same case, after saying that there were "many reasons why a witness should be absolutely protected for any thing he said in the witness-box" went on to say: "Any thing that tended to disparage the credit of a witness may be said to be relevant to the enquiry in which the [455] witness is giving his evidence ..... No doubt the strong language the defendant used, which was quite unnecessary, prejudiced him with the jury; but the unnecessary strength of the language cannot affect the question of privilege."

In the present case the plaintiff's deposition shows, and the lower appellate Court has interpreted it to mean, that "he was abused after the defendant's deposition was over," and that Court goes on to say: "If this is a fact, and probably it is so in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, then in my opinion he (defendant) had no right to use the ill expressions towards the plaintiff, a respectable person in his retired life ..... The privilege of a witness lasts as long only as he has been deposing on oath in the witness-box, but not after it."

The passage in the plaintiff's deposition to which these remarks refer clearly shows that the abusive language was employed by the defendant against the plaintiff after the defendant had finished his deposition and was no longer in the witness-box. But this question, as pointed out by the lower appellate Court, has not been tried upon the merits, and I may observe, that the deposition given by the present defendant in the suit of Sheobadan Singh v. Dawan Singh would be, perhaps, the most important piece of evidence for determining whether the abusive language now complained of in this suit was uttered by the defendant in the course of his examination as a witness. The language is stated to have been uttered in answer to a question put by the Munsif who presided in the Court, requiring the defendant to give some explanation why the present plaintiff had deposed against the case set up by the present defendant, who was also defendant in the former action.

I agree with the lower appellate Court in holding that the case has not been tried upon the merits, and I shall uphold the order of that Court now under appeal directing a trial de novo.

But because the points of law which have arisen in this case are of considerable importance; because upon these points the Legislature has not yet settled the law; because the English common law of torts, in my opinion, is not in its integrity applicable to this country; because I have in this judgment departed from [456] that law in some important points, I consider it necessary before concluding this judgment to formulate the exact propositions of law upon which this judgment proceeds. Those propositions are the following :—

Firstly, that the English law of slander as forming part of the law of defamation, and, as such, drawing somewhat arbitrary distinctions between words actionable per se and words requiring proof of special or actual damage, is not applicable to this country either by reason of any statutory provision or by any uniform course of decision sufficient to establish such distinctions as part of the common law of British India.

Secondly, that whilst the English law of defamation recognizes no distinction between defamation as such and personal insult in civil liability, the law of British India recognizes personal insult conveyed by abusive language as actionable per se without proof of special or actual damage.

Thirdly, that such abusive and insulting language, unless excused or protected by any other rule of law, is in itself a substantive cause of action and a civil injury apart from defamation.

Fourthly, that malice is an element of liability for abusive and insulting language.

Fifthly, that such malice will be presumed or inferred unless the contrary is shown.

Sixthly, that where the defendant is not absolutely privileged and protected by reason of the office or the occasion on which he employed such language, he renders himself subject to a civil liability for damages, irrespective of any plea of justification based upon proving the truth of the statements contained in the abusive and insulting language complained of.

Seventhly, that the rule of English law as to the privilege or protection of a witness in regard to defamatory statements made in the witness-box is based upon a public policy which is equally applicable to insulting and abusive language used by such witness.

Eighthly, that such statements when made in the witness-box are privileged and protected, even though made maliciously and [457] falsely, so long as they are relevant to the inquiry, or have reference to the inquiry in the broadest sense of the phrase.

Ninthly, that even where such statements have no reference to the inquiry, the defendant may prove the absence of malice and that such statements were made in good faith for the public good.

As the case has not been tried upon the merits, it is impossible to determine at this stage which or how many of these propositions would be applicable to the facts, beyond the rule that abusive and insulting language is actionable per se without proof of special or actual damage, unless such language is excused or protected by some other rule of law.

The case was therefore rightly remanded by the lower appellate Court for trial upon the merits, and that trial must, in my opinion, proceed with reference to the legal propositions which I have already enunciated. My brother Brodhurst is, however, of opinion that the case as it stands already is ready for final adjudication, and that the question of privilege obviates the necessity of entering into the vaster question as to whether abusive and insulting language is actionable per se. I wish I had been able to take the same view of the record of the case as it now stands. But I find that in the first place the plea of privilege was neither pleaded by the defendant before the Munsif, nor was it made the subject of an issue so as to enable the parties to produce evidence upon that issue. The record of the case shows that the issues were framed on the 7th November, 1887, and the Munsif examined the parties on the same day, and without taking any further evidence dismissed the suit. Under these circumstances, I cannot help agreeing with the lower appellate Court in the view that, even in respect of such defence as the doctrine of privilege might furnish, there has been no proper trial upon the merits, and that the Munsif in this omission was influenced entirely by a misapprehension of the meaning of the plaintiff's deposition. According to the view which my learned brother is inclined to take of the doctrine of privilege in such cases, the question of good faith is a question of fact, which must be determined upon its own individual merits, with reference to the circumstances of each case, proved by evidence, for producing which the parties must have such opportunities as the law [458] of procedure allows them. This was not done here, because, as the record shows, the examination of the parties was virtually an examination such as ss. 117, 118, and 119 of the Code contemplate, an examination the primary object of which is to enable the Court to frame proper issues. In this case neither the question of privilege at large nor the question of bona fides was made the subject of an issue, and I should have been willing to consent to any order made by my learned brother such as would admit the trial of those points of fact before final adjudication.

But the facts which might sustain a plea of privilege have not been ascertained by judicial trial in this case, nor has the question of bona fides been made the subject of inquiry. I have indeed, in deference to my learned brother's views, consented to an order sending for the record of the former suit, that is, the one in the course of which the defendant used the abusive language complained of in this action. But the record of that case affords no help, even if we as a Court of second appeal could deal with that record as evidence in this case. That record, if it shows any thing, shows that the abusive language was not incorporated in the defendant's deposition, and in the absence of a total want of the trial of the point as to privilege, it cannot be the result of a judicial inquiry, but a mere surmise to hold that the abusive language complained of was employed whilst the defendant was under examination as a witness, or that it was so employed bona fide.

It is perfectly true, as admitted in this case, that the abusive language was employed in an answer to a question put by the Munsif. But it is equally true that the question was not needed, and it would be extending the doctrine of privilege far beyond its bounds, even as known to the English law, to hold that the mere incident of such a question being put by the Court is to afford the person to whom such question is put an unbounded privilege of abusing another in open Court, without a proper ascertainment by trial of the facts which might furnish a legal basis for such privilege, a trial which we as a Court of second appeal can scarcely hold ourselves.

So far as the question of bona fides is concerned, I hold the same opinion as my brother Straight expressed in Abdul [459] Hakim v. Tej Chander Mukerji (1), and re-affirmed by him in Queen-Empress v. Dhum Singh (2). And I may add that so far as the quantum of damages claimed is concerned, nothing that I have said in this judgment must be taken to lay down any rule as to assessment. The considerations which regulate the assessment of damages in such cases necessarily rest upon the determination of the facts and circumstances of each case, and I do not think that the case is in its present state ready for any adjudication as to the amount of damages. The question will, however, no doubt be determined by the Court of first instance, to which, by the order of the lower appellate Court, the case has been remanded for re-trial.

I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. DURGA. [23rd June, 1888.]

Act V of 1861, ss. 8, 29—Police Officer—Suspension—Breach of order.

A police constable was suspended and ordered to remain in the lines during suspension. Despite the order he absented himself therefrom without leave. He was convicted under s. 29 of Act V of 1861.

Held, s. 29 of Act V of 1861, contemplates that the person to be charged with an offence under it must have been, at the time of his doing the act in respect of which the charge is preferred, a police constable within the meaning of that Act. When a police officer is suspended, he ceases to be a police officer; the conviction was therefore wrong.

The facts of this case are stated in the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—This case has been reported by the learned Judge of Banda for consideration as to whether the conviction of the accused under s. 29 of Act V of 1861, which contains the statute law on the subject, can be sustained. S. 29 of the Act to which I have referred provides:—"Every police officer who shall be guilty of any violation of duty, or wilful breach or neglect of any rule or regulation or lawful [460] order made by competent authority; or who shall withdraw from the duties of his office without permission, or without having given previous notice for the period of two months; or who shall engage, without authority, in any employment other than his police duty ; or who shall be guilty of cowardice ; or who shall offer any unwarrantable personal violence to any person in his custody, shall be liable, on conviction before a Magistrate, to a penalty not exceeding three months' pay, or to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a period not exceeding three months, or to both. In this particular case it appears that the man Durga was a police constable employed in the police force of these Provinces ; that for some misconduct upon his part he had been ordered by his District Superintendent to be suspended and to remain in the lines during such suspension ; that despite the order that he was to remain in the lines, he absented himself therefrom without leave ; and it was in respect of his doing so that he has been charged under s. 29, Act V of 1861, and convicted by the Magistrate. When this reference came before me, I thought the matter of sufficient importance to invite the learned Public Prosecutor to be good enough to give me the benefit of his valuable assistance, more particularly as there was to be found in the Bengal Law Reports, Vol. VIII, Appendix, page 58 (The Queen v. Dinanath Gangooly), a decision which, if a right decision, governs this case and settles the question as to whether such a conviction as that which had been had against Durga can be sustained. I have heard the learned Public Prosecutor, and I have had an opportunity also of carefully considering the terms of the judgment of the two learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court, and I am constrained to come to the conclusion that they were right. The provision contained in s. 29 of Act V of 1861 contemplates that the person to be charged with an offence under that section must have been, at the time of his having done the act in respect of which the charge is preferred, a police constable within the meaning of that statute ; and by s. 8, read in conjunction with the form to be found in the schedule attached to the Act, it is clear, that when once a police officer has been suspended, it is his duty to hand over to his superior officer the certificate under which he is appointed a member of the police [461] force ; so that the effect of the statute, as pointed out by the two learned Judges of the Calcutta Court, is that a police officer who has been suspended, from the mere circumstance of that suspension, ceases to be a police officer, because it is ordered by the Act that when he is suspended his certificate, hitherto in operation, shall cease to have effect, and shall be immediately surrendered to his superior officer. I cannot help concurring with that view, though, with the profoundest respect for the framers of the law, the policy or convenience of such a provision seems to me doubtful. Indeed, with reference to what transpired yesterday in the course of the case of Muhammad Mian Khan (1), and from what appears in the present case, it is difficult to see how the discipline of the police force can be properly preserved unless the District Superintendents have larger and more clearly defined statutory powers to deal with insubordination. It is no use framing rules and formulating police manuals, if such rules and the directions in such manuals are not authorized by or are in hostility with the statute, and I think the subject is one which may fairly claim attention at the hands of the Local Government, specially just now, when there are so many complaints of the working of the present police system, and a thorough overhauling and re-organization seems desirable.

I quash the conviction and sentence of Durga, because on the terms of the statute it seems to me I have no option, and he will stand acquitted.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[462] Before Sir John Edge, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Mahmood.

KACHWAIN (Defendant) v. SARUP CHAND AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs).
[20th March, 1888.]

Execution of decree—Property liable to attachment and sale—Grant to Hindu widow for maintenance for life—Reversionary right of grantor—Act VIII of 1859, s. 205—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 266 (k)—“Expectancy.”

One N, the sole owner of a certain village, had a son J. J. had two wives. By his first wife he had a son U. J.'s second wife was G. by whom he had a son whose widow is K., the defendant in the suit. J. died, leaving U. his son, G. his widow, and K. his son's widow, and on his death U. inherited the village. Prior to the year 1874 U. had made a gift to G. of 105 bighas situate in the village. In 1874 the rights and interests of U. in the village were sold by auction and purchased by T., the ancestor of the plaintiffs. G. by a deed of gift conveyed the 105 bighas to K. and ultimately died on 26th January, 1883. Plaintiffs then sued to set aside the gift and for possession of the land. The learned Judge found that the land was given to G. in lieu of her maintenance which she was to hold rent free for her life and that she had been in possession thereof for twenty years. Further that U. had the right to resume the land and assess it to rent on the death of G. and that all the rights and interests of U. in the land were attached and sold in 1874. On second appeal it was contended that the interest of U. in the land at the time of the sale of the village by auction was in the nature of a mere expectancy and therefore could not be sold and was not sold. Held, that U. gave to G. the usufruct of the land for her life in lieu of her maintenance. That after the gift the interest of U. in the land was of the same character and carried with it the same consequences, as the reversion which the lessor would have for land leased for life or years and analogous to the right which a mortgagor who had granted a usufructuary mortgage would have. That U. had a vested right in the land which was capable of being sold, and that right passed to the auction purchaser at the sale of 1874.

Counsel for appellant cited the following cases in the course of his argument: Koraj Koonwar v. Komui Komwar (1), Ram Chunder Tanta Doss v. Dhurma Narain Chukarbatty (2), Tuffuzzool Husain Khan v. Raghunath Pershad (3).

One Nirand Singh was the sole owner of a certain village. On his death the village was inherited by his son Jawahir Singh. Jawahir Singh had two wives. By his first wife he had a son called Umrao Singh. By his second wife, Musammatt Galotan, he had a son who married Musammatt Kachwain. Jawahir Singh died, leaving Umrao Singh, Galotan, and Kachwain surviving him. [463] On his death Umrao Singh inherited the village. On the 20th August, 1874, the rights and interests of Umrao Singh in the village were put up for sale in execution of a decree and were purchased by one Tara Chand.

* Second Appeal, No. 582 of 1896, from a decree of A. Macmillan, Esq., Judge of Mainpuri, dated 6th January, 1886, confirming a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri, dated 17th September, 1883.

Galotan had on the 26th July, 1882, transferred certain land in the village to Kachwain, by a deed of gift, and died on the 26th January, 1883.

The plaintiffs in this case, who were the representatives of Tara Chand, sued Kachwain, to set aside the gift and for possession of the land. The contention for the plaintiffs was that Tara Chand had purchased the village including the land in suit; that the land had been given to Galotan for her life only; that she had no power of alienation; and that as she was dead, the defendant Kachwain was no longer entitled to possession of it. The contention for the defendant was that the sale to Tara Chand did not pass the land to him; that the land had not been given to Galotan for life only; that Nirand Singh had given the land to Galotan rent free as "pan masala," and after his death Jawahir Singh had allowed the land to remain in Galotan's possession as stridhan, and she had become the absolute owner of it, and that holding it at the time of the gift as absolute owner she had power to make the gift. The Court of first instance gave the plaintiffs a decree for the possession of the land, which on appeal the lower appellate Court affirmed.

On second appeal by the defendant, Edge, C. J., and Mahmood, J., remanded to the lower appellate Court the following issues for trial:—

1. Who made the gift of the land in suit to Musammat Galotan for maintenance during her life?
2. What were the terms of the grant?
3. How long was she in possession?
4. What interest, if any, had Umrao in the land in suit at the date of the sale, i.e., on the 20th August, 1874.
5. Was such interest actually attached, proclaimed, and sold at that sale?

[464] 6. What were the terms of the order of attachment, of the proclamation, and of the order confirming the sale?

On the 1st issue the lower appellate Court found that Umrao Singh had granted the land to Galotan for maintenance during her life. On the 2nd issue it found the terms of the grant to be that Galotan should hold the land rent-free for her life-time in lieu of maintenance. On the 3rd issue it found that Galotan was in possession under the grant for twenty years. On the 4th issue the finding was, that the interest which Umrao Singh had in the land on the 20th August, 1874, before the sale took place was a right to resume the land and assess it to rent on the death of Galotan. On the 5th issue the Court found that the interest, which Umrao Singh had in the land on the 20th August, 1874, before the sale took place was not specifically attached and sold at that sale, but as the whole rights and interests of Umrao Singh in the village were attached and sold, such interest must be considered to have passed to the purchaser. On the 6th issue it found that the proclamation of sale had been destroyed and its terms could not be ascertained, but that the orders of attachment and confirmation of sale showed that the whole rights and interests of Umrao Singh in the village had been attached and sold.

On the return of these findings objections were taken by the defendant-appellant.

APPEL-
LATE
CIVIL.10 A. 462 =
(1888) 200.

EDGE, C. J.—This is an action brought by the representatives of a purchaser at an auction-sale of the interest of one Umrao Singh in a village sold in execution of a decree on the 20th August, 1874. One Rao Nirand Singh had a son named Jawahir Singh. Jawahir Singh had two wives. By his first wife he had a son Umrao Singh, who is still alive, and whose property was sold. Jawahir Singh's second wife was Musammat Galotan. By her he had a son, whose widow, Musammat Kachwain, is the defendant in this action and appellant in this appeal. Rao Nirand Singh and Jawahir Singh died previous to the 20th August, 1874. Musammat Galotan, on the 26th July, 1882, executed a deed of gift in [465] favour of the defendant-appellant, and on the 26th January, 1883, Musammat Galotan died. The deed of gift related to 105 bighas of land which were situate in the village in question and form the subject of the claim in this action. The plaintiffs contended that Umrao Singh had given those bighas in dispute to Musammat Galotan for her life for maintenance. The finding on remand is in accordance with that contention. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that the bighas in dispute had been given by Rao Nirand Singh to Musammat Galotan, and that the gift had been confirmed by Umrao Singh's father, Jawahir Singh. That contention has been disposed of by the findings on remand. Many questions were raised by the appellant before us. It was contended that at the date of the sale in 1874, Umrao Singh had no interest remaining in the bighas in question that could be sold under s. 205 of Act VIII of 1859, and it was contended that after the gift made by Umrao Singh to Musammat Galotan, Umrao Singh stood in no better position than that of a first expectant reversioner to property in possession of a childless Hindu widow. It appears to me that the position of Umrao Singh was very different to that of such a reversioner. What had been done in effect was this. Musammat Galotan, being entitled to maintenance, Umrao Singh, who was the full owner of the whole village, gave her for her life the usufruct of these 105 bighas in lieu of her maintenance, limiting the grant to her for her life, and she accepted the bighas on those terms. Umrao Singh's interest, as it appears to me, was much more than the mere expectancy of a reversioner to property on the death of a Hindu widow. It was of the same character, and carried with it the same consequences, in my opinion, as the reversion which the lessor would have for land leased for life or years, and would be analogous to the right which a mortgagor who had granted a usufructuary mortgage would have. It is misleading to use in connection with such a right the term "expectancy." On the determination of the life interest, the right to possession would be in Umrao Singh or his assignee, or if he had not assigned and had died, then in his heirs. I think that the cases cited by Mr. Colvin (Koraj Koonwar v. Komul Koonwar(1), Ram Chunder Tantra Doss v. Dhurmo Narain Chukerbutty(2)) do not apply. The case which [466] was cited to us, namely, Tuffuzzool Hossein Khan v. Raghoonath Pershad (3), obviously does not apply. That was a case in which the thing which was sold at auction was the chance of the success of a party in an arbitration. It was said on behalf of the appellant further that the bighas in question, having been granted by Umrao Singh to Musammat Galotan in lieu of maintenance, they became her stridhan, and that Umrao Singh ceased to have in them a saleable interest. That proposition would be a correct view of the law if Galotan's interest had not been

(1) 6 W. R. C. R. 34.

(2) 15 W. R. F. B. 17.

(3) 14 M. I. A. 41.

limited to an interest for her life. This was not an absolute gift by Umrao Singh, but merely a grant to operate during the lifetime of Musammatt Galotan. There was a considerable amount of legal argument as to the rights of a Hindu widow in the property left by her husband in respect of her right of maintenance. I do not think that any of those arguments assist us in the determination of this case, which is not one of partition, but is one of a private arrangement between Umrao Singh and Musammatt Galotan, by which he agreed to give to her and she agreed to receive from him, these bighas for her life only and as a mode of payment of her maintenance. In my opinion, whatever might have been the position of Musammatt Galotan if this had not been the arrangement that had been come to, we must give effect to that arrangement or agreement, and consider the effect of that agreement only. In the result I have come to the conclusion that Umrao Singh had a vested right to these bighas in question which was capable of being sold at the auction-sale, and that that right, that is, the right of possession on the death of Musammatt Galotan passed to the auction-purchaser at the sale on the 20th August, 1874. The appellant before us may or may not be entitled to maintenance out of these lands in question. That point has not been raised in the action and no issue has been framed relating to it, and consequently I do not think I would be justified in giving any opinion on the subject. In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

MAHMOOD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

On an application to sue in forma pauperis the Court is required to deal with the question of the applicant's pauperism with reference to the definition of that word as given in the Explanation to s. 401 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in deciding it to ascertain the exact property, its market value and the title thereto and then to deal with the case under s. 407 of the Code, irrespective of any surmises as to the reason why the applicant has valued his claim at a high figure.

All orders passed under s. 407 of the Code of Civil Procedure are not excluded from the exercise of revisional powers of the High Court under s. 622 of the Code, Chatterpal Singh v. Raja Ram (1) notwithstanding.

In the exercise of revisional powers it is not the duty of the High Court to enter into the merits of the evidence; it has only to see whether the requirements of the law have been duly and properly obeyed by the Court whose order is the subject of revision, and whether the irregularity as to failure or exercise of jurisdiction is such as to justify interference with the order.

THE facts of this case are stated in the judgment of the Court.

ORDER OF REMAND.

MAHMOOD, J.—This is an application made under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, invoking the revisional powers of this Court in the interests of justice within the meaning of that section.

The application relates to an order passed by the lower Court under s. 407 of the Civil Procedure Code disallowing the petitioner's prayer to be allowed to sue in forma pauperis under the special provisions of Chapter XXVI of the Code.

The facts out of which the application has arisen may be briefly stated to be the following:—

The petitioner, Muhammad Husain, by a deed executed by him on the 6th August, 1881, usufructuarily mortgaged certain villages belonging to him to Shah Kirpa Dayal and others who are the [468] opposite party to the application. Under the terms of the mortgage a certain date, that is three years, was mentioned to be the period when the mortgage was either to be extinguished or to be liquidated. Similarly, on the 23rd December, 1881, the aforesaid Muhammad Husain executed another usufructuary mortgage-deed in respect of certain other property under terms and conditions similar to those of the previous mortgage, the rate of interest again being 12 per cent. per annum.

It is admitted before me by the petitioner Muhammad Husain in person and by Pandit Bishambar Nath on behalf of the opposite party that, whilst under the terms of the two mortgages themselves the opposite party would be entitled to obtain possession as usufructuary mortgagees of the property, by certain transactions subsequent to the mortgages, namely, on the 23rd September, 1881, and on the 6th June, 1882, the mortgagees accepted from the present petitioner Muhammad Husain kabuliats either leaving him in possession or replacing him in possession in lieu of payments of certain sums of money which were to be paid by the mortgagor to the mortgagees as money due under the kabuliats, the money being probably equivalent to such usufruct as the mortgagees would be entitled to take from the property in lieu of interest at 12 per cent. per annum.

Upon the statement of the main allegations between the parties, into the merits of which allegations I am not required to enter, the present petitioner came into Court alleging (to put the matter in the broadest terms), that the defendants, as mortgagees and also as the executants of the kabuliats abovementioned, had infringed the terms of those contracts; that they had wrongfully ousted the plaintiff from the possession of the mortgaged property and had committed acts of waste; and upon these allegations the petitioner alleged that he was entitled not only to possession of the mortgaged property, but also to a considerable sum of money which he claimed as compensation or damages which had accrued to him by the wrongful acts of the defendants.

The suit began, as it should have done, under s. 401 of the Civil Procedure Code, that is, by an application such as s. 403 of the Code requires. The application appears to have been registered, [469] not as a suit, but, as an application to be allowed to sue in forma pauperis.

The application was resisted by the defendants mainly upon the grounds that the petitioner's allegation as to pauperism was not true, and that he could not sue in the proper form.

The issue having been so raised the learned Judge of the lower Court appears to have allowed the parties to produce evidence of witnesses upon the issue. Having examined the witnesses he has recorded a judgment, the main portion of which may be quoted to be in the following terms:—

"On a consideration of the statements of the witnesses for the parties, this Court is of opinion that the applicant is not a pauper, inasmuch as it appears from the mode in which the claim has been made and the objections taken thereto by the opposite party, the allegation with which the claim has been made, and the form in which it has been brought, are not such as to render the suit fit for being heard or decided in forma pauperis."

The learned Judge, after making these observations, goes on to surmise that the claim of the plaintiff may be taken to be extravagant and, as such, unfit for being dealt with in forma pauperis.

The first question which I have to deal with here has arisen out of the preliminary objection taken by Pandit Bishambar Nath on behalf of the opposite party, namely, that upon the findings of the lower Court, it is not open to this Court, as a Court of revision, to interfere under s. 622 of the Code, and in support of this contention the learned pleader has relied upon the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Chatterpal Singh v. Raja Ram (1), and also upon various other rulings of this Court which, according to the learned pleader's contention, restrict and limit the revisional powers of this Court. So far as the ruling in the Full Bench case is concerned, all I need say is, that the facts of the case were vastly different from those to which this application relates; that the learned Judges who signed the judgment of the majority of this Court, did not lay down any general principle of law applicable to the matter; and that, so far as I am concerned, I, in delivering my judgment, guarded myself against being understood [470] to exclude all orders under s. 407 from the exercise of the revisional powers of this Court. A similar question has been quite recently considered by me in the case of Ali Hamza v. Ahsan Ali (2). Pandit Bishambar Nath further relies upon the other rulings of this Court under s. 622. I think nearly all these rulings were considered and cited by me in the case of Dhum Singh v. Basant Singh (3), where I gave expression fully to my views as to what I understood to be the effect of the Privy Council ruling in Amir Hassan Khan v. Sheo Baksh Singh (4) and the Full Bench ruling in Badami Kuar v. Dina Rai (5) and the other cases. Adhering as I do to the views I then expressed, I cannot but hold, consistently, with those views, that in this case there has been a wrong exercise of jurisdiction by the lower Court, and that the application can be entertained in revision.

Now, in the present case, I am far from being satisfied that the learned Judge of the lower Court had consulted the exact definition of the word pauper as contained in the Explanation to s. 401 of the Civil Procedure Code, nor am I satisfied that, in dealing with the weight of evidence in the case, he was clear as to the exact person upon whom the onus probandi as to pauperism lay in a case such as this, or as to the requisites of legal proof before an alleged pauperism, supported as it must necessarily be by a duly verified statement, can be held not to have been made out. Further, I am not satisfied that the learned Judge did not mix up considerations as to the likelihood or the chance of the plaintiff's success in the suit as an element in guiding his decision as to whether or not the petitioner was a pauper.

The plaintiff's statement that he had no property other than that which he had mentioned in the application could, no doubt, be contradicted by other evidence; but before that evidence could be trusted as sufficient to disallow the petitioner the privilege of suing in forma pauperis it was necessary to find clearly whether such additional property as might be proved to belong to the plaintiff was sufficient to pay the fee prescribed by law within the meaning of the Explanation to s. 401. The manner in which the learned [471] Subordinate Judge has dealt with the case shows that he did not consider it necessary to ascertain either the exact amount of courtfees which would be due upon plaintiff's plaint or the exact nature or value of the property which was alleged to belong to the petitioner over and above the subject-matter of the suit. Indeed no attempt in that direction appears to have been made, because the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge does not even specify the property which he held the petitioner to be possessed of, much less is there the smallest trace of any issue as to the value of the property. General and vague statements as to the petitioner who comes into Court to sue in forma pauperis cannot be regarded by me as adequate to divest him of a remedy which on proof of pauperism the law would award him, and I cannot hold that there is any finding in the judgment to show that the plaintiff is possessed of means which would enable him to maintain the action in the usual form.

The learned Pandit, whilst conceding that there is no documentary evidence to prove the title of the petitioner as to the property alleged to belong to him, has asked me to go into the merits myself and to adjudicate upon the exact effect of the oral evidence of witnesses produced by his clients, and to determine, upon the record as it now stands, questions as to the title and value of the various properties the ownership whereof was attributed by the witnesses to the petitioner. I have no hesitation in laying down the rule that if, as I have frequently said before, in second appeals it is not the duty of this Court to enter into the merits of the evidence, a fortiori, it is not the duty of this Court to enter into the merits of the evidence in cases of revision. I may add that any other view would impose upon Courts of revision duties not dissimilar to those of the Courts of first appeal. All that this Court as a Court of revision is required to do is to see whether the requirements of the law have been duly and properly obeyed by the Courts whose orders are subjected to revision, and whether the irregularity as to failure or exercise of jurisdiction is such as would justify interference by this Court.

I am of opinion that this is one of those cases in which those revisional powers should be exercised, and without prejudice to [472] either party to the litigation the order which I think is necessary to make in the case is, to set aside the order of the learned Judge of the lower Court, to require him to deal with the question of pauperism with reference to the definition contained in the Explanation to s. 401 and, in deciding the question, to ascertain the exact property, its market value, and the title thereto, and then to deal with the case under s. 407, irrespective of any surmises as to the reason why the plaintiff has valued his claim at such a high figure. In dealing with the case under that section the learned Subordinate Judge will, of course, be at liberty to decide whether, even if the petitioner's pauperism is established, his case falls under any of the other clauses of the enactment.

I have considered it necessary to go into the matter so fully because, whilst I hold that pauper suits when frivolously brought should not be encouraged, I also hold that enough has already been done by the Legislature in the Code Civil Procedure, not only in s. 407 but also in later sections, to provide checks upon such litigation. But it is equally clear that if these checks are too severely administered, in the sense of the various requirements of the law not being duly carried out before a pauper is kept out of Court, the effect will be far from what the Legislature aims at. Courts of Justice should be open alike to the rich and the poor. This is a revision case, and all that I am required to do is to allow the petition, and setting aside the order of the learned Judge of the lower Court to require him to dispose of the case again with reference to the observations which I have made.

Costs will abide the result.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

SAKINA BIBI (Plaintiff) v. AMIRAN AND OTHERS (Defendants).*
[6th April, 1888.]

Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz—Pre-emptor out of possession of his own share—His own share lost by him pending appeal—Muhammadian Law.

The plaintiff instituted this suit to enforce her right of pre-emption in respect of a share in a village of which she alleged to be a co-sharer with the vendors. The [473] defendants to the suit were the vendors, the vendees, and others who were rival claimants for pre-emption in the share sold. The rival pre-emptors alone defended the action on the ground, among others, that plaintiff was not in possession of her own share in the village out of which she alleged that her right to claim pre-emption arose. The Court of first instance dismissed her suit. In appeal the District Judge in effect dismissed her claim as against the defendants who were the rival pre-emptors, but gave the plaintiff a right to obtain the share if the other pre-emptors did not avail themselves of the decree which they had obtained in their action. On the 12th of January, 1887, plaintiff's second appeal was admitted, and on the 20th January plaintiff's share in the village out of which her claim to pre-emption in respect of the share sold arose, was sold in execution of a decree in another suit. Respondent contended that, as since the appeal the share out of which plaintiff alleged that her right arose was sold, she could not get any decree now in her favor.

Held, that this Court as a Court of Appeal have only got to see what was the decree, which the Court of first instance should have passed, and if the Court of first instance had wrongly dismissed the claim, the plaintiff cannot be prejudiced by her share having been subsequently sold in execution in another suit; such a sale could not have affected her right to maintain the decree, if she had obtained a decree in her favor in the Court of first instance, either on review or on appeal, nor could it have been made the ground of appeal. Further, plaintiff being out of possession of her share at the time she instituted the suit for pre-emption was immaterial, the Court should have ascertained whether the plaintiff was at the date of suit entitled in law to the share out of which her right of pre-emption was alleged to have arisen.

Held, by Mahmood, J., that the passage from Hamilton's Hedaya by Grady, p. 562, means that in the pre-emptive tenement the pre-emptor should have a vested ownership and not a mere expectancy of inheritance or a reversionary or any kind of contingent right, or any interest falling short of full ownership.

and Assid Ali for the sum of Rupees three hundred. As regards Muhammadan co-sharers, the Wajib-ul-arz of the village provided that sales of shares of co-sharers should be governed by the Muhammadan law of pre-emption. On the sale taking place, Amiran and Karim Bakhsh instituted a suit for pre-emption in respect of the share, and obtained a decree. Plaintiff (Sakina Bibi) instituted this suit on 1st April, 1886, against the above-named vendors, vendees and the pre-emptors to enforce her right of pre-emption, on the ground that she and the vendors are co-sharers and partners in the property sold which was their paternal estate, while the vendees were strangers, and the pre-emptors were sharers in a thoke of the village other than that in which the property sold was situated. On the same day that she filed this suit [474] she also instituted a suit for possession of her share in the estate left by her father.

The vendors-defendants did not defend the action; the vendees contended that the sale to them was made with the knowledge of the plaintiff, who did not offer to buy; and the pre-emptors (defendants) urged that, inasmuch as plaintiff was not in possession of her share in the paternal estate in respect of which she claimed the right of pre-emption, she could not maintain the suit.

The Subordinate Judge finding that the plaintiff was not in possession of her share in the estate left by her father dismissed the suit. On the 9th July, 1886, plaintiff appealed to the District Judge, and that officer, agreeing with the Subordinate Judge, dismissed the appeal as against the rival pre-emptors, but directed that if they did not avail themselves of the decree they had obtained, then plaintiff should obtain the property on payment of the purchase-money.

On the 12th January, 1887, plaintiff preferred this second appeal, contending that whether she was or was not in possession of her share in the paternal estate, she was still a co-sharer in the village and entitled to maintain the suit.

On the 20th January, 1887, the plaintiff's share in the village out of which she alleged that her right arose was sold in execution of a decree against her in some other case.

The appeal came on to be heard before Mahmood, J., who referred it to a Bench of two Judges with reference to the contention on behalf of the respondents that the plaintiff's own share in the village and out of which alone her claim to pre-emption in respect of the share sold had arisen, having been sold by auction and so lost to her, she was no more entitled to a decree in the suit. In support of their contention the respondents cited the case of Khuda Bakhsh v. Ramlautan Lal (1).

The appeal was then heard before EDGE, C. J., and MAHMOOD, J.

Mr. G. T. Spankie, for the appellant.

Mr. Abdul Majid, for the respondents.

ORDER OF REMAND.

[475] EDGE, C. J.—This was an action for pre-emption. The defendants Amiran and Karim Bakhsh were also claimants for pre-emption in the share sold. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the claim. The District Judge in effect dismissed the action as against Amiran and Karim Bakhsh, but gave the plaintiff a right to obtain the share if Amiran and Karim Bakhsh did not avail themselves of the decree which they had obtained in the action. From that decree this appeal has been brought.

(1) A. W. N. (1884), 169.

Mr. Abdul Majid for the respondents has raised a preliminary objection. The objection is this:—He says, and it is not denied on behalf of the appellant, that pending the appeal to this Court, that is to say, since the appeal to this Court was filed, the share out of which the plaintiff alleged that her right arose was sold in the execution of a decree in some other case. He contends that under these circumstances we cannot pass a decree in her favour. He bases his contention on a passage cited to us from Shama Churun Sircar's Muhammadan Law (1) in which it is stated that "if the shuffi previous to the decree of the kazi sell the house from which he derives his right of shuffa, the reasons or grounds of his right being thereby extinguished, the right itself is invalidated, notwithstanding he be ignorant of the sale of the house to which it related."

I do not accede to Mr. Abdul Majid's contention. It appears to me that sitting here as a Court of Appeal, we have got to see what was the decree which the Court of first instance should have passed, and if the Court of first instance wrongly dismissed the claim, the plaintiff cannot be prejudiced by her share having been subsequently sold in execution of a decree in another suit. It could not be contended, I think, if the plaintiff had obtained a decree in the Court of first instance, that her right to maintain the decree either on review or appeal could possibly be affected by a subsequent sale of the share out of which her right of pre-emption arose. The subsequent sale could not have been alleged as a ground of appeal for instance. It was not a matter which could have made the decree of the Court of first instance, in such a case, wrong in law or in fact; and I can see no distinction between the case in which the plaintiff obtains a decree for pre-emption in the Court of first [476] instance, and a case in which she proves to a Court of appeal that she was entitled to a decree in the Court of first instance which she did not obtain. In consequence of this view the preliminary objection fails.

Now, as to the actual appeal before us, it appears that the plaintiff, at the date of the institution of the suit, was not in physical possession of the share out of which the right of pre-emption arose, and that she continued dispossessed up to the time of the judgment in the lower appellate Court. The lower appellate Court appears to have considered her case as one in which she had not proved her right against the other pre-emptive claimants on the ground that she was not in possession of the share out of which her right was alleged to have arisen. Now as to these circumstances, I think it was the duty of the lower appellate Court to ascertain whether the plaintiff was, at the date of the suit, entitled in law to the share out of which her right of pre-emption was alleged to have arisen. The mere fact of her not being in possession of it was immaterial except in so far as that fact might be urged as showing that she was not entitled to it. Now this is the question which the lower appellate Court has not tried. There is another material question in the case which has not been tried, and it is as to whether, assuming that the plaintiff is entitled to the share out of which the right is alleged to have arisen, she has only an equal right of pre-emption with Amiran and Karim Bakhsh or whether she has an inferior or superior right. The nature of the decree, if the plaintiff is entitled to one, will depend upon the findings on those points. I merely refer to these issues not as expressing exhaustively the issues that have not been tried, because the lower appellate Court has not tried any issues at all.

The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside, the appeal decreed, and the case remanded under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Costs to abide the event.

MAHMOOD, J.—I am of the same opinion, but as the Judge who referred the case to a Bench, I wish to say that the reasons and the facts which rendered it necessary for me to refer the case are stated in my order of the 1st February, 1888. The central [477] reason of the reference was, whether the sale of the pre-emptive share, that is to say, of the rights and interests of Musammat Sakina Bibi during the pendency of the appeal would render the dismissal of the appeal a necessary result. The appeal was admitted on the 12th January, 1887, and its aim and object of course was to have it decreed by this Court that, in respect of the sale of the 25th July, 1885, the plaintiff should have, on the 12th June 1886, when the first Court dismissed her suit, had her suit decreed instead.

Mr. Abdul Majid argued that the sale of Musammat Sakina's rights and interests, which sale took place exactly eight days after the admission of this second appeal, namely, on the 20th January, 1887, was sufficient to deprive her of her pre-emptive right, and for this contention he relied upon the passage to which the learned Chief Justice has referred, namely, the passage at page 535 of the Tagore Law Lectures for 1873, and the passage from the Hedaya to be found at page 562 of Grady's edition of Hamilton's Hedaya, which runs as follows :—

" Besides, it is an express condition of shuffa, that a man be firmly possessed of the property from which he derives his right of shuffa at the time when the subject of it is sold—a condition which does not hold on the part of the heirs. It is, moreover, a condition that the property of the shuffi remain firm until the decree of the kazi be passed, and as this does not hold on the part of the deceased shuffi, the shuffa is therefore not established with respect to any one of his descendants, because of the failure of its conditions."

The learned counsel argued that the passage in the Hedaya meant that actual physical possession of a share, that is to say, of the pre-emptive share, was a condition precedent to the exercise of the right of pre-emption. The translation as made by Mr. Hamilton is somewhat loose, but it is clear that what is intended to be conveyed by the author of the Hedaya was, that, in what I may call the pre-emptive tenement, the pre-emptor should have vested ownership and not a mere expectancy of inheritance or a reversionary right, or any other kind of contingent right, or any interest which falls short of full ownership. For instance, in the [478] case of a usufructuary mortgagee who is in possession, the application of the passage would require holding that no right is possessed by such a mortgagee. I do not think that any other interpretation can be placed upon the passage, and I hold also that such is the case-law as shown by some of the reported cases.

Then as to the question, whether a sale such as the sale of the 20th January, 1887, falls within the rule contended for by Mr. Abdul Majid, I agree with the learned Chief Justice in holding that we, as a Court of Appeal, are concerned with the question what the decree of the first Court should have been and not with the matters which have happened since the decree was passed, other than those relating to the array of parties which occurred subsequent to the decree of the Court of first instance. I may say, as I understand the text of the Hedaya, namely, the text at pages 601 and 602, that I have no doubt that although the Muhammadan

Law requires that, if by reason of a voluntary sale or other circumstance the pre-emptor before the passing of the decree of the first Court ceases to be the owner of the pre-emptive tenement, then the decree cannot be given in his favour; yet the rule cannot be carried to Courts of Appeal, or Courts of Error, as the Courts concerned with rectification of the decrees of the Courts below. There is also some doubt in my mind whether the passage so far as it relates to sale by a pre-emptor of his pre-emptive tenement before the decree of the kazi, is applicable to compulsory sales such as the sale of the 20th January, 1887. The sale may or may not have been validly made. It may possibly be the subject of a separate litigation in the execution department to which execution proceedings the present defendants, Mr. Abdul Majid's clients, would possibly be no parties, and the fate of the litigation may be in favour of Musammât Sakina Bibi or against her. Such facts cannot be taken notice of at this stage in a litigation, which, if the pre-emptor's case is established, was rightly commenced and should have ended in the decretal of her claim.

In connection with the latter point I think it my duty to refer to the case of Khuda Bakhsh v. Ramlautan Lal (1) in which a Division Bench of this Court held that, because subsequent to a [479] decree for pre-emption, and during the pendency of the appeal, in a totally separate litigation a decree had been passed which directed that the pre-emptor was not entitled to the pre-emptive tenement, namely, the tenement which gave him the right to sue, therefore such adjudication deprived such pre-emptor of his pre-emptive right and rendered the decree for pre-emption null and void. The case is not on all fours with the present case. If the case were applicable to this case I should have very great hesitation in holding that it was correct law. The rule of lis pendens is a broad doctrine, and the maxim pendente lite nihil innovetur is sufficiently broad to invest this question with some difficulty.

This case has not been tried upon the merits, and there are other questions in the case to which I have not referred, because I agree in the order of the learned Chief Justice that the case should go back under s. 562, of the Civil Procedure Code and be tried on the merits by the lower appellate Court, which Court should frame a decree such as the findings may require.

steps were taken thereupon. On the 12th June, 1883, A died. On the 30th April, 1884, the defendants again applied to the Court at Peshawar treating their judgment-debtor as being then alive, for a fresh certificate to execute their decree in the Moradabad district, and obtained it. On the 20th of August, 1885, they made an application to the District Judge of Moradabad for execution of their decree, and in it, it was stated that the application was "for execution against Ajudhia Prasad and after his death against Angan Lal, the own brother, and Durga Kuar, widow, and Luchman Prasad and others, sons of Ajudhya Prasad, residents of Kundarkhi and the said Angan Lal at present residing at Umballa and employed in the Commissariat Transport Department, judgment-debtors." It was further stated that "the judgment-debtor was dead, and his heirs are living and in possession of his estate, and Angan Lal [480] himself has realized Rs. 9,637-4-9 due to the deceased judgment-debtor from the Commissariat Department of Calcutta and appropriated the same, therefore to that extent the person of the said Angan Lal was liable". Notification of this application was issued to Angan Lal as also to the other persons named therein. Angan Lal objected to the application as against him, stating that, although he was the brother of A, deceased, yet he always lived separate and carried on business separately; that there was no connection or partnership between him and the deceased judgment-debtor, and that he had no property of the deceased in his possession. Further, that as A left issue, it was wrong to call him as heir to A. and take out execution process against him. In reply to these objections the judgment-creditors (defendants) did not contend that Angan Lal was the legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor, but treated him as a person in possession of a sum of money belonging to the deceased, and therefore liable to the extent of the sum so received by him. The Subordinate Judge, holding that Angan Lal was the brother of the deceased, and had realized the amount from the Commissariat office, which he failed to prove that he paid to the deceased, ordered execution to proceed against him. Angan Lal then instituted this suit to set aside the order of the Subordinate Judge. It was contended first, that the suit was in effect a suit under s. 283 of the Code of Civil Procedure and therefore barred as not having been brought within a year from the order of the Subordinate Judge, and secondly, that the proceedings of the Subordinate Judge were held under s. 244 of the Code and therefore no separate suit would lie.

Held, that the first contention must fail, inasmuch as an essential condition precedent to a suit under s. 283 of the Code, is the making of an attachment of some property; of objection being taken to such attachment; of investigation being made into such objection, and lastly, of its being allowed or disallowed, and these do not exist in this case. The second contention also must fail, as the Subordinate Judge never treated the proceedings in execution against Angan Lal upon the footing that he was the legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor.

Mirza Mahomed Aga Ali Khan Bahadur, v. Balmukund (1), Sayid Nadir Hossain, v. Bipen Chund Bassarat (2) were referred to.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—The suit to which this appeal relates is one of a peculiar character, and it is necessary for the purpose of making intelligible the view at which I have arrived to state as succinctly and clearly as I can the circumstances under which the plaintiff comes into Court. It appears that the defendants in the present suit, along with one Narain Das and Chela Ram, brought a suit against one Ajudhia Prasad in the Civil Court in the Panjab and [481] obtained a decree against him on the 23rd July, 1878, for a sum of Rs. 30,545-12-0. That was a simple money-decree. In the year 1881 an application was made to the Panjab Court for a certificate to transfer the execution of that decree to Moradabad in these Provinces, and the application was granted. But nothing further was done in the matter. Upon the 12th June, 1883, Ajudhia Prasad, the judgment-debtor, died. On the 30th April, 1884, very nearly six years after the decree had been originally passed, the defendants, in the name of Damodar Das, who was the original decree-holder and was then also dead, came into the Panjab Court and applied for a fresh certificate for the transfer of the execution of the case to Moradabad, and upon that date the certificate was granted. It is to be noticed, at least so I understand Mr. Conlan, that in that application to the Panjab Court, Ajudhia Prasad was treated as still being alive. However, whatever informality there may have been in that application, on the 20th August, 1885, a formal application was presented in the Court of the Judge at Moradabad and it was for the execution of this decree which had been transferred. It said:—"Application for execution against Ajudhia Prasad, and after his death against Angan Lal, the own brother, and Musammat Durga Kuar the widow, Lachman Prasad, the major son, and Brijbasi Lal, Makut Behari Lal, and Kunj Behari Lal, minors, under the guardianship of Musammat Durga Kuar, their own mother in their own capacity, as the legal representatives of Ajudhia Prasad, the original judgment-debtor, deceased, residents of Kundarkhi, pargana Bilari, in the district of Moradabad, and the said Angan Lal at present residing at Umballa and employed in the Commissariat Transport Department, judgment-debtors."

(1) 3 I.A. 241.

In that petition the following statement was made:—"Although in the decree the names of Narain Das and Chela Ram are included, yet a separation of the demand due to Narain Das has been separately made, and we the decree-holders are separate; and this certificate in respect of money due to us, as decree-holders, has alone been given. Inasmuch as the judgment-debtor has died and his heirs are living and in possession of his property, and Angan Lal himself has realized Rs. 9,637-4-9 due to the deceased judgment-debtor from the Commissariat Department of Calcutta and [482] has appropriated the same, therefore to that extent the person of the aforesaid Angan Lal is also responsible. The decree-holders pray that, after issuing the usual orders, the decretal money may be recovered by means of the attachment and sale, and that for the purpose of execution the case might be transferred to the Subordinate Judge."

That petition as I have said, was filed in the Court of the Judge on the 20th August 1885, and under his order was transmitted to the Subordinate Judge for execution. Notifications of the petition were conveyed to the present plaintiff Angal Lal, as well as to the other persons mentioned therein, and upon the 7th October, 1885, Angan Lal filed objections, which I need not travel through at length. It is sufficient to call attention to the 3rd and 4th paragraphs, in which he says as follows:—"Although the objector is own brother of Ajudhia Prasad, deceased original judgment-debtor, yet he always lived separate, even during the life-time of his parents, from the said judgment-debtor, and he followed his business separately. In the same way Ajudhia Prasad, the deceased judgment-debtor, used to live and work separate from the objector, who used to live upon what he earned from service, and the judgment-debtor himself was without any property—a thing which has been determined by this Court on several previous occasions. That there was no connection or partnership of the objector with Ajudhia Prasad deceased, neither any property belonging to Ajudhia Prasad is in possession of the objector. Inasmuch as Ajudhia Prasad has left issue, it is wrong on the part of decree-holders to call objector as heir to Ajudhia Prasad and to get execution process issued in his name in the presence of the deceased's male children."

Such was the way in which the plaintiff met the application of the decree-holders for execution against him, and it is quite clear upon the terms of these two paragraphs, that I have read, that the position taken up by him was that he was not the heir or legal representative of his deceased brother, and that it was erroneous on the part of the decree-holders-petitioners to ask the Subordinate Judge to bring him into the execution proceedings as the legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor as provided for [483] in s. 234 of the Civil Procedure Code. To these objections of the plaintiff Angan Lal, answers were filed by the decree-holders-petitioners, and it is plain from the terms of their answer that they practically threw overboard the notion that Angan Lal was in any sense a person standing in the position of the legal representative of their deceased judgment debtor, but they treated him upon the footing of being a person, who was in possession of a sum of money belonging to the deceased judgment-debtor. Indeed, in the 4th paragraph of their answer they say in terms: "The plea of the objector that he was separate from Ajudhia Prasad does not strengthen his position. As the objector has realized and appropriated the money due to Ajudhia Prasad, he is certainly liable to the extent of the money realized by him."

Such was the petition, such the objection of Angan Lal, and such the reply to the objection of Angan Lal on the part of the decree-holders, and upon those materials the Subordinate Judge proceeded to pass an order dated the 27th March, 1886. Now it is plain to my mind from the terms of that order, that the Subordinate Judge dealt with the proceedings before him, not upon the footing of determining a question under s. 234 of the Civil Procedure Code, as to the responsibility of a legal representative in respect of a deceased judgment-debtor, but he disposed of it upon the single and simple ground, that so far as the materials before him enabled him to form an opinion, it was established that money had been received by Angan Lal, which he had not paid over to his deceased brother, and therefore he was responsible. Thus the Subordinate Judge was, by the summary method of an execution proceeding, trying a question as to whether money was or was not due to the estate of a deceased person by a third party, who was outside the decree and who was not brought in, in the character of a legal representative. In dealing with the matter in that way the Subordinate Judge acted without jurisdiction, and he had no right whatever to decide anything as to a person, who stood in the position of a stranger, or to hold that such stranger was liable to have the decree executed against him, as if he was the representative of the deceased judgment-debtor.

That order of the Subordinate Judge is the foundation of the present claim by the plaintiff, and as I understand the relief [484] sought in his plaint and the scope of his suit, the only object he had in view was to get rid of that order. It is not denied by Mr. Conlan, on the contrary it is conceded, that if the plaintiff Angan Lal was separated from his brother as there seems to be no doubt, and if he had received a sum of money for his brother which he had not paid over, there was provision in the Civil Procedure Code under which the judgment-debtor might have realized that money from him. But he could not do so by a proceeding in which the plaintiff could not be a party, and the order made in regard to him was bad as being passed without jurisdiction.

The only way in which it is met by the respondent is, first, that this suit must be tried and disposed of on the ground that it is in effect nothing more or less than a suit under s. 283 of the Civil Procedure Code, brought by the plaintiff to get rid of the order of the 27th March, 1886, and as such, barred by one year's limitation. I dissent from that view. An essential condition precedent to the institution of a suit under that section is the making of an attachment of some immoveable property, of objection being taken to such attachment, of investigation being made into such objection in the manner provided in Chapter XIX of the Civil Procedure Code, and lastly, of its being allowed or disallowed, with the consequential right of the party damnified to bring a suit within a certain period of time. In the present case there has been no attachment, there has been no investigation of any objections in the sense of the chapter to which I have referred, and there has been no disallowance of those objections. This seems to me to answer the first objection of the defendants respondents.

The second objection taken by the respondents is this:—These proceedings of the Subordinate Judge must be regarded as held under s. 244 of the Civil Procedure Code, and so no separate suit lies. But as I have already remarked, the Subordinate Judge never tried the action upon the footing of the present plaintiff being the legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor within the meaning of s. 244. On the contrary, he dealt with him throughout in a totally different character. Mr. Conlan has called our attention to a ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Mirza Mahomed Aga Ali Khan Bahadoor v. The widow of [485] Balmakund, (1) and he has also referred us to a ruling in the case of Syed Nadir Hossein v. Bissen Chand Bassarat (2). Both those cases are very opposite to the matter before us. The ruling of the Privy Council seems to me directly in point, and if I understand it aright, it lays down the principle, which, if adopted, would have warranted the present respondent in attaching the alleged sum of money in the hands of the plaintiff as being due to the estate of the deceased Ajudhia Prasad in the ordinary manner provided by the law. That procedure might have resulted in objection being taken by the present plaintiff, and the ordinary machinery would then have been followed. But the respondents did not think proper to adopt that course. They sought through the machinery of the execution department, by a wholly erroneous proceeding, to enforce payment by the appellant of a sum due to the judgment-debtor, and as their proceeding was not only irregular but illegal, the order of the Subordinate Judge cannot possibly be sustained. Under these circumstances this appeal should be decreed, and the plaintiff should obtain a decree declaring that the Subordinate Judge's order of the 27th March, 1886, is of no effect so far as it professes to give execution of the decree of the 23rd July, 1878, against the plaintiff-appellant Angan Lal. The plaintiff will be entitled to his costs in all the Courts.

MAHMOOD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Straight and Mr. Justice Tyrrell.

GHANDHARAP SINGH AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. LACHMAN SINGH
AND OTHERS (Defendants).* [4th May, 1888.]

Hindu widow—Adverse possession against widow—Reversioners—Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act), sch. ii, Nos. 141, 144.

The plaintiffs sued for possession of certain zamindari property as reversioners to the estate of one C, their right to sue having accrued as alleged on the death of the widow of C, which took place on 14th October, 1884. The defendant, alleging himself to be the adopted son of C, and being in possession of the property in dispute since the death of C, which happened in 1869, contended that the claim was barred. The Court of first instance dismissed the claim as barred by art. 118 of the Limitation Act, and in appeal the District Judge held the claim was barred by defendants' adverse possession over the property for more than twelve years. On second appeal it was contended that the suit being by a Hindu entitled to possession as a reversioner on the death of a female, was governed by art. 141 of the Act and therefore not barred. Held, that as on the facts found the adopted son held adversely to the widow, adverse possession which barred the widow barred also the reversioners and therefore the claim was barred. The Shiva Ganga Case (1) was referred to.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument, Raj Bahadoor Singh v. Achambit Lal (2), Jagadamba Chowdhurani v. Dakina Mohun (3), Rajendronath Holder v. Jogendro Nath Banerjee (4).

THIS was a suit for possession of shares in certain zamindari property. There were four brothers, Pertab Singh, Jawahir Singh, Adhar Singh, and Bhup Singh. Pertab Singh adopted Mannu Singh, a son of Jawahir Singh, and Bhup Singh adopted Chittar Singh a son of Adhar Singh. On the death of Bhup Singh, the names of his widow Paran Kuar and his adopted son Chittar Singh, were recorded, each in respect of one anna share in the zamindari property left by him.

Chittar Singh died in 1869, leaving a widow, Dulari Kuar, and her name was entered in respect of the aforesaid one anna share of Chittar Singh and also of a two anna share in other zamindari purchased by Chittar Singh. Dulari Kuar died on 14th October, 1884, and the plaintiffs in the suit, who are some of the descendants of Mannu Singh and sons and grandsons of Jawahir Singh, applied to the Revenue Court for entry of their names in respect of the property that stood in her name; but on the objection of one Lachman Singh, son of Nokhi Singh and grandson of Adhar Singh, that he was the adopted son of Chittar Singh, they were referred to the Civil Court to establish their right to inherit the estate of Chittar Singh and hence the suit. Paran Kuar admitted that Lachman Singh had been adopted by Chittar Singh.

Lachman Singh contended that the claim for declaration that his adoption never took place was barred by the six years' rule of limitation; that he had been in adverse possession for more than twelve years, and that he was duly adopted by Chittar Singh as his son.

The plaintiffs had stated in their plaint that the alleged adoption of Lachman Singh had become known to them prior to the [487] year 1873, when partition proceedings were pending in the Revenue Court for partition and division of the family zamindari villages to which Lachman Singh was a party, and which ended in the direction by the Revenue Court that the parties should first settle the question of their respective rights by an adjudication of the Civil Court.

The Subordinate Judge being of opinion that the suit was practically one for declaration that the adoption never took place, held that it was barred by six years' rule of limitation. He also found that Lachman Singh was the legal heir of Chittar Singh, and had been in adverse possession of the property in suit for more than twelve years since the death of Chittar Singh. The suit was accordingly dismissed.

In appeal the District Judge held that the suit being for recovery of possession of immoveable property, was governed by the longer period of limitation viz, that of twelve years, and finding then, that Lachman Singh had been in adverse possession for more than twelve years dismissed the appeal. On second appeal it was contended that the suit being of the nature prescribed in art. 141 of the Limitation Act, was instituted within the time allowed by law.

Mr. G. E. Ross, Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath and Pandit Moti Lal, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—The suit to which this appeal relates is one which on the face of it professes to be brought by the reversioners of the estate of one Chittar Singh, their right to maintain their present claim having, it is alleged, opened up to them upon the death of one Musammat Dulari, who departed this life upon the 14th October, 1884. The case for the defendant was that Chittar Singh, prior to his death in 1869, had adopted the defendant Lachman Singh as his son, and that upon his death Lachman Singh entered into possession and enjoyment of his property, to which the suit related, to the exclusion of his adoptive mother Dulari-Kuar, who never held possession of it as an estate of the widow of a separated childless Hindu. In other words, what the [488] defendants asserted was that from the date of the death of Chittar Singh, his adopted son, the defendant Lachman Singh took and held possession of the property left by him adversely to Dulari Kuar. Supposing that Musammat Dulari had taken the estate of the widow of a deceased childless Hindu, and nothing had intervened to disturb her possession of that estate of the kind I shall presently refer to, the plaintiffs would, no doubt, have been entitled to come into Court with their suit, and it would have been governed by art. 141 of the Limitation Law. But it has been conceded by Mr. Colvin, and I think rightly, that if the defendant Lachman Singh had obtained and held adverse possession as against the widow for more than 12 years prior to the date of the institution of the suit, that adverse possession as against her is good as against the reversioners; and as authority for that position I have only to refer to the well-known declaration of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the Shiva Gunga

Case. (1) Reference has been made in the course of the argument to three cases. One of those was the case of Raj Bahadoor Singh v. Achumbit Lal (2), another was the case of Jagadamba Chowdhrani v. Dakhina Mohun (3), and the last is the case of Rajendro Nath Holder v. Jogendro Nath Bonerjee (4).

Now as to the first of those cases, the remarks of their Lordships in the second of them, namely the case of Jagadamba Chowdhrani v. Dakhina Mohun (3), explain what the nature of that suit was, and they indicate in unmistakeable language what meaning is to be attached to a particular passage used in the judgment about which misconception had arisen. In that case all that their Lordships did decide was that under the old Limitation Act, IX of 1871, art. 129, upon a particular state of facts, that article applied, and they specifically say in the course of their judgment that they do not profess to decide whether "the articles of the new law, Act XV of 1877, namely, arts. 118 and 119, denote a change of policy or how much change of law it affects, because those questions were not before their Lordships."

In the third case relied upon by Mr. Colvin, their Lordships of the Privy Council, upholding the decision of a lower appellate [489] Court upon a peculiar and special state of facts, in reference to that case held that no limitation article applied to bar that suit.

It is not necessary for me to decide here whether even if there had not been such a finding as has been recorded by the learned Judge in this case, and there were no materials to show that adverse possession of the estate of Chittar Singh had been obtained by the defendant, Lachman Singh, but it appeared that an adoption had been asserted at the death of Chittar Singh, two remedies might not have been open to the plaintiffs, that is to say, one of a purely declaratory kind, such as is covered by art. 118 of the Limitation Act, when such alleged adoption became known to the plaintiffs, or a suit in the present form on the death of the widow. I think there is much force in what was said by my brother Oldfield on this subject in the case of Basdeo v. Gopal (5), but the state of the findings by the learned Judge in this case render it unnecessary to consider this question, and they are as follows:—

"Plaintiffs had full notice in 1869 A. D. that Dulari made no claim to the estate; that she never asserted that the estate had at any time vested in her; on the contrary, she alleged that on the death of Chittar Singh, the estate vested in a son adopted by him in his life-time, and that she was only managing during the minority of the adopted son and for his benefit, he being in full possession by right of inheritance from his adoptive father."

That is a most specific and clear finding to this effect, that upon the death of Chittar Singh, Lachman Singh was by the direct act of the widow notified to every body, as a person who was the adopted son of her deceased husband, Chittar Singh himself; that he was in possession, not as the son adopted by her in pursuance of any authority conferred on her by her husband, whom she had put into possession, but by direct inheritance from Chittar Singh. It seems to me that the learned Judge having found those facts was distinctly right in saying that there was on the part of the minor Lachman Singh, now major defendant, clear evidence of adverse possession to the widow and to any other person, who had any claim or interest, under or through her, in the property, which has continued down to the present time, and which was obviously for a much longer period than twelve years.

[490] That being so, although Mr. Colvin has addressed us very ably in regard to the findings of fact of the learned Judge, I am of opinion that we cannot go behind those findings, and that upon them the learned Judge has properly held that the suit of the plaintiffs not having been brought within twelve years from the date when the defendant first obtained adverse possession, it must be dismissed, Lachman Singh having acquired a good prescriptive title thereby. I therefore dismiss the appeal with costs.

RAM LAL AND ANOTHER (Defendants) v. DEBI DAT AND ANOTHER

Hindu Law—Joint Hindu family—Evidence of separation—Definement of shares in ancestral property.

A four anna ancestral share in a zamindari village was owned by two brothers, in which the share of H, son of one of the brothers, was one-half, the remaining half being the share of the plaintiffs the descendants of the other brother. In the village records there has been a definement of shares followed by entries of separate interests in the revenue records, and since 1264 fasli the two plaintiffs have each been recorded as the owner of a one anna share and H of a two anna share thereof. The entire four anna share has been in the possession of mortgagees from the year 1844, excepting the sir lands of which H held separately his own share, viz., 10 bighas. On the 7th July, 1883, H executed a deed of a gift of his two anna share in favor of the defendants, and caused mutation of names to be made in their favor surrendering to them at the same time possession of the sir land. H died on the 21st January, 1884, leaving neither son, widow nor daughter, and the plaintiffs were his heirs at law. They brought this suit to set aside the deed of gift and for possession of the sir land from the defendants. The suit was dismissed by the Court of first instance, and in appeal the District Judge affirmed the decree, holding that the four anna share was not joint and undivided property between the co-sharers, and that H was in separate possession of the two anna share of which the defendants were the donees. On second appeal it was contended, that in as much as since 1844 there could have been no separate enjoyment of the four annas which was in the possession of the mortgagees, the evidence afforded by separate registration could not prove actual separation. Ambika Dat v. Sukhmani Kuar (1) was cited in support of the contention.

Held, that from evidence of definement of shares followed by entries of separate interests in the revenue records, if there be nothing to explain it, separation as to estate may be inferred. Joint family property in the hands of mortgagees may be separated in estate, although there could be no separate enjoyment of the shares so separated.

THE following genealogical table explains the relationship of the plaintiffs in this case with Hazari Lal, deceased, whose estate was the subject-matter of dispute:—

Sheo Dat and Girdhari Lal owned a four anna share in a village called Takha. Hazari Lal's share in this four anna estate was one half, the remaining half being the share of the plaintiffs.

On the 7th July, 1883, Hazari Lal executed a deed of gift of his share in favour of the defendants in this case. At this time the four anna share, but not the sir land belonging thereto, was in the possession of mortgagees, and had been so since 1844. Hazari Lal caused mutation of names to be recorded in favour of the defendants, surrendered possession of his sir-land, and died on the 21st January, 1884, leaving neither son, widow nor daughter. The plaintiffs were therefore his heirs under Hindu law. They brought this suit to cancel the deed of gift mentioned above, and for possession of the sir-land, 9 bighas odd. They alleged, amongst other things, that the four anna share was joint undivided property; that Hazari Lal lived in union with them; and that therefore the alienation was void under Hindu law. The defendants traversed all these allegations.

The Court of first instance dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs appealed to the District Judge. The District Judge dismissed the appeal. The first issue which he framed for determination was "whether Hazari Lal, at the time of the execution of the deed of gift, was in the separate possession of his share of the ancestral property." On this issue the Judge found as follows:—"In Appovier v. Ramasubha Aiyar (1), their Lordships of the Privy Council have ruled that when the members of an undivided family agree among themselves with regard to particular property that it [492] shall thenceforth be the subject of ownership in certain defined shares, then the character of undivided property and joint enjoyment is taken away from the subject-matter so agreed to be dealt with; and in the estate each member has thenceforth a certain and definite share, which he may claim the right to receive and to enjoy in severalty, although the property itself has not been actually severed and divided, "division" having a twofold meaning, division of right, and division of property. In Adi Deo Narain Singh (2) it was held that the plain principle deducible from the above ruling is, that in order to show separation it is not necessary to establish a partition of the joint estate into separate shares or holdings; it is enough that there has been ascertainment and definition of the extent of right and interest of the several co-sharers in the whole, and of the proportion of participation each of them is to have in the income derived from the property, to effect a severance and destruction of the joint tenancy so to speak, and to convert it into a tenancy in common.

(1) 11 M. I. A. 75.

(2) 5 A. 532.

" In this case it is clear from the copies of village-record filed that there has been a definement of shares followed by entries of separate interests in the revenue-records. Since 1264 fasli Kali Charan has been recorded as the owner of a one anna share, Ram Lal of a one anna share, and Hazari Lal of a two annas share, the jama payable by each being separately recorded, Kali Charan being the lambardar of the four annas share.

" The fact that there was a definement of shares between Kali Charan, Ram Lal, and Hazari Lal, followed by entries of separate interests in the revenue-records of the village, goes far towards proving separation of title and interests, but does not necessarily amount to such separation. It must be shown that there was an unmistakable intention on the part of the share-holders to separate their interests, and that the intention was carried into effect. (1 A. 437.)*

" The oral evidence is, as usual, conflicting; the statement of the plaintiffs' witnesses that Hazari Lal and his cousin Kali Charan and nephew Ram Lal lived in commensality, and were joint owners of the undivided four annas share, and sir-lands being contradicted by the defendants' witnesses. It appears to me, however, to be [493] proved that Hazari Lal lived latterly in mouza Takha; that he died in the defendants' house in that village; that the funeral obsequies (kirya karam) were performed by the defendants: and that the plaintiffs lived in mauza Bhadi.

" The whole of the four anna share it seems has been for very many years in the possession of a mortgagee. The sir-lands, 20 bighas, were however, not mortgaged.

" The witnesses for the plaintiffs say that the sir-lands were jointly cultivated, partly home cultivation, and partly through shikmis. On the other hand, the witnesses for the defendants say that Hazari Lal held separately his own share of the sir-lands, the bighas 10 in suit. The Judge then referred to the oral and documentary evidence, and continued as follows:—

" It is urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that the four annas share was jointly mortgaged to Bhagwan Das, and that therefore the joint undivided nature of the property is thereby proved. The debt, however, which led to the mortgage was an old ancestral one, and as pointed out by the lower Court, the fact that the creditor took a joint mortgage of their property from the representatives of the original debtor or debtors does not per se prove that the property mortgaged was a joint and undivided one.

" Considering that the recorded definement of shares was accompanied by a separation and division of the sir-lands, as is proved by the revenue-records of 1264 and 1272 fasli; that Hazari Lal for some years before his death lived with the defendants in Takha, and not with the plaintiffs in Bhadi; that as stated by one of the plaintiffs' own witnesses he had ceased communicating with the plaintiffs two years prior to his death; that he died in Takha apart from the plaintiffs and that the "kirya karam" or funeral obsequies were not performed by the plaintiffs, I must hold that the decision of the lower Courts correct, that the four annas share was not joint and undivided property, and that Hazari Lal was in separate possession of the two annas share which was given by him to the defendants. The plaintiffs, his nephews, by Hindu law cannot therefore impeach the alienation, the property alienated being held in severalty."

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and TYRRELL, J.—This was an appeal from the decree of the District Judge of Jaunpur, who held on appeal that there had been separation in fact in this Hindu family. The defendants were grantees from one Hazari Lal. If there had not been a separation, the plaintiffs would be entitled to a decree. If there had been separation the gift to the defendants was unimpeachable. The Judge of Jaunpur appears to me to have correctly apprehended the law as to separation and to the inferences which may be drawn as to separation. The property in dispute was a two annas share out of a four annas share in the village. The four annas share had been since 1844 in the hands of mortgagees, who had held it under a zarpeshgi lease, which had been renewed from time to time. The last lease was granted on the 23rd July, 1871. We are informed that in consideration of such renewals further sums were borrowed. It has been contended before us that inasmuch as there could have been since 1844 no separate enjoyment of the four annas share of the mortgaged property, the evidence afforded by the separate registration could not prove actual separation. I may mention that there was the evidence of Hazari Lal, who said he had separated; that evidence, if believed, would be sufficient.

The point which has been pressed on us was based on a judgment of this Court in the case of Ambika Dat v. Sukhmani Kuar (1). Mr. Justice Turner in delivering the judgment of the Court said:—"The fact that there was a definement of shares followed by entries of separate interests in the revenue-records in some estate only is an important piece of evidence towards proving separation of title and interests, but it will not necessarily amount to such separation; it must be shown that there was an unmistakable intention on the part of the share-holders to separate their interests, and that the intention was carried into effect. The best evidence is separate enjoyment of profits and dealings with the property." It has been assumed in the argument on behalf of the [495] appellants that the meaning of that judgment is that in no case can separation be found unless there is evidence of a separate enjoyment of profits. We do not think that is the meaning of the judgment. In fact, in the passage quoted, the learned Judges say: "a definement of the shares followed by entries of separate interests in the revenue-records in some estate only is an important piece of evidence towards proving separation." From evidence of that kind, in our judgment, if there is nothing to explain it, separation as to the estate in respect of which there has been a definement of shares followed by entries of separate interests in the revenue records may be inferred. If the case now before us had been before those learned Judges, they would probably have so worded their judgment that no one might infer that in all cases proof of separate enjoyment of profits was absolutely necessary. To hold that there could be no separation proved in the case of property in the hands of mortgagees unless proof could be given of separate enjoyment, would be to hold that a joint family whose sole property was in the hands of mortgagees could not, during the currency of the mortgage, effect or prove separation. We think that the learned Judges in the case to which we have referred were only dealing with the case before them, and did not intend to lay down rules of universal and exclusive application. This is a second appeal. The Judge in our opinion has shown by his judgment that he perfectly understood the law. There was documentary and oral evidence before him to prove the separation, and we cannot in second appeal question the findings of fact: we dismiss the appeal with costs.

Hindu [widow—Gift of immoveable property by husband—Life interest—Heritable interest—Alienable interest—Appeal—Practice—Change of pleading in appeal.

The plaintiff, alleging himself to be joint in estate with A, his grand-uncle, sued to set aside an absolute gift of the house in suit made by A in favor of his wife, as also the subsequent sale of the house by the wife to the defendant. The lower appellate Court, finding that A was separate in estate from plaintiff and the sole and exclusive [496] owner of the house, held the gift to the wife and the sale by her to defendant valid and dismissed the suit. On appeal to this Court plaintiff contended that he was the heir of the donee and that under the deed of gift she had no power to alienate.

Held, that the case put forward in second appeal being totally different from that which was originally put forward and tried, the appeal should be dismissed.

Held further that from the wording of the deed of gift it appeared that the husband intended to give and did give to his wife an heritable estate in and power of alienation over the property the subject of the gift and therefore the sale by the wife was valid.

Aman Singh, a Hindu, made an absolute gift of a house of which he was the owner to his wife Ramo. In the deed he said:—“I, my issues, relations, shall have no claim in respect of the house against the donee or her heirs, and if any of my heirs does so the claim shall be false.” Upon the death of Aman Singh, his widow, on the 24th December, 1885, sold the house to the defendant Mahin Lal. Plaintiff as grand-nephew of Aman Singh, alleging himself to be joint in estate with him, instituted the suit to set aside the gift made by him to his wife and also to eject the defendant purchaser from the widow from the house.

The Munsif, holding that Aman Singh was competent to make a valid gift of the house to his wife, observed that she had no larger power to alienate it than if she had inherited it from her husband, and decreed that the gift to the wife and the sale by her were only valid during her lifetime and would not affect the reversionary rights of the plaintiff.

On appeal the learned Subordinate Judge found that Aman Singh was separate in estate from plaintiff and the sole and exclusive owner of the house in dispute, and therefore had a perfect right to make an absolute gift to his wife, which he did, and that his wife was free to exercise her uncontrolled power of alienation over the property in dispute. He therefore dismissed the suit.

On second appeal it was contended that it has not been shown that the house in dispute was the wife's stridhan, and that even then she could not absolutely alienate it.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—In this case the plaintiff brought his action to set aside a deed of gift and a deed of sale. The deed of gift was made by the husband of Musammam Ramo in her favour. It was a gift of immoveable property. But the plaintiff alleged as the foundation of his case that the property was the joint family property of her husband and himself or his predecessors, and he claimed to have the deed of gift avoided on the ground that, under the circumstances, the donor could not give the property in question to his wife. He also asked to get possession of the property.

Now it has been found that the property in question was not joint family property, and that it was in fact separate property of the husband. Under the circumstances, the plaintiff failed to prove the case on which he came into Court. He, however, comes here in second appeal, alleging that he is the heir of the donee, and that she had, under the deed of gift, no right of alienation. It is needless to observe that this is a totally different case from the case that he originally made. It involves different considerations of facts and of law. In the case as now put forward questions would arise as to whether the plaintiff was in fact the heir of the donee or whether he was the heir of her husband. However, although I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed on the ground that it is a totally different case from the case which was put forward and tried, I think that even on the case as put before us the appeal ought to be dismissed.

I am of opinion that the donor intended to give and did give an heritable estate and power of alienation to the donee by the deed of gift. He says:—"I, my issues, relations, shall have no claim in respect of the house against the donee or her heirs, and if any of my heirs does so the claim shall be false."

It appears to me that his intention was that he, the donor, should not, nor should any heirs of his, interfere with the enjoyment and disposal of the property the subject of the gift. Jackson, J., in delivering judgment in the case of Kunjabehari Dhur v. Premchand Dutt (1), said as follows:—

"We understand it to be a rule of law, well established in this Court, that a Hindu wife takes, by a will of her husband, no more [498] absolute right over the property bequeathed than she would take over such property if conferred upon her by gift during the lifetime of her husband; and that, whether in respect of a gift or a will, it would be necessary for the husband to give her in express terms a heritable right, or power of alienation."

The ruling recognises the conclusion that if the power of alienation is given, the power can be exercised, and it also is consistent with the rule of law laid down in paragraph 571 of Mayne's Hindu Law, 3rd. ed., where the author says :—

"Immoveable property, when given by a husband to his wife, is never at her disposal, even after his death. It is her stridhanum, so far that it passes to her heirs, not to his heirs. But as regards her power of alienation, she appears to be under the same restrictions as those which apply to property which she has inherited from a male. Of course it is different if the gift is coupled with an express power of alienation."

I have said that if the power of alienation is given to the wife by the husband in any portion of his separate property, it follows that she has the power to alienate it.

Under the circumstances, I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

TYRRELL, J.—I concur.

RAMPHAL RAI AND OTHERS (Defendants) v. RAGHUNANDAN PRASAD (Plaintiff).* [14th May, 1888.]

Public thoroughfare—Obstruction—Right to sue—Special damage—Lease—Right lessee to sue—Trespass.

The plaintiff, a holder of a ten years' lease of the share and rights of one of the co-sharers of a village, sued for the demolition of certain buildings and constructions on a plot of land within the area of the village, on the ground that the public have been very much inconvenienced in going to and coming from the road and in taking carts, carriages, cattle, &c., and that he by reason of his own inconvenience, and also as lessee in possession of the entire rights of his lessor, has legally and justly a right to bring [499] the action. The findings of fact were, that by the terms of the lease plaintiff was entitled to maintain the action as representing the zemindari rights of his lessor; that the obstructions complained of existed when the lease was granted; that the roadway mentioned in the plaint was one used by the public in general as a foot-path and also for vehicles, and that the buildings complained of have encroached on the road. The suit was dismissed by the first Court, but decreed in appeal by the lower appellate Court. Held, that in the absence of damage over and above that which is common with the rest of the public the plaintiff has sustained, his action must fail. Public nuisance is actionable only at the suit of a party who has sustained special damage, and the case-law of British India in this respect is the same as the rule of English law on the subject. Further, that the lease to plaintiff failed to show either that the land upon which the defendant has built is included in the lease, or that it intended to confer upon the plaintiff any right to question the legality of the erections existing at the time of the lease.

MAHMOOD, J.—This case originally came on for hearing before me sitting as a single Judge for the disposal of second appeals, and by my order of the 21st April, 1887, I referred the case, for the reasons stated in that order, to a Division Bench consisting of two Judges. The case was accordingly heard by my brother STRAIGHT and myself, and by his order of the 23rd December, 1887, in which I concurred, my learned brother remanded the case, under s. 566 of the Civil Procedure Code, for the trial of certain issues stated in that order. The order also sets forth the twofold aspects in which the case was presented to us by the argument for the parties on that occasion. The plaintiff is the holder of a ten years' lease from the Maharaja of Dumraon, who is a co-sharer of the village along with defendant No. 3. The lease is a thika lease of the zemindari rights of the Maharaja, and it was executed on the 24th January, 1885, conferring upon the plaintiff the right of possession and management of the zemindari share, subject to certain conditions and stipulations which need not be mentioned in detail for the purposes of this case. The cause of action for this suit is stated in the plaint to have arisen on the 6th June, 1883, when the defendant is alleged to have built certain constructions upon a plot of land, No. 788, which is included within the area of the village, [500] and is stated to be a thoroughfare used by the plaintiff as well as by the public.

The present suit was instituted on the 12th August, 1885, and the case of the plaintiff can best be set forth by quoting from the plaint itself. His case is :—"That by reason of building the house, placing a trough, manger, wood, &c., and tying cattle, the width of the passage, which was ten lathas, is now left only eight lathas: that the public are very much inconvenienced in going to and coming from the road and in taking carts, carriages, cattle, &c.: that the plaintiff by reason of his own inconvenience, also as the lessee in possession of the whole right in the zamindari share of the Maharaja of Dumraon, has legally and justly a right to bring this action." And upon these grounds the plaintiff prayed for the following reliefs:—

"That the house in dispute, the trough, the manger, the wood, &c., built, erected, and placed by the defendants on 1 biswa 18 dhurs of land (bounded as below), part of the passage site No. 788, valued at Rs. 10, be demolished, pulled down, and removed, and the passage site be levelled and restored to its original state and condition; that the defendants be prevented, in future, from making any appropriation for their own use or doing any act injurious to the convenience of the public;" and the plaint ended up by praying "that any other relief which may be just and proper be also granted."

It is clear from this, as was pointed out by my brother Straight in his remand order of the 23rd December, 1887, that the suit has a double aspect; one being that of an action for an injunction to remove a nuisance caused by the obstruction which the defendant's building upon the land has created, and the other aspect being that of an action in trespass founded upon the plaintiff's alleged right as lessee to possession of the land upon which the erections have been made. The suit was resisted in both its aspects.

So far as the first aspect is concerned, the defendant pleaded that the plot of land being a public thoroughfare and no special damage or injury having been alleged by the plaintiff in consequence of the alleged obstruction, the plaintiff could not maintain the suit, the alleged wrong to a right possessed by the plaintiff in common with [501] the public not being available to him as a sufficient foundation for such an action. Then as to the second aspect of the plaintiff's case, the main defence was that the plaintiff, as a mere lessee, had no locus standi to maintain such an action, and that the defendant had been in possession of the land for more than the prescriptive period of twelve years, and the suit was therefore barred by limitation. Further, in respect of both the aspects of the case, the effect of the defence was that the land upon which the defendant had built did not form part of the thoroughfare; that the road had not been narrowed so as to put any one to inconvenience, and that the land on which the defendant had built had from ancient times been in his possession and he had a right to build thereon.

The first Court dismissed the suit, but that decree has been reversed by the lower appellate Court mainly upon the ground "that the constructions have not been in existence for more than twelve years;" "that the houses are new and have been built without the permission and consent of the zemindar;" that the plaintiff could maintain the action "as the representative of the zemindar;" that "it is proved by the evidence that the passage is narrower than before, since formerly three carts used to pass through it, now only one cart can pass, and therefore, if another cart comes from the other direction, inconvenience will surely occur."

In pursuance of my brother Straight's remand order of the 23rd December, 1887, the findings of the lower appellate Court in effect are that the terms of the thika lease of the 24th January, 1885, entitled the plaintiff to maintain such an action as representing the zemindari rights of his lessor; that the obstruction or constructions complained of by the plaintiff were erected antecedent to the lease and were in existence at the time when that lease was executed; that "the way referred to by the plaintiff in his plaint is a roadway used by the public in general on foot and with vehicles;" that the house and other buildings have encroached upon the road, and "for this reason the plaintiff complains in his petition of plaint that, besides the injury caused to the public who use this way, the plaintiff's passage along the road and that of his carts, cattle, &c., has been obstructed."

These findings have not been contested by either party under s. 567 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and taking all the findings [502] of fact upon which the lower appellate Court has proceeded, I shall deal with the case upon pure questions of law in the two aspects of the suit stated in my brother Straight's order of remand.

First, then, as to the question whether the plaintiff could, upon the allegations contained in the plaint, maintain this action for removal of an alleged obstruction erected upon land which has been found to form part of a public thoroughfare. For the purpose of deciding this part of the case it is not necessary to consider the plaintiff's right as lessee under the thika lease of the 24th January, 1885, for he to that extent comes into Court as one of the public entitled to use the thoroughfare. It is a settled proposition of the English law of torts that obstructions in a public thoroughfare are not actionable as creating a civil liability, unless some particular or special damage or injury is proved to have resulted to the individual person or the determinate body of persons maintaining the action. Such obstructions, being in a public thoroughfare, are classed as public nuisances, falling under the same category as many other kinds of public nuisances which need not be referred to for the purposes of this case. But the principles upon which the English law of tort proceeds in respect of all the multifarious classes of public nuisances are identical, and those principles do not so much relate to the right as to the form of the remedy. In England and also in America the erection of obstructions in a public thoroughfare are indictable offences under the criminal law; and our own Indian Penal Code, in following the same principles, has virtually defined a public nuisance in s. 268, and has rendered the same punishable as a criminal offence. The Criminal Procedure Code also makes provision for summary proceedings by Magistrates to stop such nuisances. But upon the question whether such public nuisances are in themselves sufficient to sustain a civil action, the statute law, so far as I am aware, is totally silent, and it therefore devolves upon Judges sitting in British India virtually to legislate, by judicial exposition, for the people of the country, under the authority of the somewhat indefinite rule of justice, equity and good conscience, which has to be administered, in the absence of any legislative directions, by the Courts of Justice in British India. Such is virtually the effect of the present state of the law of tort in British India, resulting as [503] might well be expected, in a vast conflict of decision on various questions of civil liability ex delicto. The practice of the Courts in British India, the highest of which have been presided over by English lawyers, has, however, been to fall back upon the analogies of the English law, and to take it in all cases to be a good guide for applying the rule of justice, equity, and good conscience. This method has, in the absence of any definite rules of law governing actions ex delicto or other classes of litigation, been approved by the Lords of the Privy Council, and probably the latest dictum of their Lordships is contained in Waghela Rajsanji v. Masludin (1), where, however, their Lordships qualify their observations by indicating that the English law is not to be imported wholesale into India, regardless of the conditions of the people and the country.

Fortunately, upon the exact question now before me, the case-law of British India is decisive, and is the same as the rule of the English law of torts.

The principal authorities of the English law, in their application to Indian cases, were well considered by Westropp, C.J., in Satku v. Ibrahim Aga (2), and it was there laid down that the plaintiffs could not maintain a civil suit in respect of an obstruction in a public thoroughfare, unless they could prove some particular damage to themselves personally in addition to the general inconvenience occasioned to the public. The rule so laid down followed many Indian cases upon which the learned Chief Justice relied, and although in that case the obstruction complained of was not of such a permanent character as a building, I hold that the same principle, so far as it requires proof of particular or special damage, is applicable to this case: and in this view I am supported by the ruling of this Court in Karim Baksh v. Budha (3), where the obstruction complained of consisted of the erection of a chabutra which encroached upon a public thoroughfare, and the relief prayed for was the removal of a portion of the chabutra, the plaintiffs alleging that the encroachment was such that carts and other wheeled conveyances were unable to pass along the road.

Such being the state of the case-law, I do not think the exigencies of this case either require me to enter into the juristic reasons [504] upon which this rule is supposed to proceed, or in the face of the authorities of Indian cases, to open at the question how far those reasons are adapted to the conditions of British India. I accept the authority of the case-law as it stands, and hold that no action of this kind is maintainable upon the ground that the defendant has erected obstructions in a public thoroughfare, thereby causing inconvenience to the plaintiff with the rest of the public, there being no allegation or proof of special or particular injury or damage having been sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of such obstructions.

(1) 14 I. A. 96.

(2) 2 B. 457.

(3) 1 A. 249.

As to the second aspect of the case, namely, so far as it can be regarded as an action for trespass, the contention of the parties raises two main questions:—

First, whether the plaintiff, as the lessee under the lease of the 24th January, 1835, is entitled to maintain the action for removal of constructions made upon the land antecedent to the lease and existing at the time when the plaintiff took the lease. Secondly, whether under the terms of of the lease itself the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action without joining his lessor, the Maharaja of Dumraon, and other co-sharers of the village as plaintiffs to the action.

Upon the first of these points, Mr. Spankie, in arguing the case on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent, has contended that the circumstances that the erections now complained of were constructed antecedent to the plaintiff's lease does not deprive him of the remedy prayed for by him, because, as the learned counsel argues, the trespass complained of in this case is of a continuing nature, and as such the continuance of the buildings on the land subsequent to the lease would amount to a sufficient cause of action available to the plaintiff for this suit. In support of this contention the learned counsel relies upon Holmes v. Wilson (1) and Bowyer v. Cook (2) the effect of which, as represented in Addison's work on Torts (5th ed., p. 50 and pp. 331-2), seems to be that in the case of continuing trespasses, such as trespass by erecting buildings, as a continuing injury, fresh cause of action arise for recovery of damages, and the author exemplifies this by saying that "if a man throws a heap of stones or builds a wall, or plants posts or [505] rails on his neighbour's land and there leaves them, an action will lie against him for the trespass and the right to sue will continue from day to-day till the incumbrance is removed" (p. 331). This no doubt is a correct enunciation of the English law upon the subject; though speaking for myself as an Indian Judge, I can scarcely regard the rule either as reasonable in itself or fit to be applied to cases in India, because the rule renders multiplicity of actions unavoidable, as pointed out by Mr. Mayne in his work on Damages (3rd ed., p. 89), and I agree with him in the view that "the fair rule in such a case would be to give the plaintiff such damages as would compensate him for the loss sustained up to the time of verdict and would pay him for putting the land into its original state."

I need not, however, consider this rule in this case, for here there is no claim for damages in consequence of the alleged continuing trespass. The form of the action, so far as it can be gathered from the plaint, no doubt alleges a trespass, and the substantial relief prayed for asks for an injunction to compel the plaintiff to demolish the erections which he has constructed, and to prohibit him from any future encroachment upon the land. The continuance of such erections may entitle the plaintiff to maintain a suit such as this for their removal, although such constructions were made antecedent to the lease. The right of the plaintiff, however, must be defined and circumscribed by the terms of the lease itself, which fail to show either that the land upon which the defendant has built is included in the lease, or that that document intended to confer upon the plaintiff any power to question the legality of erections which existed at the time of the lease, and for aught that appears to the contrary, the lease itself was given subject to the occupation of the land by existing buildings. Further, the case is bare of proof of the plaintiff's lessor, the Maharaja of Dumraon, ever being in occupation of the land or any specific portion thereof on which the erections have been constructed, and it follows a fortiori that the plaintiff himself, whose rights originated with the thika lease of the 24th January, 1885, could not have been in occupation of the land when the wrongful entry thereon, by the constructions of the 6th June, 1883, is alleged to have taken place. There is thus no proof of the plaintiff's possession being disturbed, [506] and so far as the nature of the action may be regarded as one of trespass quare clausum fregit as understood in the English law of torts, the suit cannot be sustained. Under the circumstances, the fact that the plaintiff's lessor, the Maharaja of Dumraon, and the other co-sharers of the zemindari rights of the village have not joined the action, ceases to be a matter of significance for the decision of this case, especially as there is nothing in the form of the action or the allegations contained in the plaint to justify the suit being regarded as one of ejectment.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the suit even in its second aspect fails, and that it was rightly dismissed by the first Court, though some of the reasons given for such dismissal may be unsound.

I would decree this appeal, and setting aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, restore that of the Court of first instance with costs in all the Courts.

STRAIGHT, J.—I concur in the judgment and conclusions of my brother Mahmood. Appeal decreed.

RAM CHAND (Judgment-debtor) v. PITAM MAL AND ANOTHER
(Decree-holder).* [29th May, 1888.]

Attachment before Judgment—Termination of attachment—Execution of decree—Sale in execution—Material irregularity in publishing or conducting sale without attachment—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 311, 483.

The plaintiff instituted a suit against defendant for recovery of money, and previous to judgment, that is, on the 8th of January, 1885, applied for, and on the 11th obtained, order for attachment of several houses and premises belonging to defendant and such attachment was made. The suit was dismissed, but eventually on appeal it was decreed: but the attachment was never withdrawn. Plaintiff then applied for execution of his decree and his application was granted by an order directing that the property of the judgment-debtor should be notified for sale on the 1st February, 1887, and accordingly on the 21st December, 1886, a sale notification was issued. Judgment-debtor twice applied for postponement of sale, but his applications were refused, and the sale took place on the date fixed. Judgment-debtor then objected to the confirmation of the sale urging that the property sold was never attached in execution of the decree and the attachment previous to judgment was infructuous because afterwards the claim was dismissed by the Court of first instance; that there had been several other irregularities [507] in publishing and conducting the sale; and that owing to the irregularities property had been sold at a grossly inadequate price causing substantial injury. The Subordinate Judge overruling the objections confirmed the sale. On appeal by the judgment-debtor, held, following Mahadeo Dubey v. Bholanath Dichit (1), that a regularly perfected attachment is an essential preliminary to sales in execution of decrees for money; and where there has been no such attachment, any sale that may have taken place is not simply voidable but de facto void, and may be set aside without any inquiry as to substantial injury being sustained by the judgment-debtor for want of a valid attachment, and that an attachment before judgment, like a temporary injunction, becomes functus officio as soon as the suit terminates. Further, that the phrase "a material irregularity in publishing or conducting" in the first paragraph of s. 311 of the Code of Civil Procedure should be liberally construed, and that absence of attachment of property at the time of sale thereof is "a material irregularity," attachment being the first step which a Court in executing a simple money decree has to take to assert its authority to bring property to compulsory sale.

The following cases were referred to in the course of argument.

JUDGMENT.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts of this case are the following:—On the 18th June, 1884, a suit was instituted by the present respondent, Pitam Mal, against the appellant, Ram Chand, for recovery of money, and during the pendency of that suit, on the 8th January, 1885, the aforesaid respondent applied, apparently within the meaning of s. 483 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for attachment of property belonging to the defendant. The application was granted on the same day, and attachment before judgment appears to have been made on the 11th January, 1885. It is not clear whether the requirements of s. 484 or s. 485 of the Code were duly observed. The suit, however, was dismissed by the first Court [508] on the 30th March, 1885; but there seems to have been no specific order made by that Court withdrawing the attachment.

The decree of the 30th March, 1885, was however appealed to this Court, and the appeal resulted in decretal of the plaintiff Pitam Mal's suit on the 2nd February, 1886.

It was in execution of this last decree that this litigation was commenced by an application of the decree-holder, Pitam Mal, to execute the decree. The application was made on the 13th November, 1886, and on the 18th December, 1886, the application was granted by an order which directed that the property of the judgment-debtor should be notified for sale on the 1st February, 1887. Accordingly, on the 21st December, 1886, a sale notification was issued; and the judgment-debtor, Ram Chand, by two applications, one made on the 25th January, 1887, and the other on the 31st January, 1887, prayed for postponement of the sale, apparently under the provisions of s. 305 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Both these applications were, however, disallowed, and the sale of the judgment-debtor's property took place on the 1st February, 1887, at which sale the properties were purchased as follows :—

1. One kothi with shops in Mathra, purchased by Pitam Mal, decree-holder, for Rs. 3,350.
2. One kutchah shop in Mathra, purchased by Pitam Mal, decree-holder, for Rs. 110.
3. One pukka and stone-built stable in Mathra, purchased by Panna Lal, for Rs. 110.
4. One-fourth of a pukka and stone-built building in Mathra, purchased by Pitam Mal, for Rs. 135.

It will appear from the above specification that, with the exception of property No. 3, all the other properties were purchased by Pitam Mal (decree-holder) himself, and the connection of Panna Lal with this litigation seems to be due entirely to his purchase of the property No. 3 above-mentioned.

On the 24th February, 1887, the judgment-debtor, Ram Chand, appellant, preferred objections to the auction-sale of the 1st February, 1887, upon various grounds mentioned in the judgment of the [509] Court below, and that application was resisted by Pitam Mal, the decree-holder, upon pleas which are also stated in the judgment of the lower Court, and need not be repeated here.

The judgment-debtor Ram Chand's objections appear to have been made with the object of setting aside the auction-sale of 1st February, 1887, upon grounds contemplated by s. 311 of the Civil Procedure Code; but those objections have been disallowed by the lower Court, which has held that the attachment before judgment was a sufficient attachment, because although the suit, during the pendency whereof the attachment was made ended in dismissal, the attachment itself had never been withdrawn; that the sale-notification having been affixed to the door of the Court-house, it was not shown that the sale had taken place within thirty days of the issue of the sale-notification; that a proclamation by beat of drum was duly made and the "notifications were duly issued and affixed at the locality of the property;" that "the law does not require any proclamation to be made by beat of drum at the time of sale; and that there was actually made a proclamation at time of the sale of the property in suit such as is generally made at such times by amins conducting sales;" that when a time for sale is specified in a notification, "it is not thereby intended that the sale must begin exactly at the same time and on the same day as mentioned in the notification." Finally, the lower Court has held that "no irregularity having been made in the issue of notification and conducting the sale, no finding need be made as to the point whether or not the property in suit has been sold for an inadequate price;" but to this view of the law the learned Subordinate Judge adds the following observation:—"However, as regards the question of the inadequacy of price, I hold that the alleged rate is not proved by any oral or documentary, reliable or trustworthy evidence". The effect of the learned Subordinate Judge's judgment is to confirm the sale of the 1st February, 1887, and the order must be understood to have been passed under s. 312 of the Code of Civil Procedure, disallowing the objections raised by the judgment-debtor, Ram Chand, appellant. It has been argued by the learned Pandit, on behalf of the respondent, that the order of the lower Court, so far as it disallowed objections to the sale, is not appealable within the meaning [510] of cl. (16), of s. 588 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but this contention is opposed to the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Tota Ram v. Khub Chand (1) where I stated my reasons for holding that such orders are appealable. To the reasons I then stated I have nothing to add, beyond saying that in this case the order of the lower Court disallowing the objections of the judgment-debtor to the auction-sale of the 1st February, 1887, and confirming that sale is one and the same order, and, as such, appealable under cl. (16) of s. 588 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The rest of the argument addressed to us on behalf of the parties, however, raises the following questions for determination:—

(1) Whether an attachment before judgment, such as the attachment of the 11th January, 1885, was not good and valid attachment for purposes of the execution of the High Court's decree of the 2nd February, 1886, notwithstanding the dismissal of the suit by the first Court on the 30th March, 1885?

(2) If not, whether the absence of a valid attachment at the time of sale of the 1st February, 1887, can be regarded as "a material irregularity in publishing or conducting" the sale so as to be questioned under s. 311 of the Code?

(3) If so, whether the action of the judgment-debtor in making the applications of the 25th January, 1887, and 31st January, 1887, praying for postponement of the sale, amounts to a waiver on his part of any irregularities so as to preclude him from contesting the sale upon the ground that there was no valid attachment?

(4) If so, whether such irregularity would in itself be sufficient to vitiate the sale without proof of "substantial injury" within the meaning of that section?

(5) Whether in this case any such "substantial injury" is proved as is contemplated by s. 311 of the Code?

As to the first of these questions, it is necessary to premise that we cannot go behind the Full Bench judgment of this Court in Mahdeo Dubey v. Bhola Nath Dichit (2) where the whole Court unanimously adopted the view of my brother STRAIGHT that a regularly perfected attachment is an essential preliminary [511] to sales in execution of simple decrees for money; and where there had been no such attachment, any sale that may have taken place is not simply voidable but de facto void.

This being so, we have been referred by the learned Pandit to the provisions of ss. 483, 485, 488, and 490 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and also to the form No. 163 in schedule IV. of the Code relating to attachment before judgment of immoveable property, in which form the words "until the further order of this Court" occur; and relying upon these provisions, the learned pleader argues that inasmuch as in the present case no further order withdrawing the order of attachment before judgment was passed the attachment must be taken to have subsisted for all purposes of execution, including the sale of the 1st February, 1887. On the other hand, Mr. Colvin relies upon the last part of s. 488 to show that an attachment before judgment comes to an end "when the suit is dismissed;" and the learned counsel also lays stress upon the provisions of s. 490, and argues that the words of that section contemplate that it is only when a decree is given in favour of the plaintiff that re-attachment in execution of such decree is dispensed with, implying that such attachment is necessary where the suit ended in dismissal of the plaintiff's claim. For this contention the learned counsel also relies upon the ruling of the learned Chief Justice in Chunni Kuar v. Dwarka Prasad (1) where it was held that a temporary injunction under s. 492, notwithstanding the use of the phrase "till further orders," comes to an end on the termination of the suit in which such injunction was passed, although no express order had been made by the Court withdrawing or setting aside such injunction.

I am of opinion that this contention is sound, and that the case last cited, though relating to temporary injunction, proceeds upon a principle analogous to attachments before judgment, both being ad interim proceedings which naturally cease to have any force as soon as the suit itself, in respect of which they were taken, comes to a close. In other words, an attachment before judgment under s. 488, like a temporary injunction under s. 492, becomes functus officio as soon as the suit terminates. It is true, as was argued by the learned Pandit, that s. 492 does not expressly mention an [512] order by the Court removing or setting aside the injunction, and in this respect the language of s. 488, as to the removal of attachment before judgment, is more express; but I do not think that this circumstance alters the principle applicable to ad interim proceedings, nor do I think that the last part of s. 488 requiring the Court to remove the attachment is intended to be more than directory, or in other words so imperative as to render an attachment before judgment a perpetual attachment in the absence of an order removing the same. For this view I rely upon the reasoning employed by the learned Chief Justice in connection with temporary injunctions in the case which I have already cited. If attachments before judgment, such as those contemplated by s. 485, were intended to continue operative notwithstanding the dismissal of the suit, I should say that s. 490 of the Code would have been a surplusage, for that section implies that, even where a suit is decreed, an attachment before judgment would come to an end with the decision of the suit but for the provision which that section has made. This view is in accord with the judgment of Sir Louis Jackson in Mohee-ood-deen v. Ahmed Hossein (2), and I hold that that ruling though passed under the Code of 1859, is applicable in principle to this case. Pandit Ajudhia Nath, on behalf of the respondent, has indeed argued that the phrase "any decree which may be passed in the suit," as it occurs in s. 485, of the Code, must be understood to mean that an attachment before judgment is to remain operative for the satisfaction of "any decree" which may be passed in any appeal made from any decree in such suit; and upon this ground the learned pleader contends that the High Court's decree of the 2nd February, 1886, was a decree in the "suit." I cannot accept this contention, because it would render s. 485 inconsistent with the last part of s. 488, which directs the Court passing the order of attachment before judgment to remove such attachment "when the suit is dismissed." It could scarcely be contended that during the interval between the dismissal of the suit on the 30th March, 1885, and the filing of the appeal to this Court which resulted in the decretal of the claim on the 2nd February, 1886, there was any litigation pending in any Court; and if I were to hold that the attachment of the 11th January, 1885, sub-[513]sisted during that interval, I should be laying down the untenable rule that an ad interim order survives the pendency of the main litigation itself; and indeed if I were to hold this, I should be driven to the logical conclusion that such interim order of attachment subsists for ever whether there is or is not an appeal, unless and until such order is expressly withdrawn. I hold therefore that inasmuch as the suit in which the attachment of the 11th January 1885, was made terminated in dismissal on the 30th March, 1885, that attachment ceased to be operative after that date, and that, since no further proceedings are alleged to have been taken to attach the property in execution of the High Court's decree of the 2nd February, 1886, there was no valid attachment subsisting on the 1st February, 1887, when the judgment-debtor's properties were sold by auction.

(1) A. W. N. (1887) 297.

(2) 14 W. R. 284.

Upon the second question above enunciated by me, the learned Pandit has argued that absence of a valid attachment at the time of sale is not such "a material irregularity in publishing or conducting" the sale as s. 311 of the Code contemplates; and that even accepting the Full Bench ruling in Mahadeo Dubey v. Bhola Nath Dichit (1), such questions cannot be agitated by the judgment-debtor after the sale has actually taken place. For this contention the learned pleader relies on Gangathara Panditha v. Ruthabai Ammal (2), where it was held that after a sale of land in execution of a decree and before its confirmation the judgment-debtor cannot object to the validity of the sale on the ground that the execution of the decree is barred by the provisions of s. 230 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the other hand, Mr. Colvin, in resisting this contention, relies on Imamunissa Bibi v. Liakat Husain (3), and Ramessuri Dassee v. Doorga Dass Chatterjee (4), the effect of which cases is to lay down the rule that an omission to give the notice required by s. 248 of the Code to the judgment-debtor affects the regularity of the sale, and might be dealt with as a matter falling within the purview of s. 311 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The learned counsel further relies on Bakhshi Nand Kishore v. Malak Chand (5), where Oldfield, J., with my concurrence, held that an infringement of the rule contained [514] in s. 290 of the Civil Procedure Code, is an irregularity vitiating a sale in execution of decree, and is something more than a material irregularity in publishing a sale to which s. 311 refers. Again, the learned counsel cites Jasoda v. Mathura Das (6), to which the learned Chief Justice and myself were parties, and we held that non-compliance with the provisions of ss. 287 and 290, which sections provide for the contents of the proclamation of sale and the period at which such sale should be held after the proclamation, is more than mere irregularity, and that it must be taken to have caused such substantial injury as would vitiate the sale within the meaning of s. 311 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In delivering my judgment in that case, I gave expression to a doubt as to whether "a material irregularity" within the meaning of the first paragraph of s. 311 would not in itself be sufficient to justify a Court in setting aside a sale without inquiring whether such irregularity had resulted in "substantial injury" within the meaning of the second paragraph. The view so expressed is contested by the learned Pandit on behalf of the respondent, and I shall presently consider it in deciding the third point in the case. But so far as the second point is concerned, I am of opinion that the authorities cited by Mr. Colvin, and already referred to by me, justify me, in holding that a broad and liberal construction must be placed upon the phrase "a material irregularity in publishing or conducting" a sale as that phrase is employed in the first paragraph of

s. 311 of the Code. The words "publishing or conducting" are words of a very general import, and unless there is anything in the Code to restrict their ordinary meaning, the recognised rules of interpreting statutes require that such interpretation should be in the ordinary sense of the words. It is probably not easy to define exhaustively what matters would fall under the category of material irregularity in publishing or conducting a sale; but the point here is limited to the question whether absence of attachment at the time of the sale is any such material irregularity.

I must answer the question in the affirmative, consistently with the principle upon which the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Mahadeo Dubey v. Bhola Nath Dichit (1) and the other cases cited by Mr. Colvin proceed. It seems to me that there is a distinction [515] between matters which relate to the capability, of a decree for execution and matters which do not relate to such capability, but to the mode in which the decree is to be executed and satisfied. The Code of Civil Procedure has, indeed, placed both these classes in Chapter XIX under the general heading of rules relating to the execution of decrees. But that chapter is sub-divided into various headings mentioned in my brother Straight's judgment in the Full Bench case just referred to. Heading D, which consists of only one section (244), describes questions to be decided by the Court executing the decree, and it seems to me that even the general terms of clause (c) of that section cannot be understood to include such matters as are contemplated by s. 311 of the Code, because when a sale has taken place, auction-purchasers, who, as such, are no parties to the decree, become interested in such questions, and become necessary parties to applications for setting aside sales. The provisions of s. 244 being thus unavailable to the judgment-debtor in cases where a sale has actually taken place without any attachment, it can only be under s. 311 of the Code that he has his remedy for setting aside the sale, upon the ground that absence of attachment was "a material irregularity" within the meaning of that section. Nor do I think that it is extending the meaning of the phrase too far.

The general principle of law is that the only person who can sell property is the owner, and it is only by reason of statutory provisions arising from the exigencies of the administration of justice that the Courts possess authority to order compulsory sales, such as auction-sales in execution of decrees. But in conferring this power, the law has provided specific rules of procedure in order to guard against injustice. Among those safeguards attachment is perhaps the most important preliminary to bringing property to auction-sale. It is the first step which the Court in executing simple money-decrees has to take to assert its authority to bring property to compulsory sale, and I do not see why the omission to take such a step should not be regarded as a material irregularity within the meaning of s. 311 of the Code. Objections based upon the absence of attachment are not objections which attack the capability of a decree for execution, [516] as was the case in Gangathara Panditha v. Rathahai Ammal (2), where the objection upon which sale was sought to be set aside was that the decree itself was barred by limitation. The nature of such an objection is of course such as would fall under s. 244 of the Code; and the learned Judges in that case accordingly held that the objection was too late when made after the sale had actually taken place, and the proper occasion for such objection was before the sale took place. Now, in cases where no attachment has taken place, and property is proclaimed for sale under s. 287 of the Code, it could scarcely be expected that the judgment-debtor would take proceedings to secure a valid attachment of the interests of the opposite party, namely, the decree-holder. And if this is so, it seems that the only opportunity which the judgment-debtor could have for basing any objections as to the absence of a valid attachment would be after the sale has actually taken place.

(1) 5 A. 86.

(2) 6 M. 237.

The learned Pandit has, however, in arguing the third point, contended that in this case the action of the judgment-debtor in making the applications of 25th January, 1887, and 31st January, 1887, praying for postponement of the sale, amounted to waiver on his part of any such irregularity as would arise from the absence of attachment; and for this contention the ruling of the Privy Council in Girdhari Singh v. Hardeo Narain Singh (1) and Macnaghten v. Mahabir Pershad Singh (2) are cited. In the former of these cases the judgment-debtor obtained a postponement of sale upon an express stipulation of "the attachment and notification of sale being maintained," and the order of postponement having been made in those terms, the Lords of the Privy Council held that the judgment-debtor could not after the sale complain of any irregularity in such notification. The case, however, is distinguishable from the present, because here no such express specification, as to the validity of the notification, or its being allowed to be maintained, was made; and in the next place, neither of the applications for postponement of sale was granted. In the latter case, all that the Lords of the Privy Council ruled was that an objection as to any particular irregularity could not be taken, for the first time in the Court of appeal. Such however is not the case here, for the objection [517] was taken in the Court of first instance. I am therefore of opinion that neither of these Privy Council rulings governs this case so as to preclude the judgment-debtor from contesting the validity of the auction-sale.

Dealing now with the fourth question in the case, I have already said that in delivering my judgment in Jasoda v. Mathura Das (1), I was inclined to hold that a "material" irregularity, as distinguished from a simple irregularity, would vitiate a sale without proof of "substantial injury" within the meaning of the second paragraph of s. 311 of the Code. The learned Pandit has argued that this view is opposed to the dicta of the Lords of the Privy Council in Girdhari Singh v. Hardeo Narain Singh (2) and in Macnaghten v. Mahabir Pershad Singh (3), and I confess that there may be much force in this contention. But it is not necessary in this case to go further into the matter, because, as I have already shown, the effect of the Full Bench ruling in Mahadeo Dubey v. Bhola Nath Dichit (4) requires that in this case the sale of the 1st February, 1887, must be held to be void for want of a valid attachment.

This view renders the decision of the fifth point in the case unnecessary, because the absence of attachment is in itself sufficient to set aside the sale without any inquiry as to substantial injury being sustained by the judgment-debtor. For these reasons I would decree this appeal, and, reversing the order of the lower appellate Court, set aside the auction-sale of the 1st February, 1887, with costs in both Courts.

BRODHURST, J.—I concur.

(1888) 183.Act XVII of 1886, s. 8—Decree made in British India—Suit on Judgment in Native territory—Cession of territory to British Government pending suit—Civil Procedure Code, s. 13.

Prior to the cession of the town of Jhansi to the British Government plaintiff had instituted a suit in the Subah's Court in the Gwalior State on a judgment [518] of the British Court in Jhansi district. After the cession, the suit was made over for trial to the Court of the Assistant Commissioner of the Jhansi district. The suit was dismissed by the first Court as barred by s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but remanded by the lower appellate Court for trial on the merits.

Held, that the recital in part II of Act XVII of 1886 shows that it was intended that suits pending in the Courts of the Gwalior State prior to the cession of the town of Jhansi to the British Government should be continued in the courts of the Jhansi district after the cession thereof; therefore the present suit, which, if it had been originally instituted in a court of British India, could not have been maintained, being an action on a judgment of a court of British India, was a good and maintainable action in the Court where it was instituted, and it is to be deemed to be a properly instituted suit to which in other respects the law of the Courts of British India may now be applied.

King v. Hoare (1), referred to as illustrating the distinction between an original cause of action and cause of action founded upon a judgment recovered on the original cause of action.

Prior to the cession of the town and fort of Jhansi to the British Government in full sovereignty by His Highness the Maharaja Scindia, the father of the plaintiff had obtained a decree for Rs. 2,959-12-6 with costs against the father of the defendant from the Court of the Assistant Commissioner of Jhansi presided over by Mr. McLean. After partial satisfaction of the decree within the Jhansi district, the plaintiff on the 11th of December, 1885, brought his suit for the unpaid balance of the decree in the Subah's Court in the Gwalior state, and the suit was pending in that Court when by Act XVII of 1886 the town of Jhansi came under the jurisdiction of the Courts in the Jhansi district.

On the 1st of February, 1887, the suit was made over by the Deputy Commissioner of Jhansi to the Court of the Assistant Commissioner of Jhansi and that officer dismissed the suit; remarking "the suit having already been decided by Mr. McLean, is evidently barred by s. 13, Act XIV of 1882."

On appeal to the Commissioner of Jhansi, that officer holding that the cause of action in the suit decided by Mr. McLean was not the same as that which led to the present suit, reversed the order of the lower Court, and remanded the cause for trial on the merits.

On appeal against this order of remand it was again contended that s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure barred the suit.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and TYRRELL, J.—Prior to the cession of the town of Jhansi and the lands ceded therewith to the British Government, the plaintiff had obtained a judgment in the Assistant Commissioner's Court of Jhansi, that is, in one of the Courts in British India. That decree was for 3,000 odd rupees. After obtaining that decree and before the cession of the territory, he brought his action against the same defendants in the territory of Gwalior on the decree obtained in British India. Prima facie that was a perfectly good action. Whilst the suit in Gwalior was pending and undetermined, the territory, in which was the Gwalior Court before which that suit was pending, was ceded to the British Government. The question is whether the action which was pending in Gwalior can, under s. 8 of the Act XVII of 1886, be continued in what is now part of British India. The first Court thought that s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure applied. The Commissioner of Jhansi, sitting as a Court of appeal, correctly held that s. 13 did not apply. The cause of action was not the same. The action which is now pending in the Court was, so far as the Court in Gwalior was concerned, brought on the then foreign judgment or decree, and that action was the only course which was left open to the plaintiff to enforce in Gwalior the judgment which he had obtained in British India. The recital in Part II of the Act shows that it was intended that suits which were pending in the Courts of His Highness the Maharaja Scindia should be continued in the Courts of the Jhansi district. The only difficulty we have had was to ascertain what was the meaning of the words in s. 8, "but otherwise in accordance with the law and procedure of British Indian Courts." Although this action, if it had been originally brought in a Court in British India, could not have been maintained, being an action on a judgment of a Court in British India, still it was a good and maintainable action in the Court in which it was instituted and was pending at the time of the cession of the territory. We think it must be deemed to be a properly instituted suit to which in other respects the law of the Courts of British India may now be applied. [520] The distinction which the Commissioner of Jhansi has very properly drawn between the original cause of action in and the cause of action in this suit, is illustrated in the judgment in King v. Hoare (1).

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

and in August, 1872, in execution of that decree, sold the said groves and at the sale purchased them and also two mills which were not in dispute in this suit. The decree against D has been found to have the same effect as if it were had and obtained against all the mortgagors. Of this sale H had notice, in fact he opposed it. Subsequently H, the mortgagee, sued the mortgagors on their mortgage, and obtained a decree on it, and under the decree brought the said groves to sale in 1877, and purchased them himself. In May, 1880, H sold the groves to two of the defendants. The plaintiffs, who were not parties to the suit which resulted in the decree under which the groves were sold in 1877, instituted this suit for possession of the groves.

Held, that notwithstanding the sale of 1872, what was sold under the decree of 1877 was the right, title and interest of the mortgagors, as they existed at the date of the mortgage of 21st December, 1871, with which would go the rights and interests of the mortgagee, and although at a sale under a decree for sale by a mortgagee the right, title and interest of the mortgagor which is sold is his right, title and interest at the date of the mortgage, and any right, title and interest he may have acquired between the date of the mortgage and of the sale, still any puisne incumbrancer or purchaser from the mortgagor prior to the date of the mortgagee's decree and who was not a party to the suit in which the mortgagee obtained his decree, would have the right to redeem the property which the mortgagor would have had but for the decree. This view is consistent with the principles of equity and recognised by the Transfer of Property Act.

THIS was a suit for possession of certain groves and two sugar mills.

The plaintiffs in the suit had in the year 1872 obtained a decree for rent against one Durga, and in August, 1872, in execution of that decree, caused the groves and mills to be sold, and at the sale purchased them themselves. Prior to this, that is, on the 21st of December, 1871, the defendants, Durga Dubey and his brothers Ramessar, Jagessar and Purmessar, had mortgaged the four groves to one Maulvi Hyder Husain. Maulvi Hyder Husain had notice of the sale to plaintiffs, in fact, he opposed the sale. He then brought a suit against the mortgagors and obtained a decree on his mortgage, and under that decree brought the groves to sale in July, 1877, and purchased them himself. The plaintiffs were not made parties to this action, nor does it appear that they ever had objected to the sale by Maulvi Hyder Husain. In the month of May, 1880, Maulvi Hyder Husain sold the groves to the defendants Purmessar Dubey and Sundar Dubey, and in May, 1882, they were recorded by the Settlement Officer as the owners of the groves and the objections of the plaintiffs to this record being made, were disallowed.

The plaintiffs alleged that they were dispossessed of the groves by the defendants in the year 1882 and brought this suit.

The defendants in their answer contended, amongst other contentions, that as Maulvi Hyder Husain had purchased the groves at a sale under a decree enforcing a lien upon the groves which had existed prior to the plaintiffs' purchase in 1872, their title derived from Maulvi Hyder Husain ought to prevail over that of the plaintiffs.

[522] The learned Subordinate Judge of Jaunpur decided that the title of the plaintiffs was superior to that of the defendants, and decreed possession of the groves with a certain amount of damages in favour of the plaintiffs.

In appeal to the learned Judge of the district, the defendants again contended that what was sold in the year 1872, at the instance of the plaintiffs, was subject to the lien upon the groves created in favour of Maulvi Hyder Husain in December, 1871, and therefore they, as representatives of Hyder Husain, had the better and superior title. The learned Judge held that inasmuch as the plaintiffs, who were owners of the groves at the time when Maulvi Hyder Husain brought his suit on his mortgage, were not made parties to the suit, the decree obtained by him did not bind them, and further as the property sold in 1877 did not then belong to the judgment debtors of Maulvi Hyder Husain, he acquired no title to the groves by their sale at auction in his favour, and consequently the defendants acquired no title to the groves in suit by their purchase from Maulvi Hyder Husain. The appeal was accordingly dismissed.

• In second appeal the defendants again urged the above contention.

Mr. G. T. Spankie, for the appellants.

Mr. Amir-ud-din, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—This is an action for possession. The plaintiffs allege that they were ejected by the defendants. The defendants deny that the plaintiffs were ever in possession. There are no findings on this issue. The questions under appeal have been brought before us on different lines. On the 21st December, 1871, three of the defendants mortgaged the four groves in suit to Maulvi Hyder Husain. In 1872 the plaintiffs obtained a money-decree against Durga, and in August, 1872, in execution of that decree, sold the groves in question, and at the sale purchased them, and also two mills. It has been found below that that decree had the same effect as if it had been against all the mortgagors. Of this sale Maulvi Hyder Hussain had notice; in fact, he opposed the sale. At a later period Maulvi Hyder Hussain, the mortgagee, sued the mortgagors on the mortgage, and obtained a decree on the [523] mortgage, and under that decree brought the groves to sale in 1877, and purchased them himself. In May, 1880, Maulvi Hyder Husain sold the groves to two of the defendants. It is quite clear that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for possession so far as the two mills are concerned. The title to them has not been disputed before us. What we have to consider is what is the position of the parties with regard to the property which was mortgaged on the 21st December, 1871. The plaintiffs were not made parties to the action which resulted in the decree under which Maulvi Hyder Husain sold the property in 1877.

A great number of cases have been cited to us in the argument in this case.

I think there can be no doubt that notwithstanding the sale of 1872, what was sold under the decree of 1877 was the right, title and interest of the mortgagors as they existed at the date of the mortgage of the 21st December, 1871, with which would go the rights and interests of the mortgagee. I think this proposition is established by the following authorities:—Abdulla Saiba v. Abdulla (1) and Mohan Manor v. Togu Uka (2). The same principle is enunciated by Mr. Justice Turner in the case of Khub Chand v. Kalian Das (1). That, in my judgment, is subject to this, that although at a sale under a decree for sale by a mortgagee, as in this case, the right, title and interest of the mortgagor which is sold is his right, title and interest at the date of the mortgage, and any right, title, and interest he may have acquired between the date of mortgage and of the sale, still any puisne incumbrancer or purchaser from the mortgagor prior to the date of the mortgagee's decree who was not a party to the action in which the mortgagee's decree was obtained, would have the right to redeem the property which the mortgagor would have had had it not been for the decree. I am aware that this view is at variance with the decisions of this Court in the following cases:—Khub Chand v. Kalian Das (2), Ali Husain v. Dhirja (3), Sita Ram v. Amir Begam (4). With regard to the latter case my brother Mahmood followed the ruling of Mr. Justice Turner in Khub [524] Chand v. Kalian Das (2). My brother Mahmood expressed his doubts in Bhup Singh v. Gulab Rai (5) as to the correctness of the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Turner. My view in regard to the conflict of authority when it is considered is that it is safer for us to follow the principle which my brothers Straight and Tyrrell laid down in the case of Muhamad Sami-ud-din v. Man Singh (6), particularly as that principle has been recognised and acted on by the High Court of Bombay, and is consistent, in my view, with the true principles of equity. It is also the principle which has been recognised in the Transfer of Property Act. Mr. Amir-ud-din contended for the respondents that nothing passed at the sale in 1877, and for that proposition he relied on the case of Ramanath Dass v. Boloram Phookun (7), and the case of Naran Purshotam v. Dolatram Virchand (8). The case in I. L. R., 7 Calc., 677, apparently assumed that what could be sold was the mortgagor's right at the date of the sale. The case in I. L. R., 6 Bom., 538 does not appear to me to be in support of Mr. Amir-ud-din's contention. I am of opinion that this action must fail in so far as it claims possession of the four groves, and that it must succeed so far as the possession of the two mills are claimed. We make a decree that the plaintiffs may redeem if they commence proper proceedings to ascertain the amount within six months. The appellants will succeed as to the four groves and the Rs. 20 damages for the mango trees and will fail as to their claim for the two mills. Under these circumstances I think the appeal should be allowed in part and dismissed in part without costs.

BRODHURST, J.—I concur.

Questions of jurisdiction, whether with reference to the nature of the suit or with reference to the pecuniary limits of the claim, are matters to be governed by the [525] statements contained in the plaint in the cause. The valuation of the claim as preferred by the plaintiff, and not as set up by the plea in defence, would govern the action, not only for the purposes of the original Court, but also for the purposes of appeal, and indeed throughout the litigation.

Presentation of an appeal within the period of limitation prescribed therefor to a wrong Court in ignorance of the provision of law, is not a sufficient cause within the meaning of s. 5 of the Limitation Act for admitting the same appeal in the proper Court after the period of limitation prescribed therefor had expired.

To enable the Court to admit an appeal after the period of limitation prescribed therefor had expired on the ground that the same had in the first instance been preferred within the period of limitation provided therefor but to a wrong Court, the appellant must satisfy that he made his appeal to the wrong Court “bona fide,” that is, under an honest though mistaken belief, formed with due care and attention, that he was appealing to the right Court.

THIS was a suit for possession of shares in certain revenue-paying mahals.

The plaintiff in the suit, who owned the said shares, alleged in his plaint that the defendants had fraudulently caused him to execute a sale-deed of the same in their favour for the nominal consideration of Rs. 3,000, and obtained possession thereof. The plaintiff valued his claim and the subject-matter of the suit at Rs. 10,000, and the suit was instituted in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Azamgarh.

The defendants in their written statement did not contest the valuation of the suit, but resisted it on other grounds.

On the 11th June, 1886, the Subordinate Judge decreed the plaintiff's claim and from that decree Jag Lal, one of the defendants, appealed to the District Judge at Azamgarh, who by his order of the 6th December, 1886, returned the memorandum of appeal filed in his Court to the defendant, finding that the value of the subject-matter of appeal exceeded Rs. 5,000, the pecuniary limits of his appellate jurisdiction.

The defendant Jag Lal then on the 13th December, 1886, presented his appeal to the High Court, where it was admitted by order of a single Judge, subject to any objection that might be raised at the hearing on the ground that the appeal was not presented within the time allowed by law.

At the hearing of the appeal, counsel for the respondent contended, that the appeal had been preferred much beyond the period [526] of limitation provided by law, and that no circumstances existed to justify the Court, as a Court of appeal, in admitting it after the period prescribed therefor had expired.

On behalf of the appellant it was urged in reply that under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the provisions of s. 5 of the Limitation Act were available to him and the Court in exercising its discretionary powers might resort to the analogy of the law contained in s. 14 of the Limitation Act. Appellant further urged that as he set up the plea that the value of the property was Rs. 3,000, which he paid as the sale consideration, he was justified in preferring his appeal to the District Court. It was not stated on his behalf that by reason of any mistake of fact he had been led to prefer this appeal in the first instance, to the District Court.

JUDGMENT.

MAHMOOD, J.—In this case a preliminary objection has been raised by Mr. Conlan on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent, to the effect that this appeal has been preferred to this Court and admitted beyond the period of limitation provided by law, without any such circumstances existing as would justify this Court, as a Court of appeal, in admitting the appeal beyond time, under the provisions of s. 5 of the Limitation Act. The plaint clearly shows that the plaintiff valued his claim and the subject-matter of the suit at a sum of Rs. 10,000, and in the litigation the defence set up by the defendant did not expressly dispute such valuation of the suit, but resisted the suit upon other grounds, which have no strict bearing upon the question of jurisdiction. The Court of first instance decreed the claim, holding that the property belonged to the plaintiff, and that the sale-deed set up by the defendant was fraudulent and fictitious.

This decree was passed on the 11th June, 1886, and from that decree the defendant preferred an appeal to the District Judge of Azamgarh, who by his order of the 6th December, 1886, returned the memorandum of appeal finding that the subject-matter of litigation exceeded the sum of Rs. 5,000, which was the pecuniary [527] limit of his appellate jurisdiction. This having occurred, the present appeal was not presented to this Court before the 13th December, 1886, from the decree of the first Court dated the 11th June, 1886.

It is clear, and there is no contention, that this appeal calculated by the ordinary rules of computing the period of limitation is barred, and the only ground upon which Mr. Kashi Prasad has asked us to hear this appeal and to dispose of it upon the merits is that under the peculiar circumstances of this case the provisions of s. 5 of the Limitation Act are available to his client, and in exercising the discretionary powers conferred upon us as a Court of appeal we might resort to the analogy of the law contained in s. 14 of the Limitation Act.

This appeal has been already admitted by the order of a single Judge, subject to any objection that may be raised at the hearing of the case, and even if no such qualification had been made, the Full Bench ruling in the case of Dubey Sahai v. Ganeshi Lall (1) has laid down that the Bench which has to deal with the case finally is entitled to dispose of such questions.

The question then is,—Is this appeal within time, or rather has this appeal been preferred within such time as would entitle the appellant to the benefit of the discretionary power of s. 5 of the Limitation Act? I may say at once that s. 14 of the Limitation Act is not directly applicable to this case, because that section applies only to suits and applications, and has no reference to appeals such as the one now before us; because if it did apply to appeals, then s. 5 of the Limitation law would, to that extent, amount to a surplusage, an interpretation which I am not willing to place upon the Limitation Act.

It has been contended on behalf of the appellant that the action of the defendant-appellant in preferring the appeal to the Court of the District Judge of Azamgarh was a bona fide proceeding. Mr. Kashi Prasad does not say that such proceeding was the result of any error of fact, and his argument does not suggest that it was an error other than that of law. The learned pleader argued that where a plaintiff values his claim at a particular sum of [528] money, and the defendant raises a plea disputing such valuation, reducing it to a sum lower than that named by the plaintiff, an unsuccessful defendant in such a litigation has got a right, in appealing from the decree of the first Court, to go not to the Court which would have jurisdiction with reference to the pecuniary valuation of the suit, but to the Court which with reference to the defence set up by the defendant as to the valuation of the suit would ordinarily have jurisdiction. And upon this argument the learned pleader argues that because the defendants in this case had set up a plea that Rs. 3,000 was the value of the property in suit, therefore they were perfectly justified in not preferring their appeal to this Court, but preferring it to the Court of the District Judge of Azamgarh.

I am of opinion that this contention is entirely unsound. Questions of jurisdiction, whether with reference to the nature of the suit or with reference to the pecuniary limits of the claim, are matters to be governed by the statements contained in the plaint. A plaintiff may sue for a million pounds as damages either for a tort committed or as the value of certain moveable property which can no longer be recovered. The defendant may, in such an action, plead that the amount of damages claimed is excessive, and the value of the property is also exaggerated, and that in either case all that the plaintiff is entitled to is far less than the million pounds. The question is at which assessment the question of jurisdiction is to be settled? Is it the valuation of the claim as preferred by the plaintiff or the plea set up in defence? I have no hesitation in saying that it is the valuation of the plaint which would govern the action, not only for the purposes of the original Court, but also for the purposes of appeal, and indeed throughout the litigation. In support of this view I need only cite the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Mahomed Hossein Khan v. Shib Dyal (1) and the views expressed by my brother Straight in Gobind Singh v. Kallu (2) [see also Chunder Koomar Mundul v. Bakur Ali Khan (3)].

I hold that the present appellant in going to the Court of the District Judge of Azamgarh in appeal was acting in contravention of the law which law it was his duty to know. Ignorantia legis [529] neminem excusat is a very good maxim of law, as much applicable to this country as to any other; and I hold that in this case, there being no satisfactory explanation why the present defendant-appellant went to the Court of the District Judge of Azamgarh in appeal instead of coming up to this Court, that the period which has elapsed has not been duly accounted for, so as to justify us in acting under the exceptional provisions of s. 5 of the Limitation law.

I am all the more inclined in this particular case to adopt this view, because throughout the litigation the defendant-appellant never denied that the Rs. 10,000 alleged by the plaintiff to have been the amount of the sale-consideration was the amount agreed upon at the consideration of the sale of the 8th March, 1874, which, indeed, was the main contention in this litigation.

Then, again, there is a period between the 6th December 1886, the date upon which the memorandum of appeal was returned by the District Judge of Azamgarh, and the 13th December, 1886, the date upon which this appeal was presented to this Court. There has been no endeavour whatever to explain the reason why this delay took place. This appeal, indeed, so far as it has been presented beyond the period of limitation, is not supported either by affidavit or even by any explanation contained in the memorandum of appeal other than the facts which I have already stated.

It is perfectly conceivable that, in conditions of life such as they exist in India, an appellant in the condition of the present defendant-appellant might have felt himself entitled to try an experiment by going into the appellate Court of the District, and then taking his own time, after his memorandum has been returned, to come into this Court to file the same appeal. The statutes of limitation are intended to check such tendency of dilatoriness, and such statutes must have operation. These statutes have been called statutes of repose, but the moment they are allowed to be slackly dealt with, they cease to be statutes of repose, and frustrate the very object which they aim at. These views I expressed in Husaini Begam v. The Collector of Muzaffarnagar (1), in which I happened to differ with my honorable colleague in that case, but my judgment was upheld by the learned Chief Justice and my [530] brothers Straight and Brodhurst on appeal under the Letters Patent (2). I hold therefore that this appeal was preferred to this Court beyond time and, as such, should be dismissed with costs. I order accordingly.

STRAIGHT, J.—I concur with my brother Mahmood and in the conclusion at which he has arrived with regard to the disposal of this appeal. It is not denied now by Mr. Kashi Prasad that the appeal has been properly preferred to this Court, and that being so, it must be conceded that it was improperly preferred to the Court of the District Judge. That being so, it undoubtedly rests upon the appellant, who asks us to extend to him the indulgence of s. 5 of the Limitation Act, to satisfy us that he made his appeal to the Court of the District Judge "bona fide," that is to say, under an honest though mistaken belief, formed with due care and attention, that he was appealing to the right Court. Looking to the circumstance that in the plaint the property was alleged by the plaintiff to be of the value of Rs. 10,000, that upon the basis of that valuation he came into Court and sought to recover possession of it, and to the fact that the defendant never traversed that allegation, but allowed the suit to be tried by the Subordinate Judge upon that footing, I do not think it can be reasonably said on his behalf that he honestly believed the suit one in which the appeal lay to the District Judge. The appellant has filed no affidavit, and we have no sworn assurance of his to the effect of what his learned pleader has now said as to an erroneous impression prevailing in his mind when he filed his appeal in the Court of the District Judge. There are no materials whatever to satisfy me that at the time he filed his appeal in the Court of the District Judge he was acting under an honest though mistaken belief that the appeal lay to that Court. Even, therefore, if analogically I import the sort of indulgence into s. 5 of the Limitation Act which is mentioned in s. 14, the appellant has not shown me that he is entitled to it.

Moreover, apart from the delay that took place in the Court of the District Judge, we have the additional circumstance that for the delay from the 6th December, 1886, when the memorandum of appeal was returned to the appellant by the Judge, to the 13th [531] December, 1886, when that memorandum was filed in this Court, no explanation is offered on behalf of the appellant. I say most emphatically that when the memorandum of appeal was returned, on the 6th December, 1886, to the appellant, it was his bounden duty to hasten with all alacrity to this Court for the purpose of presenting his appeal, and that not having done so, we have no right to exercise in his favour the discretion conferred upon us. I agree with my brother Mahmood that Mr. Conlan's objection must prevail, and this appeal must be and it is dismissed with costs.

GOPAL SINGH (Defendant) v. BHAWANI PRASAD (Plaintiff).*
[8th May, 1888.]

One B proposed to take a lease of zemindari property from M for the period of eight years at a rental of Rs. 3,900 per annum. M declined to grant the lease until the payment of rent during the term of eight years was guaranteed by one S, the father of the plaintiff. S on his part required a guarantee or indemnity against any rent which might not be paid by B, and which he might under his proposed guarantee become liable to pay. The defendant's father, G, accordingly gave a guarantee to S in the following terms: "And for your satisfaction, I write that if any money remains due from B on account of the lease for any year or harvest, and if you have to pay the same on account of the suretyship, I am responsible to you to pay that amount to you. Rest assured." S then gave his guarantee to M, and he granted the lease to B. G died on 22nd May, 1880. B failed to pay the rent due for the year 1883. M having died, his representatives sued S on his guarantee and recovered from him the rent due and certain costs and expenses. S then died, and the plaintiff, as his representative, brought this action against defendant, the legal representative of G, to recover the amount of the decree and costs which S had to pay. The Court of first instance decreed the whole claim with costs to be recovered from the estate of G, and this decree was confirmed in appeal by the District Judge.

On second appeal it was contended that under s. 131 of the Indian Contract Act, the death of G was a complete answer to the claim.

Held, that assuming that the case was that of a continuing guarantee within the meaning of s. 131 of the Indian Contract Act, still, having regard to the object for which the two guarantees were given, it must be concluded that the parties intended in the one case that the lessor should be guaranteed for all rent which might become due during the currency of the lease, and that S should be guaranteed for any of that rent which by reason of his contract of guarantee he should be made to pay, and [532] consequently, even if it were a continuing guarantee, the liability of G was not determined on his death.

Held further, that neither G, if he were alive, nor on his death the defendant, as his representative, can be made liable for costs and expenses which S had incurred in defending the previous suit against him for rent brought by the lessor, there being no evidence to show that S acted as a prudent man would have done in defending the action against him or was authorized by defendant to defend the suit.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J.—One Bahal Singh proposed to take a lease of zemindari property from the proprietor Rao Maharaj Singh, from the year 1877 to 1884, at a rental of Rs. 3,900 per annum. Rao Maharaj Singh declined to grant the lease until the payment of rent during the time was guaranteed by one Shibhan Lal, who was the father of the plaintiff. Shibhan Lal on his part required a guarantee or indemnity against any rent which might not be paid by Bahal Singh and which he might under his proposed guarantee become liable to pay. The defendant's father, Ganga Bakhsh, gave a guarantee to Shibhan Lal, which, so far as is material, is as translated as follows:—"And for your satisfaction, I write that if any money remains due from Lala Balak Rai on account of the lease, for any year or harvest, and if you have to pay the same on account of the suretyship, I am responsible to you to pay that amount to you. Rest assured." Lala Balak Rai was Bahal Singh, the proposed tenant. On his part Shibhan Lal then gave his guarantee to Maharaj Singh. Rao Maharaj Singh granted the lease to Bahal Singh. Ganga Bakhsh died on the 22nd May, 1880. Bahal Singh failed to pay the rent which became due for 1883. The representatives of Rao Maharaj Singh, he having died, brought an action on the guarantee given by Shibhan Lal to Rao Maharaj Singh, against Shibhan Lal, and recovered the amount of the rent due and certain costs and expenses. Shibhan Lal paid the amount of the decree. Shibhan Lal died before this action was commenced. The plaintiff, who is the legal representative of Shibhan [533] Lal, brought this action to recover the amount of the previous decree and costs which Shibhan Lal had incurred in defending the previous action. This action was brought against the defendant who was the legal representative of Ganga Bakhsh. The Subordinate Judge of Meerut decreed the whole claim with costs to be recovered from the property of Ganga Bakhsh. The then District Judge dismissed with costs the appeal which was brought against the decree of the Subordinate Judge.

The question which we have got to determine is whether s. 131 of the Indian Contract Act applies to the case so as to make the death of Ganga Bakhsh an answer to the claim. That section says:—"The death of the surety operates, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, as a revocation of a continuing guarantee, so far as regards future transactions." A continuing guarantee is defined in s. 129 as follows:—"A guarantee which extends to a series of transactions is called a continuing guarantee." Assuming without deciding that this was a continuing guarantee within the meaning of s. 131, I am of opinion, having regard to the transaction which was being guaranteed, and to the fact that it must have been the intention of the parties in the one case that the guarantee given by Shibani Lal should continue during the whole currency of the lease which was granted on the faith of that guarantee, and that the guarantee given by Ganga Bakhsh should continue also during the currency of the lease; in other words, having regard to the object for which those two guarantees were given, that we must conclude that the parties intended in the one case that the lessor should be guaranteed for all rent which might become due during the currency of the lease, and that Shibani Lal should be guaranteed for any of that rent which by reason of his contract of guarantee he should be made to pay. It is obvious that the lessor would not have granted his lease on a guarantee which might have been determined the next day. It is equally obvious that Shibani Lal would not have executed his contract of guarantee without which the lease would not have been granted, if he were only to receive a guarantee in his turn which might have been determined the following day. Consequently I am of opinion, even if this was a continuing guarantee, that the liability continued notwithstanding the death of Ganga Bakhsh in 1880. The law in [534] England in cases of this kind and the principles on which that law is based are fully expressed by the judgments in the case of Lloyds v. Harper (1). The reason why I do not think it necessary to decide whether this is a continuing guarantee or not within the meaning of ss. 129 and 131, is that I consider it evident that the respective parties clearly intended that the respective guarantees should continue and not be determinable during the currency of the lease, and that the payment of the whole of the rent which might become due under the lease should be guaranteed. Further, I much doubt whether the framers of the Code had before their minds a case like the present. Whether this contract of Ganga Bakhsh is to be called a contract of guarantee, or a contract of indemnity, appears to me, to be immaterial. Ganga Bakhsh in any event was a surety, if it was a contract of guarantee, and it is to be distinguished from a contract of indemnity.

I fail to see how Ganga Bakhsh, if he were alive, could be, or how his representative can be, made liable for the costs of Shibani Lal incurred in defending the action brought against him, or for the costs or expenses which he was obliged to pay to the plaintiff in that action. There could have been no defence to that action. The payment of the rent was the only thing guaranteed. If it was a contract of indemnity as distinguished from a contract of guarantee, the plaintiff could not be entitled to the cost or expenses of the previous action unless he brought the case within clause (2) of s. 125 of the Indian Contract Act. In this case there is no evidence to show that Shibani Lal acted as a prudent man would have done in defending the action against him, nor did the defendant authorize Shibani Lal to defend that suit. I am consequently of opinion that the plaintiff

SITAL PRASAD (Defendant) v. PARBHU LAL (Plaintiff).

Voluntary transfer—Undue influence—Act IX of 1872 (Contract Act), s. 16.

In a transaction between two persons where one is so situated as to be under the control and influence of the other, the Courts in this country have to see, that such other does not unduly and unfairly exercise that influence and control over such person for his own advantage or benefit, or for the advantage or benefit of some religious object in which he is interested, and will call upon him to give clear and cogent proof that the transaction complained of was such a one as the law would support and recognize.

Where a fiduciary or quasi-fiduciary relation had existed courts of equity have invariably placed the burden of sustaining the transaction upon the party benefited by it, requiring him to show that it was of an unobjectionable character and one which it ought not to disturb. The exercise of this beneficial jurisdiction is not confined to cases only between guardian and ward, attorney and client, father and son, but the relief thus granted stands upon a general principle, applying to all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another.

The plaintiff who on the death of the widow of his brother became entitled to the estate of the deceased found himself resisted in his claim by wealthy relatives. He was a man without means. The defendant took him to his house, kept him there, found him all the money for the purpose of carrying on his litigation with his relatives, in which the plaintiff succeeded. While the litigation for mutation of names in respect of the property was pending in the revenue Court, and while plaintiff was residing with the defendant, he executed a sale deed in favor of defendant's brother for the nominal consideration of Rs. 9,500 of half the property he claimed, and again, shortly after the mutation case had terminated in his favor, he executed a deed of endowment of the remaining half in favor of a temple founded by the ancestor of the defendant and in which the defendant was interested, and the result was that plaintiff was left as poor as he was when he first came into the defendant's hands.

Plaintiff sued for the cancellation of the deed of endowment on the ground that the same had been obtained from him by the exercise of undue influence and by means of fraud, and obtained a decree.

On appeal by the defendant it was held; that looking at all the facts, such a relation between plaintiff and defendant in the course of the year 1885 had been established as to cast upon the latter the obligation of satisfying the Court that the transaction, which was given effect to by the deed of endowment, was an honest and bona fide transaction and one that ought to be upheld.

* First Appeal, No. 92 of 1887, from a decree of Maulvi Sayyid Zain-ul-abdin Khan, Subordinate Judge of Moradabad, dated the 10th March, 1887.

THIS was a suit for cancellation of a document, and the facts in connection with the case are as follow :—

One Khumani Ram had three sons, viz., Sita Ram, Mukand Ram and Kesho Das. Sita Ram's son is Shib Charan. Kesho Das [536] left a son Salig Ram, and Mukand Ram had two sons, Ram Ratan and Parbhu Lal, of whom Parbhu Lal is the plaintiff in the suit. Ram Ratan died, leaving a widow Gulab Kuar, who on his death inherited the zamindari property left by him. On 3rd March, 1885, Gulab Kuar died, and on her death disputes arose between the plaintiff on one side and Shib Charan and Salig Ram on the other regarding the property left by Ram Ratan. The plaintiff is a poor man without any means, while his relatives are wealthy people. The defendant by some means or other found out the plaintiff, took him to his own house, kept him there and found all the money to enable the plaintiff to establish his claim for mutation of names in his favour in respect of the property. In fact it was solely through the exertions of the defendant that plaintiff eventually succeeded in the revenue Court, and by an order dated the 5th of August, 1885, his name was entered in the revenue register in respect of the said property. While he was litigating in the revenue Court with his cousins, the plaintiff was living with the defendant and entirely guided by him. On the 5th April, 1885, while the petition of the plaintiff to have his name recorded in respect of the property of Ram Ratan was pending in the revenue Court, he executed a sale-deed in respect of half of the entire zamindari and landed property, forming the estate of Ram Ratan in favour of Sriram, brother of the defendant, for the nominal consideration of Rs. 9,500. On the 22nd December, 1885, when entirely under the control and influence of the defendant, the plaintiff executed the deed of endowment sought to be cancelled. This deed purports to be a gift of the remaining half of the zamindari estate left by Ram Ratan to the temple of "Lachmi Narain" situated in mauza Badwan Darwaza, pargana Sambhal, a temple built by the ancestor of the defendant and which he was then in possession and charge of. The motive for the gift is recited in the deeds to be charity for the benefit of the soul of the donor, and it goes on to say "I (the donor) have withdrawn my own 'proprietorship from it and have made it an endowment permanently, and having appointed Maharaja Sital Pershad, the aforesaid manager of the temple, as a manager of the property made a gift of, and have put him in possession thereof. The aforesaid manager shall use the income of the property made a gift of in charitable purposes, i.e., in supporting Fakirs and Sadhus and in [537] the said temple, as per instructions I give below. The manager aforesaid shall be at liberty to appoint in his lifetime any one he chooses from the members of his family as manager of the property made a gift of. On the death of the manager, the most worthy of his heirs or he whom he nominates manager of the property made a gift of, shall be manager. Thus managers shall continue to be appointed, and except a member of the family of the manager, no one from another family shall be appointed a manager." The income of the property was directed to be spent in the manner following :—"Half the income in supplying food, &c., to Sadhus, one fourth of the income in providing for the bhog of Sri Ram Chandarji, decorating the temple, &c., &c. The remaining one-fourth in paying the salaries of servants appointed to realize the income of the property made a gift of, servants attached to the temple and servants employed to look after its other management, and to prevent it from wasting and to look after the repairs, &c., of the temple."

The gift was ultimately followed by mutation of names taking place in respect of the property comprised in the gift in favor of the defendant.

On the above facts, the plaintiff alleging that the deed of endowment had been obtained from him by the defendant by the exercise of undue influence and fraud, sought for its cancellation and prayed for recovery of possession of the property comprised in it.

The defendant denied that the plaintiff had been unduly influenced by him to make the gift, and he contended that the gift had been completed and acted upon, and that the plaintiff who has no wife nor children to provide for, made the gift to the temple for the benefit of his soul. He denied having derived any personal benefit from the gift.

The learned Subordinate Judge of Moradabad laid down the following issues for determination :—

1. Whether the plaintiff gets giddiness of head every second or third year, and by reason thereof he is entirely in a state of insanity for seven or eight months ; or, as stated by the defendant, the plaintiff is always in his proper senses.

[538] 2. Whether the defendant took the plaintiff when he was insane to his own house and duped him by making him indulge largely in bhang and charas prevented him from seeing any one, made him execute a deed of endowment in respect of the property in dispute and got it registered by undue influence, when he was insane and in a state of intoxication, and the plaintiff being in the above state, did not understand the meaning thereof and had it completed ; or, as stated by the defendant, all these allegations of the plaintiff are wrong, the plaintiff having voluntarily got the deed of endowment fully completed while in his proper senses.

3. Whether there remains any property with the plaintiff for his support, or the whole of his property has been taken away by the defendant during his insanity.

4. Does the condition in the deed of endowment as to the appointment of the munsarim and mutwalli of the property given, show any selfish motive on the part of the defendant ? Is the plaintiff legally and justly competent to get the deed of endowment cancelled ? Should the reliefs sought by the plaintiff in this case be in law and justice granted as against the defendant or not ?

The learned Subordinate Judge then found on the first issue, that the plaintiff was not suffering from any disease causing insanity or loss of understanding, but that he was a man of weak understanding and insufficient intelligence, addicted to intoxication and with no forethought.

On the second issue, it was found that at the time of the execution of the deed of gift the plaintiff certainly received so much kindness and benefit at the hands of the defendant as to lead him to think that the defendant and members of his family were his only well-wishers. He had then been highly displeased with his own cousins and determined that they should not get the property after his death. He followed any advice that defendant gave him, and following defendant's advice he executed the deed of gift without knowing or considering its consequences. It was also found that the defendant took the precaution to keep the plaintiff out of the reach of any advice as regards the deed, and the deed of endowment was not obtained in good faith by the defendant nor [539] did the plaintiff execute it upon a proper and sufficient consideration of its consequences.

On the third issue it was found that in executing the deed of endowment plaintiff parted with every bit of property he had and he is now totally destitute of any means.

On the fourth issue the Court found that with reference to the conditions in the deed regarding the appointment of munsarim and mutwalli, it was quite clear that the defendant was actuated by motives of gain to himself in procuring the gift from the plaintiff, and accordingly the claim of the plaintiff was decreed.

On appeal it was chiefly contended by the defendant that he did not possess any influence over the plaintiff and had not unduly exercised the same for the purpose of obtaining the deed.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—This appeal relates to a suit instituted by the plaintiff-respondent against the defendant-appellant upon the following state of facts as disclosed in the plaint. The plaintiff said that he was the absolute proprietor of a 10 biswas zemindari share, out of 20 biswas of mauza Bhartal Madapur, pargana Sambhal, and 118 bighas 1 biswa of resumed muafi land in mauza Isapur, and of 179 bighas 11 biswas of resumed muafi land also situate in pargana Sambhal, all of such lands being in the mahal of Narain Das, and their value Rs. 20,000. The plaint goes on to say: "that the plaintiff gets such giddiness of head that his mind is deranged and it lasts for 8 or 9 months at a time, whereby the plaintiff is disabled from distinguishing between good and bad and gain and loss. When he recovers from the disease, he is restored to his proper senses and can well understand his own gain and loss, and is in as sound a state of mind as any other person."

In the 3rd paragraph of the plaint it was stated as follows:—

"In March, 1885, the plaintiff had his usual fit, and in consequence of the disease and derangement of mind, he fell out and [540] became annoyed with his relations. When the defendant and his brothers became aware of this, they took the plaintiff from mauza Bhartal, the place of his residence, to their own house at Sambhal and treated him very kindly and courteously, but they did not allow him to go out of their house, and they even appointed men to prevent him from going out and talking to any one. As the plaintiff is also in the habit of taking bharg and charas, the defendant cunningly made him indulge in those things very largely, so that his mental derangement increased, and he began to be always under the influence of intoxication and to regard the defendant and his family as his well-wishers. When the defendant and the members of his family were fully satisfied that the plaintiff was always under the effect of intoxication and also in a state of mental derangement, and that he was under their undue influence, they dishonestly and cunningly obtained from him a deed of sale for Rs. 9,500, dated the 5th April, 1885, in favour of Sri Ram, defendant's brother, in respect of half of the property mentioned in para. 1 of this plaint, without paying a single farthing as sale-consideration. The plaintiff, not being in his proper senses and being under the undue influence of the defendant, executed the sale-deed without knowing whether it was advantageous or prejudicial to him."

The 4th paragraph says:—"Not content with this, the defendant and the members of his family asked the plaintiff to execute a deed of endowment in respect of the remaining half of the property mentioned in para. 1 of this plaint. The plaintiff, being in a state of mental derangement and under the effect of intoxication and the undue influence of the defendant, executed, without consulting his own interest, a registered deed of endowment, on the 22nd December, 1885, as desired by the defendant, to the effect that he had permanently endowed the remaining half of the property for charitable expenses to the temple of Manokamna built by the ancestor of Sital Prasad, adopted son of Lachman Das, resident of Sambhal, appointing the said Sital Prasad, the munsarim (manager) of the temple, as the munsarim of the property; that the munsarim should apply the income of the endowed property to charitable expenses; that after the death of the munsarim one of his heirs who might be fit or who might be named by him [541] should be appointed to the post; and that none from another family than that of the munsarim should be appointed. This passage fully shows the fraud and artifice of the defendant in that he himself became the munsarim and obtained half the property under an illegal deed of endowment and half under an illegal deed of sale."

In the 5th paragraph it is stated:—"As the plaintiff was under the power of the defendant and his family, and owing to undue influence, insanity and the state of intoxication, used to do whatever they required of him, he, without consulting his own interest, signed the deed of endowment as drawn up at the instance of, and made over to him by the defendant, and owing to the artifice of the defendant, the plaintiff got no opportunity of consulting any other person, as the defendant always took care to prevent the plaintiff from seeing any one, a fact known to all the people of the town of Sambhal. Under the above circumstances both the contracts, namely, the one contained in the deed of sale and that contained in the deed of endowment, are voidable at the will of the plaintiff. The defendant, moreover, got a general power of attorney executed on the part of the plaintiff in favour of Nihaluddin, son of his own general attorney Nazir-ud-din, whom he caused to make on the part of the plaintiff any statement that he thought to be favourable to himself."

In the 6th paragraph it is said:—"After the completion of all the proceedings by which the defendant illegally obtained the whole property of the plaintiff, he turned the plaintiff out of his house and the plaintiff went away to his own house. After a short period the plaintiff recovered from the disease of giddiness of head and was restored to his proper senses, when he was informed by his relations of all the fraudulent proceedings of the defendant and his family, and he became aware positively that all his property had already been illegally obtained by the defendant by fraud. The plaintiff, having then consulted other competent persons, learnt that the deed of endowment and sale-deed executed by him in a state of insanity were by all means liable to be cancelled. For the present plaintiff, for want of means, sues only for the cancelment of the deed of endowment, and for the cancelment of the sale-deed he will bring a suit afterwards."

[542] In the 7th paragraph it is stated:—"The plaintiff was paid not a single farthing as consideration of the sale-deed, nor did he receive any benefit by executing the deed of endowment, nor was it executed voluntarily; nay, it was executed while the plaintiff was insane and under the undue influence of the defendant. The defendant obtained half the property from the plaintiff by means of the illegal sale-deed and half by means of the illegal deed of endowment, and there remained no property with the plaintiff. All these proceedings were due to the cunningness and dishonesty of the defendant. The cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of this Court at Bhartal Madapur, pargana Sambhal, on the 15th February, 1886, when the plaintiff recovered his proper senses and was informed of the above fact."

Accordingly, upon these statements of the grounds upon which he came into Court, the plaintiff asked the following reliefs, namely:—

"(a). That the deed of endowment, dated the 22nd December, 1885, which the defendant illegally obtained from the plaintiff by undue influence and fraud, while the plaintiff was insane, ill and under the effect of intoxication, may be cancelled and declared invalid and void.

"(b). That the defendant may be dispossessed and the plaintiff duly put in absolute possession of the 5 biswas zemindari and malguzari share of mauza Bhartal Madapur, pargana Sambhal, 59 bighas and 10 biswansis of resumed muafi land in mauza Isapur out of the plot of 118 bighas and 1 biswa numbered as below, in the mahal of Chaudhri Tika Singh, and 89 bighas, 15 biswas and 10 biswansis of resumed muafi land out of the plot of 179 bighas and 11 biswas, numbered as below, in mauza Hazrat Nagar Garhi, pargana Sambhal.

"(c). That all proper directions for the security of the said reliefs may be given to protect the plaintiff from the fraud and artifices of the defendant, and to enable him to obtain peaceable possession of the property claimed."

No doubt the terms of the plaint were exceedingly prolix and discursive, and there is much repetition in it which was unnecessary for the purpose of presenting the case the plaintiff had to make [543] as the basis for the relief he sought. It has been subjected to very severe criticisms at the hands of the learned counsel for the defendant-appellant, and the learned pleader who is associated with him has boldly asserted that there is really nothing upon the face of it that the defendant was called upon to answer; the allegations were so vague and the charges in it so general, that the defendant had really no obligation cast upon him either to traverse those allegations in his written statement or to appear in the witness-box to contradict them. I disagree with the learned pleader in his contention. It is useless in this country for us to expect that conciseness or certainty in pleading which is required in the English Courts. I have no doubt that the person who framed the plaint in this particular case, from a not unnatural desire to put his client's story in the strongest aspect upon the face of the plaint, imagined the best way to do so was to draw it in the manner it has been drawn, and so introduced a good deal of matter which was not actually capable of proof, which was of no assistance to the Court below, and is certainly of no assistance to us in coming to a conclusion as to the propriety or otherwise of the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge. I do think however, that eliminating from this plaint a mass of matter which is wholly superfluous, it may be taken to represent this much, that the plaintiff was a person of weak intellect, that he was addicted to the practice of drinking bhang and smoking ganja, practices not calculated to improve his mental condition; that at the time of the decease of his sister-in-law, Gulab Kuar, he was threatened by his relatives with opposition to his obtaining the estate of his deceased brother, Ram Ratan, to which he was undoubtedly entitled; that they did oppose him in the mutation proceedings; and that the defendant, a rich Brahman and proprietor of a temple in Sambhal, took advantage of this and got him to his residence, keeping him there while the mutation proceedings were going on, treating him with kindness and pandering to his passion for drink and narcotic smoking, at the same time providing him with money to carry on the mutation proceedings in which he was being wrongfully resisted; that in the course of doing so he obtained from him in favour of his (the defendant's) brother a sale-deed of part of his property for Rs. 9,500, not a pice of which ever was paid; and subsequently obtained from [544] him the deed of endowment the subject-matter of the present suit as a gift and for no consideration in favour of his (the defendant's) temple, and having thus served all his ends, and having stripped the plaintiff of the whole of his property, turned him adrift. These are in effect the grounds on which the plaintiff comes into Court to avoid the deed of endowment of the 22nd December, 1885, by the execution of which, in conjunction with the earlier conveyance, he had effectually deprived himself of the whole of the property, which he had only succeeded in securing in the early part of the same year.

How then did the defendant, against whom these charges were formulated, meet them? For example, did he deny in terms in his written statement that the allegation in the plaint, which is repeated twice, namely, that the sale to the defendants' brother Sri Ram, ostensibly for Rs. 9,500, was a sale in respect of which no consideration had passed? Did he deny the assertions of the plaintiff that the defendant got him into his house and kept him there for a long consecutive period of time in 1885? Did he deny the statement that subsequently to the execution of the deed of endowment in 1885, he turned the plaintiff adrift and left him to shift for himself without a pice remaining to him of the property he had only obtained a short time before? There is no denial throughout the whole of the statement of defence of any one of these allegations, and it may be convenient for me here also to remark that the defendant has never presented himself as a witness in the cause to negative the assertions which were made by the plaintiff in his plaint, and which have more or less been proved by him upon his oath.

I do not conceal from myself, and my brother Brodhurst is equally agreed with me, that the case is one of very great difficulty. For it is of the most serious public importance that the free and voluntary contracts of persons in favour of others should, in no way, be interfered with or disturbed by the Courts of law, and it is not because a man chooses to make an ill-considered or foolish contract, that therefore the Courts of law are to step in and relieve him of the consequences of his act. Neither Courts of law nor Courts of equity have ever attempted, nor will they ever attempt, to [545] set aside such transactions. But what the Courts in this country will do, is to see that, where one person is so situated as to be under the control and influence of another, such other does not unduly or unfairly exercise that influence and control over such person for his own advantage or benefit, or for the advantage or benefit of some religious object in which he is interested, and will call upon him to give clear and cogent proof that the transaction complained of was such a one as the law would support and recognise. No doubt there is one class of cases in which there being no fiduciary or quasi fiduciary relation between the parties, Courts of equity have interfered with contracts into which the persons claiming relief have entered upon various grounds. But in such cases they have required that the parties seeking that relief should themselves establish their title to relief. On the other hand, where a fiduciary or quasi fiduciary relation had existed, Courts of equity have always placed the burden of sustaining the transaction upon the party benefited by it, requiring him to show that it was of an unobjectionable character and one which it ought not to disturb. The matter before us is not that of a guardian and a ward, or of an attorney and client, or of a father and son, or of any of the more commonly recognized relations which involve such consequences. But these are not exhaustive and on this head I may conveniently refer to a passage from the notes to Huguenin v. Baseley (1):—"In Dent v. Bennett (2), where a gift obtained by a medical attendant from his patient was set aside by Lord Cottenham, it was argued upon the authority of the civil law and some reported cases, that medical attendants were, upon questions of this kind, within that class of persons whose acts, when dealing with their patients, ought to be watched with great jealousy. 'Undoubtedly,' observed Lord Cottenham, 'they are; but I will not narrow the rule, or run the risk of in any degree fettering the exercise of the beneficial jurisdiction of the Court by any enumeration of the description of persons against whom it ought to be most freely exercised.'" So at another place it is observed: "The principle upon which Courts of equity set aside such donations has been so accurately stated by Sir Samuel Romilly, in his argument, the Lord Cottenham, [546] in the case of Dent v. Bennett (2), fully adopted it. 'The relief,' observes his Lordships, as Sir Samuel Romilly says in his celebrated reply in Huguenin v. Baseley (1) (from the hearing of which I received so much pleasure that the recollection of it has not been diminished by the lapse of more than thirty years), 'the relief stands upon a general principle, applying to all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another'."

No useful purpose would be served by my travelling at length through the many authorities that are referred to in the notes to Huguenin v. Baseley (1), though I may in this connection conveniently refer to what is said in Story's Equity Jurisprudence on the same subject. In para. 234 of his "Equity Jurisprudence," edited by Gregsby, it is observed:—"For it has been well remarked, that although there is no direct proof that a man is non compos, or delirious, yet, if he is a man of weak understanding, and is harassed and uneasy at the time, or if the deed is executed by him in extremis, or when he is a paralytic, it cannot be supposed that he had a mind adequate to the business which he was about, and he might be very easily imposed upon." In paragraph 237 of the same book it is remarked, quoting from a judgment of Lord Wynford:—"But those who, from imbecility of mind, are incapable of taking care of themselves, are under the special protection of the law. The strongest mind cannot always contend with deceit and falsehood. A bargain, therefore, into which a weak one is drawn, under the influence of either of these, ought not to be held valid, for the law requires that good faith should be observed in all transactions between man and man." And addressing himself to the case before him, he added, 'If this conveyance could be impeached on the ground of the imbecility of F only, a sufficient case has not been made out to render it invalid; for the imbecility must be such as would justify a jury, under a commission of lunacy, in putting his property and person under the protection of the chancellor. But a degree of weakness of intellect, far below that which would justify such a proceeding, coupled with other circumstances, to show that the weakness, such as it was, had been taken advantage of, will be sufficient to set aside any important deed.'" Summing [547] trine, therefore, may be laid down as generally true 'that the acts and contracts of persons who are of weak understandings, and who are thereby liable to imposition, will be held void in Courts of equity, if the nature of the act or contract justify the conclusion that the party has not exercised a deliberate judgment, but that he has been imposed upon, circumvented, or overcome by cunning or artifice, or undue influence.' (But the simple fact that the intellectual capacity of one party to contract is below that of the average of mankind, does not alone furnish sufficient ground for setting aside the contract). The rule of the common law seems to have gone further in cases of wills (for, it is said, that perhaps it can hardly be extended to deeds without circumstances of fraud or imposition); since the common law requires that a person, to dispose of his property by will, should be of sound and disposing memory, which imports that the testator should have understanding to dispose of his estate with judgment and discretion; and this is to be collected from his words, action and behaviour at the time, and not merely from his being able to give a plain answer to a common question. But, as fraud in regard to the making of wills of real estate belongs in a peculiar manner to Courts of law, and fraud in regard to personal estate to the ecclesiastical Courts, although sometimes relievable in equity, that part of the subject seems more proper to be discussed in a different treatise." And there is another passage in para. 239 in which it is said :—"On this account Courts of equity watch with extreme jealousy all contracts made by a party while under imprisonment; and if there is the slightest ground to suspect oppression or imposition in such cases, they will set the contracts aside. Circumstances also of extreme necessity and distress of the party, although not accompanied by any direct restraint or duress, may, in like manner, so entirely overcome his free agency as to justify the Court in setting aside a contract made by him, on account of some oppression, or fraudulent advantage, or imposition, attendant upon it."

Now I might quote endless passages from the judgments of learned Judges upon this particular subject and from legal works which have been referred to, notably Pollock on Contracts, at pages 282 and 578, but it is unnecessary for me to do so, because I have shown, I think sufficiently, what the principle is and what [548] the rule by which, when the question arises, cases of this kind are to be governed. They have been recognized in India in the Contract Act, which provides that every person is capable of contracting, who is of the age to contract, and who contracts of his own free consent, which means when his consent has not been obtained or caused by (1) coercion, as defined in s. 15, or (2) undue influence as defined in s. 16, &c.

Now the expression "undue influence" is defined in s. 16 as follows :—

(1) "When a person in whom confidence is reposed by another, or who holds a real or apparent authority over that other, makes use of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an advantage over that other, which, but for such confidence or authority, he could not have obtained."

(2) "When a person whose mind is enfeebled by old age, illness, or mental or bodily distress, is so treated as to make him consent to that, to which, but for such treatment, he would not have consented, although such treatment may not amount to coercion."

Now those two classes of what is described as undue influence in s. 16 seem thoroughly to cover the ground which is recognized by the principles enunciated in the notes to Huguenin v. Baseley (1), and to the doctrine promulgated in Story's Equity Jurisprudence, to which I have referred. It has not been denied, and, indeed Mr. Ross would not have contended for so unsustainable a proposition, that assuming there was a relationship such as that which is contemplated in clause (1), s. 16 of the Contract Act, or such a quasi relationship, once established, the onus would not rest upon the party who held that position towards the person who sought to avoid the deed to prove that the transaction it embodied was a fair and proper one. But by way of illustration it will not be out of place to refer to the well-known case of Lyon v. Home (2), as showing to what extent a Court of equity has pushed this principle. In passing, I need only say one word with regard to the case of Selby v. Jackson (3) quoted by Mr. Ross, Mr. Ross referred to it as an authority for the position that though a man may be subject [549] to temporary fits of insanity, that during his lucid intervals he is not incapable of making a legal and binding contract. No one doubts this and I did not require the authority of Selby v. Jackson to inform me of it. The only remark I have to make about that case, is that apart from the finding of fact that the plaintiff was of sound mind when he made the contract, both the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chancellor in appeal were very clearly of opinion, that the person who was seeking to avoid the contract itself was very greatly benefited by it. Reverting to the case before us, I then have to see whether, looking to the respective positions of the plaintiff and the defendant and to the facts relating to the deed of gift as a whole, the transaction is one that should be allowed to stand. I shall not repeat at length the allegations that are made by the plaintiff in his plaint and the mode in which they were met by the defendant, but it does seem to me that, taking them in conjunction with the proof on the record, there was evidence to show that when Gulab Kuar died leaving this property behind her, it by some means or another became known to the defendant that the plaintiff was the person who was entitled to that property, but that he was opposed by his wealthy relatives; that he was helpless to resist them, being entirely without means, having up to her death subsisted on his sister-in-law's charity; that he was a poor Brahman and therefore likely to be extremely susceptible to the influence of the defendant; that knowing all this the defendant got the plaintiff to his house and kept him there, and that during the time the quarrels were going on between him and his relatives, he did find him with money, how much does not appear, though it could not have been any very large sum, for the purpose of instructing pleaders to look after his interest in the mutation proceedings. That the defendant was not purely disinterested in his action is obvious from the admitted fact, that on the 5th April, 1885, a deed of sale was executed by the plaintiff in favour of the defendant's brother of half of the property to which he was entitled for Rs. 9,500. Whether the consideration was or was not paid is not clear, though, on the one hand, we have the plaintiff's assertion that it was not, while the defendant on the other has neither asserted nor proved that it was. I cannot help under such circumstances feeling that it was not; more particularly as it can hardly be suggested that so large a sum of [550] money was expended over the mutation proceedings, which commenced in March, 1885, and finally came to an end by the decision of the Collector on appeal on the 24th September, 1885. that kind would at the outside only involve an expenditure of a few hundred rupees, and, indeed, the defendant does not suggest that any large sum was advanced for the purpose. The matter therefore stands thus, that the defendant, a well-to-do Brahman, with no special claim on him to do so, was entertaining the plaintiff in his house under the circumstances described, and that first in the month of April, 1885, a deed of sale of half of his property, and afterwards in December of the same year a deed of gift of the remaining half, is obtained from him, with the result that he is left as poor as he was when he first came into the defendant's hands.

Looking at all the facts, I am constrained to the conclusion that there was such a relation in the course of the year 1885 between the plaintiff and the defendant as casts upon the latter the obligation of satisfying us that the transaction of December, 1885, was an honest and bona fide transaction and one that we ought to sustain.

It is quite clear, as has been said in the authorities to which I have referred, that the more well-understood relations of guardian and ward, attorney and client, and so forth, are not exhaustive of the relations in respect of which an obligation rests on the party, who seeks to benefit by the transaction, of showing that it was a voluntary bona fide and honest one. Nor can it, in my opinion, be seriously suggested that, because the defendant was not the person in whose favour the gift was made, in the sense that the property was endowed to the temple and did not pass to him personally, therefore the case is to be regarded in a different light. That fact does not appear to me to alter the character of the transaction in the least. A priest, who takes advantage of his position and unduly uses his influence with another, whom he knows to be susceptible of such influence, for the purpose of inducing that other to make a gift or donation in favour of a religious society or institution, is bound, if that gift or donation is afterwards impeached, to show that it was a perfectly bona fide and proper transaction. Applying a like principle to the present case, and that a rich Brahman like the defendant would have great influence over a [551] poor Brahman in the position of the plaintiff is abundantly obvious, what has the defendant proved? I have already said that he has never ventured into the witness box, nor has his brother, the vendee, under the sale-deed of April, 1885. He has put forward evidence to show that in the mutation proceedings the plaintiff took an intelligent part. Is there anything very surprising in that? The man wanted to get his property, and it would have been an extraordinary thing had he not shown himself interested in those proceedings. Much stress was laid by Mr. Ross upon the fact that the cause of action was originally stated in the plaint as having arisen on the 15th February, 1886, but that the plaintiff came in afterwards, and applied to alter the day, because he knew he would be met with the circumstance that on the 17th February he went to the mutation department for the purpose of causing mutation of names in favour of the defendant. I confess I am at a loss to see what is the force of this. If a man under the influence of another enters into a transaction of this kind, of course he will do all that is necessary to carry it out so long as the influence was upon him. It was never suggested that before the plaintiff was turned out of the defendant's house he sought to repudiate the deed of gift; on the contrary, his case is this, that it was not until he realized the way in which the defendant had treated him, he came to understand how he had been stripped of his property. I can only say that upon a review of all the circumstances of this case my firm conviction is that the defendant did get hold of the plaintiff, and did take undue advantage of him and his position of dependence to obtain from him the deed of gift. The transaction is, to say the least of it, a most suspicious one, and its suspicious character is significantly enhanced by the circumstance that the defendant never dared to go into the witness-box to show how it was that the property was sold to his brother, how it was that the deed of endowment came about, and to explain all the other circumstances, the outcome of which was that the plaintiff was left absolutely without a pice worth of property or even the means of bare subsistence.

The case is one that has caused me very anxious thought and serious consideration, and if I have come to an erroneous conclusion, it is not for want of having looked at it in all its aspects. [552] The learned Subordinate Judge who tried this case, though portions of his judgment are somewhat obscure, appears to me to have travelled along pretty much the same line of thought that I have in dealing with the matter, and I have read his judgment several times. Having seen the plaintiff in the box he says of him:—"I think that this man is not a man of ordinary intellect; he is a weak man, and can be easily induced; the defendant is a wealthy and well-to-do Brahman of a temple in the city; he got hold of this man, and he took him to his house. The man was much frightened at the attitude of his relatives with regard to the property of his brother, and that alarm was not lessened but rather stimulated by the defendant. The defendant supplied him with money for the purposes of mutation proceedings and he preserved control over him. He induced him to think that if he did not put his property out of the reach of his relatives, they would do him some harm, and the consequence was that half of it was sold and the other half of it went into the endowment." That is the finding of the Subordinate Judge upon it, and he has held that, looking to the respective positions of these two men, namely, the well-to-do Brahman and the temple owner on the one hand, and the impecunious Brahman the plaintiff on the other, there is no doubt that influence was brought to bear on him, and that under the influence he made the sale-deed and the deed of endowment. This appears to me to be the view of the learned Subordinate Judge, and I cannot lose sight of the fact that he had the opportunity of seeing the plaintiff in the witness-box, and he has told us what he thinks about him, and what effect his appearance and demeanour had upon his mind. I cannot but conclude, from what the Subordinate Judge (who is a Subordinate Judge of many long years of experience, and for whose opinion I entertain a very high respect) says, that this plaintiff was a man not up to the ordinary standard of intelligence and easily influenced by persons of stronger will. I think the transaction he seeks to avoid was in itself of so hopelessly improvident a character, that coupled with the other facts in the case it was on the defendant to satisfy us by his oath in the witness-box that it ought to be sustained. He has not done so, nor does the evidence of his witness Harchand improve the matter, for it only shows that the draft of this particular deed of gift had [553] been prepared by the defendant, and that during the whole time of its being written out the plaintiff was sitting at the elbow of the defendant. I am not prepared to say that the decision of the Subordinate Judge was an erroneous decision, and I therefore dismiss the appeal with costs.

(1888) 263.*Public way—Obstruction by building—Suit by zemindar for removal of building—

The plaintiff who is the zemindar of the village brought an action claiming to have a chabutra or building erected by the defendant in one of the village roads removed. The road in question was a katcha road used by the village over which the public have a right of way and it had been dedicated as a road for the use and convenience of the general public. The plaintiff got a decree for the removal of the chabutra and the defendant appealed.

Held, that the rule of English law that a member of the public cannot maintain an action for obstruction to a public road without showing special injury to himself beyond that suffered by any member of the public, does not apply to a zemindar who or whose predecessor in title had dedicated to the public the road over his zemindari land. A zemindar in giving the public right of road or way over his land does not give the public or any one else a right to interfere with the soil of the road as by erecting a building upon it. In such a case the zemindar has in common with the public the right to use the road as a road and, over and above it, he has a right to the soil in the road, which he had never given to the public. In an action of this kind, the zemindar does not sue as a guardian of the public but in respect of an interference with his own rights of property.

In this case the plaintiff, Maharaja Sardul Singh of Kishengarh, sued as zemindar and muafidar of the village Rilsown for the removal of a chabutra or building erected by the defendant in one of the village roads.

[554] The Munsif of Muttra, holding that the building complained of was not a recent construction, dismissed the suit. In appeal, the learned Subordinate Judge of Agra differing from the Munsif in his view of the facts decreed the claim.

In second appeal the defendant for the first time contended, that the road being a public thoroughfare, the plaintiff who had not proved any special damage to him from the obstruction complained of, had no right of action. Upon this contention the following issues were remitted for trial to the lower appellate Court, viz. :—

1. Does the land whereon the building in dispute is erected belong to the plaintiff or is it a public thoroughfare?

2. If the latter, has the building erected by the defendant caused any special damage to the plaintiff such as would entitle him to sue for demolition thereof?

Upon these issues the lower appellate Court found that the road passed through and on the land which belonged to the plaintiff, who is the zemindar and muafidar of the village, and it was used by the village, and over

JUDGMENTS.

EDGE, C.J.—In this case the plaintiff brought an action claiming to have a chabutra or building which had been erected by the defendant on one of the village roads removed. The plaintiff is the zemindar. The road in question is a katcha road used by the village and over which the public have a right-of-way. The lower appellate Court found that the road passed through and on the land which belonged to the plaintiff, zemindar, and that it had been dedicated as a road for the use and convenience of the general public. The lower appellate Court gave a decree for the removal of the chabutra, and the defendant has appealed.

Pecuniarily the plaintiff has not suffered any greater damage than any one of the public, as has been found. It is contended [555] here, on the authority of two cases decided in Calcutta and one case decided in this Court, that the action is not maintainable without proof of special damage. In the first case, Baroda Pershad Mustafi v. Gora Chand Mustafi (1), Sir Barnes Peacock held that the person who had dedicated the road could not, any more than any other member of the public, maintain an action for the obstruction of the highway without showing special damage. It is quite plain that according to the law of England and the law here, as laid down in these cases, a member of the public cannot maintain an action of the kind without proving a special injury to himself beyond that suffered by the public. I do not think that this rule of law applies to the case of a zemindar, who, or whose predecessor in title, had dedicated to the public the road over the zemindar's land. When a landholder in England or zemindar here gives the public a right of road or road for the purposes of a road. He does not give the public or any one else a right to interfere with the soil of the road, as for instance, by building a house upon it or turning the road into a garden. In the case decided by Sir Barnes Peacock that learned Judge seemed to think that if the plaintiff in that case were allowed to maintain his action, all the public would have a general right to maintain an action against the defendant. I think that learned Judge overlooked the distinction between the rights of the public and the rights of the zemindar. The right of the public to go along the road and use the road as a road was a right which the zemindar also had. The zemindar beyond the public had a right to the soil in the road which he had never given to the public, so that, in an action of this kind, the zemindar is suing not as a guardian of the public as was suggested by Sir Barnes Peacock, but in respect of an interference of his own rights of property.

The other Calcutta case, Bhugceruth Dass Koyburto v. Chundee Churn Koypurto (2) is merely an authority because it follows the rule laid down by Sir Barnes Peacock. In the case of Karim Baksh v. Budha (3) this Court merely applied the rule of English law, that is, that an ordinary member of the public could not maintain [556] an action for the obstruction of a highway unless he has sustained some damage peculiar to himself. The rule of English law is one founded on common sense. It is that when a road is dedicated to the public, the public have only got a right to use the road for the purposes for which it has been dedicated, let it be a cart road, or a road for riding on, or a road for walking on.

I asked Mr. Madho Prasad who appears for the appellant whether, if in this case the defendant had built a row of houses on the site of the road, the zemindar could not maintain his action. He was compelled to say that he could not. I asked him whether if the defendant had ploughed up the road and converted it into a grove, or a market garden, the zemindar could not maintain the action, and he said that he could not. The authorities which would apply in England in a case of this kind are to be found in the notes to Dovaston v. Payne (1). One of those cases is the case of R. v. Pratt (2). There are also quite recent cases which show the principle of the English law on this point. I may refer to Rolls v. Vestry of St. George the Martyr, Southwark (3), and Goodson v. Richardson (4). That the zemindar who dedicates a road to the public does not part with his property in the soil of the road and his right to use the site of the road for any purposes he pleases on the abandonment of the road, is shown very clearly by the judgment of Mr. Justice Oldfield and my brother Mahmood in Nehal Chand v. Azmat Ali Khan (5). It appears to me that a zemindar, like the plaintiff here, does, as a matter of fact, suffer an injury peculiar to himself when one of the public builds upon the site of the road dedicated by the zemindar to the public. I do not put it on this ground. I put it on the wider ground that he is entitled to maintain his action, not as one of the public, but as a zemindar for interference with his own rights of property.

I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

MAHMOOD, J.—I am of the same opinion, but as it is a case which, by reason of my order of the 20th June, 1887, was remanded to the lower appellate Court, and again, by my order of the 22nd November, 1887, was referred to a Division Bench consisting [557] of two Judges, I wish to give expression to my own views as to the reasons why I have arrived at the same conclusion as the learned Chief Justice.

In doing so, I do not wish to travel upon the ground on which the learned Chief Justice has done, so far as English law has a bearing upon the case.

The land to which the litigation relates admittedly, as it has been found, forms a road site within the precincts of the village which is the property of the plaintiff, and such road is used by the public for purposes of transit. There can be no doubt, as was held by me with the approval of my brother Straight in a recent case, Ramphal Rai v. Raghunandan Prashad (6), that where the only right claimed is one in common with the public, in respect of the right-of-way through a public thoroughfare, the plaintiff could not maintain an action unless he proved special damage, or (to use a more modern phrase) injury particular to himself, that is to say, over and above such injury as is sustained by him in common with the public at large. In that case the plaintiff was not the zemindar of the village but a lessee from him, and the obstruction which he sought to remove was, as a matter of fact, found to have been antecedent to the time when he obtained the lease, and my brother Straight and I held that whilst there was nothing to show that the plaintiff's lessor had any right to the land to which the litigation related, the lease itself was also silent in respect of giving any right to the plaintiff lessee, to maintain any action in respect of encroachments on the land. I refer to that case in order to guard myself against being understood as laying down any rule of law in this case which would be in conflict with what I laid down in the case to which I have just referred.

Now I confess that I have long entertained serious doubts whether the rule of the English law of torts which in cases of obstructions of a public way requires proof of special damage, as a condition precedent to the maintaining of an action such as this, is a rule of law in itself justifiable upon juristic grounds, or adapted to the conditions of life in British India, but in the course of my own judgment in the case to which I have referred, I have adopted [558] the rule of English law out of deference to the rulings which I cited in that case.

That case however, is distinguishable from the present upon the point to which the learned Chief Justice has referred, namely, that here the status of the plaintiff is not merely that of an ordinary member of the public entitled to pass through the road, but the plaintiff is admittedly the zemindar of the village and, as such, the owner of the land whereon lies the road. I think that in a case of this kind the status of the plaintiff would be higher than that of an ordinary member of the public, provided he has a subsisting right of ownership pure and simple, or what I may analogically call, a right of reversion to the land used as a public road. That the land is within the four corners of the mahal is admitted on all hands, and that of the mahal the plaintiff is the owner is also admitted, and all that has been found against him is that the land is used for purposes of a public way. I think, as the learned Chief Justice has pointed out, the position of a person holding such a right is to be distinguished from that of an ordinary passer-by or traveller; that even adopting the strict rule of English law as to proof of special damage being necessary in the case of an ordinary passer-by, such a rule would not apply to the case of a person such as the present plaintiff. The reasons for this distinction are, of course, clear, namely, that so long as the strip of land called the public road in this litigation forms part of the mahal, it may at some time or other cease to be a public way, or, by reason of such other changes as time or the administration of the revenue authorities might bring about, may be cultivated again, and, as such, it would no doubt come back to the zemindar, namely, the plaintiff. It is, therefore, scarcely possible to say that, with rights, such as the plaintiff has in the land, he did not suffer any particular injury by reason of the trespass of which he complained in the suit.

In this view the road, though available to the public for purposes of transit, forms part and parcel of the mahal, but this view is hampered by the ratio decidendi adopted in more than one case by this Court. These cases were referred to in my judgment in the Full Bench case of Naimat Ali v. Asmat Bibi (1). One of those [559] cases was the case of Sahib Ram v. Kishen Singh (2), where the majority of the Court held that the portion of the abadi or populated area of the village did not form part of the rights of a co-sharer, and the other case was that of Hazari Lal v. Ugrah Rai (3) in which it was held that sir land did not form an essential part of the zemindari share of a co-sharer. Both these rulings, however, proceed upon a ratio decidendi which, as Pandit Ajudhia Nath has, I think, rightly pointed out, was practically overruled by the whole Court in Niamat Ali v. Asmat Bibi (1) to which I have referred, because there the Court held that grove-land does form part of the zemindari rights. Here the road formed part of the zemindari rights of the plaintiff, and his interest in such land was the right and possibility of making the land available to him for agricultural or other purposes, and his status is higher than that of an ordinary person maintaining an action with regard to what would otherwise be a public nuisance. So far as the plaintiff is concerned it is not merely a public nuisance, for he has suffered special injury.

For these reasons I concur in the order made by the learned Chief Justice.

CULLEY (Plaintiff) v. CULLEY AND OTHERS (Defendants).*
[16th June, 1888.]

Suit for dissolution of marriage—Decree made by District Judge—Confirmation by High Court—Application by petitioner and respondent that decree should not be made absolute—Act IV of 1869 (The Indian Divorce Act), ss. 16, 17.

In a suit for divorce by the husband as petitioner against his wife and another person as co-respondent, the court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, where the suit was instituted, passed a decree nisi, and the record of the case was forwarded to the High Court for confirmation under s. 17 of the Indian Divorce Act. The petitioner and the respondent, his wife, also forwarded to the High Court, through the Registrar of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner a petition in which they expressed their intention of living together as man and wife and asked the Court not to make the decree absolute. On the 2nd June, the case came before the Court, when an order [560] was passed that it should stand over for a fortnight to enable the petitioners to appear in person or by pleader. At the adjourned hearing both the petitioner and the respondent were represented by one vakil, and he prayed the Court not to make the decree nisi absolute.

Held, by Edge, C.J., and Brodhurst, J., that the Court should accede to the prayer of the petition and not make absolute the decree passed by the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh.

Further, that a suit for a divorce is to be dealt with like all other cases between private litigants, and therefore the High Court should not make a decree nisi absolute without a motion being made to it to that effect.

Held, by Mahmood, J., that proceedings in a Divorce Court are quasi-criminal, and that they are governed by rules in many respects vastly different from those which govern ordinary civil litigation, especially in the matter of compromise or mutual agreement between the parties.

Held, further, that as in the Indian Divorce Act no express power is given to the parties to the suit to prevent a decree nisi passed in it by the District Judge from being made absolute, the principles of the practice of the English Divorce Act in such a matter might well be followed and an order be made at the desire

THE facts of this case are stated in the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—In this case the petitioner Ernest Augustus Culley, brought this suit to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh against his wife Elizabeth Anne Culley, who was the respondent, and two men as co-respondents. The petitioner, on the 1st December, 1887, obtained from the Judicial Commissioner a decree nisi and a decree for Rs. 100 damages against one of the co-respondents. The record was forwarded to this Court, this being the Court which has jurisdiction to make the decree absolute. The second of June of this year was the date fixed for the hearing of the application to make the decree absolute, that date being more than six months from the date of the decree nisi. The petitioner and the respondent forwarded through the Registrar of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner to this Court a joint petition in which they expressed their intention of living together again as man and wife and asked this Court not to make the decree absolute. The case came on before us on 2nd June, when we passed an order that the case should stand over for fourteen days to enable the petitioner [561] to appear in person or by pleader. A telegram had been received which purports to come from the petitioner which stated that he intended to appear by a pleader out of respect to the Court. This morning, on the case being called on, Pandit Sundar Lal appeared for the petitioner and for the respondent, and on their behalf asked us not to make the decree nisi absolute. I would have had no difficulty as to the course to be pursued if it had not been for a doubt entertained by one of my brothers on the Bench. In my opinion, we should deal with this as with all other cases between private litigants, and this Court should not go out of its way and uninvited pass a decree without any motion being made to this Court. In fact, here the two parties who are the persons most interested in the matter, namely, the husband and wife, ask us, by holding our hand, not to dissolve the marriage which they are willing, should continue. I cannot understand why they should be in a worse position by appearing before us with such a request than they would have been if they had gone on and cohabited after the passing of the decree nisi and brought that fact to the notice of the Court. The decree nisi does not dissolve the marriage till the decree has been made absolute, and, indeed, not until the time has elapsed for an appeal to the Privy Council, or, in the case of an appeal, until it has been decided, and until then the parties continue to be for all purposes man and wife. For instance, if the petitioner or respondent in this case, before the marriage was actually dissolved, should marry another person, he or she would be liable to be convicted of bigamy. If they came together after the decree nisi and cohabited before the marriage was absolutely dissolved, the petitioner, by cohabiting with the respondent, would, in my opinion condone the adultery which was the basis of the decree nisi. It has been suggested that it is our duty to go on and consider the case on the merits, that is, on the evidence on the record of the Court below, and if satisfied with that evidence, to make the decree nisi absolute. That is, that although the wife has repented, and although the husband is willing to condone the adulterous acts of his wife and to take her back to live with him, we, as a Court of Justice, are bound, contrary to the wishes of the parties, to pass a decree dissolving the marriage between the parties, who are willing that the marriage state should continue. Reference has been [562] made to capital cases in which the Court has to consider even in the absence of the parties whether the capital conviction should be confirmed and the capital sentence carried out. That provision as to the confirming by the Court of capital convictions is one which has been made by statute for the protection of the subject as against the Crown. I cannot see how the duties of the Court in criminal cases can throw any light on the duties of the Court in civil actions "inter partes." References have been made to the Ajmere Act with which I am not familiar. I understand from what has passed here that it is an Act which enables the judicial authorities in Ajmere to invoke the assistance of this Court on questions of law which may arise before it. Similar powers are given to the Judges of Small Cause Courts. In the Ajmere Act it is expressly provided that the parties need not appear. I assume the person who framed the Act thought there was a necessity for that provision. Even if these words were in the Act or not, I fail to see how the duties of the Court under the Ajmere Act references, Small Cause Court Act references, and references under the Stamp Act can apply. The object of those references is that this Court, as the highest judicial authority in these Provinces, should, when called on, assist those holding judicial offices in Ajmere or these Provinces by expressing the opinion of this Court when a difficulty arises. In looking at the Divorce Act, I find that by s. 16, in a case in which a High Court has itself passed a decree nisi, it provides that the High Court shall fix a time after the expiry of which the decree absolute may be made, and it is expressly provided that, if the petitioner does not apply within a reasonable time to make the decree absolute, the High Court may dismiss his suit. It would certainly be complimentary to the Courts of the District Judges, and hardly so to the High Court, to hold that in a case of a decree nisi having been passed by the High Court, the petitioner would have to make an application to make his decree absolute, whilst if he had gone to the District Court and got a decree nisi, he need take no further trouble, as the High Court, if merits appeared on the record, would be bound to make his decree absolute. I have no doubt but that we ought to accede to this application, and that it is an application, which in the interests of justice and morals we should accede to. Suppose we make the decree absolute, what would be the effect [563] after the time had expired for presenting an appeal to the Privy Council? The parties having ceased to be man and wife could go next day and be re-married. In the meantime by passing a decree absolute here, we would be keeping these parties in suspense, and effect in the end no possible object, except that for a short time these persons, who wish to continue as man and wife, would cease to be man and wife. In my opinion, the only order we should pass is that we do not make absolute the decree of the 1st December, 1887.

BRODHURST, J.—I entirely concur.

MAHMOOD, J.—As the learned Chief Justice has referred in his judgment to certain difficulties which I suggested in the course of the argument of the learned Pandit, who appears on behalf of both the petitioner and the respondent, I must confess that, without concurring in all that has fallen from his Lordship, as to the nature of a decree nisi in a divorce case and the rules applicable thereto, I am willing to adopt the conclusion at which he has arrived as to the order to be passed in this case. I am glad to be able to concur in that order, as it seems to me to be consistent with the general principles upon which the law of marriage should proceed. But since it was owing to my doubts that the learned Pandit had to be heard in support of the application of the 28th May, 1888, whereby the petitioner Ernest Augustus Culley and his wife Elizabeth Anne Culley, respondent, jointly pray that the decree nisi of the 1st December, 1887, be not confirmed, I am anxious to explain the difficulties of law which I have felt in the case, though I have out of deference to the learned Chief Justice and my brother Brodhurst concurred in the order which they have made.

This case is governed by the Indian Divorce Act (IV of 1869), and s. 7 of that enactment expressly lays down that so far as possible the Courts shall "in all suits and proceedings hereunder act and give relief on principles and rules which, in the opinion of the said Courts, are as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England for the time being, acts and gives relief." This being so, the principles of the English law of marriage and divorce cannot be lost sight of in such cases, and so far as I know those principles, I have no hesitation in saying that, because that law does not recognise marriage as a simple civil contract, as some other systems take it to be, therefore proceedings in the Divorce Court cannot be regarded as an ordinary civil litigation wherein private rights only are concerned, and wherein it rests with the parties to deal with their rights as they like by mutual consent or otherwise. For instance, a litigation such as this which aimed at dissolution of a valid marriage is not dependent for its results on the wishes of either the husband or the wife, nor can a decree for dissolution of marriage be passed even if the co-respondent agrees with the husband and the wife that such should be the case. The notions of the English Ecclesiastical law are the foundation of this rule, and not only has that rule been adhered to by the Court in England ever since dissolution of marriage (that is, divorce a vinculo) was made lawful in that country, but express provisions for the intervention of third parties have been made by the English legislature, and the principles of that legislation have in the main been imported into this country by the Indian Divorce Act which governs this case. In England, not only any person may intervene in a divorce suit, but the Queen's Proctor, an especial officer appointed for the purpose, has especial duties assigned to him for intervention in such litigation in order to prevent the parties from securing by mutual consent or otherwise such results as would be opposed to the English law of marriage and divorce. That the same principles are recognised by the Indian Divorce Act seems to me to be apparent from the provisions of s. 12 and the second paragraph of s. 16 of the same enactment, and the rest of the Act is consistent with this interpretation.

Now it being an undoubted proposition of the English law of divorce and of the Indian Divorce Act that the mutual consent of the parties to a litigation which aims at obtaining a decree nisi cannot by dint of such mutual agreement or compromise secure such a decree, it occurred to me as a difficult question, whether in a converse case the mutual consent of the parties can undo the effects of a decree nisi which one of them has already obtained. In other words, I entertain serious doubts whether such a decree can be nullified by consent of the parties to such a decree.

[565] To this question no express answer is furnished by the Indian Divorce Act. S. 16 of the enactment provides that every decree for dissolution of marriage shall be in the first instance a decree nisi, not to be made absolute till after the expiration of six months or more, within which period any person may intervene in the cause, and the section goes on to provide inter alia that "whenever a decree nisi has been made, and the petitioner fails within a reasonable time to move to have such a decree made absolute, the High Court may dismiss the suit." This last provision no doubt supports the view that a petitioner who has obtained a decree nisi might by inaction prevent that decree from being made absolute, the result of which might be the dismissal of the suit. But it must in the first place be remembered that the provision of the law in this behalf is not imperative, and in the next place that it is easy to conceive cases in which the Court would in the exercise of its discretion be justified in making the decree absolute, notwithstanding the absence of any motion on behalf of the petitioner to obtain that result. There are, I believe, English cases to support this view, but I consider it unnecessary to pursue the subject further, because under the Indian Divorce Act, the provision which I have quoted is limited to decrees nisi passed by the High Court.

That that provision is not applicable to decrees nisi passed by District Judges is clear from the terms of s. 17 of the Act, in which no such provision as that I have quoted finds place, and the distinction is all the more noticeable because the last part of the section contains provisions for intervention of third persons, "during the progress of the suit in the Court of the District Judge," whilst the provisions of the second paragraph of s. 16, applicable to decrees nisi passed by the High Court, prescribe the period of intervention to be the interval between the date of the decree nisi and the date of its being made absolute. What the exact reasons for this distinction may be it is unnecessary for me to contemplate, for I must take the law as it stands, and interpreting it by well recognised rules of construing statutes, I cannot but hold that the effect of the enactment is, that whilst in the case of decrees nisi passed by a High Court the power of intervention may be exercised after passing of the decree nisi, and the suit for dissolution of marriage itself possibly defeated by reason of the successful petitioner not moving to [566] have the decree made absolute, no such provisions exist in respect of decrees nisi passed by District Judge, and that in lieu thereof power is given by the last part of s. 17 to intervene "during the progress of the suit in the Court of the District Judge;" and that that power does not exist after the District Judge has passed a decree nisi for dissolution of marriage. I have therefore no doubt that our Indian Divorce Act confers no power of intervention in respect of decrees nisi passed by a District Judge after such decree has been passed; nor can such decree nisi be set aside or the suit dismissed merely because the holder of the decree does not move this Court to have the decree made absolute.

I have mentioned this in order to show why, during the course of the argument of the learned Pandit, I was unable to accept the contention that any provisions of s. 16 of the Act relating to decrees nisi passed by High Courts, are to be imported into s. 17 which relates to decrees nisi passed by District Judges; for if I could accept the contention, there is no reason why the provisions of s. 17 should not be imported into s. 16, and thus the two sections, being mixed up into one, present inconsistency of statutory provisions in one and the same statute. I am inclined to think that cases which come up to this Court under s. 17 of the Act for confirmation of decrees nisi are in the nature of references, which must be disposed of whether the parties appear before the Court or not, for whatever order the High Court may make in the case, there is no such provision as that contained in s. 16, enabling the Court to dismiss the petitioner's suit merely upon the ground that the party interested fails to appear when the case comes on for hearing for confirmation of a decree nisi passed by a District Judge. The distinction which exists in this respect lends support to this interpretation, and I cannot help holding that we should have been bound to dispose of the case even if the petitioner had never appeared before us. This view is consistent with the principle upon which many other provisions of the Indian statute-book, to some of which the learned Chief Justice has referred, proceed in respect of references made to the High Court, such references being often from remote districts.

In this case, however, no such question directly arises, because two of the parties to the District Judge's decree nisi have appeared, [567] though somewhat anomalously by one and the same pleader, and I have referred to the possible effects of the absence of the parties only because it was suggested in the course of the argument that it was entirely within the choice of the parties whether or not the decree nisi should be made absolute by our confirming it. I have already said enough to show that proceedings in a Divorce Court are quasi-criminal, that they are governed by rules in many respects vastly different from those which govern ordinary civil litigation, especially in the matter of compromise or mutual agreement between the parties; and the distinction is fully recognised by the English law.—Browne on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3rd Ed. p. 218.

Is there then any power in the Court to set aside a decree nisi by any procedure other than that of intervention by a third party? The English Divorce Court [vide Stoate v. Stoate, (1)] and the Indian Court [vide Willis v. Willis, (2)] are agreed that the right of intervention is limited to persons other than the parties to the decree, and I have already shown that under the Indian Divorce Act such right of intervention is limited to the period of "the progress of the suit in the Court of the District Judge," that is, before the decree nisi is passed, and does not exist thereafter. Is there then any other power in the parties to prevent a District Judge's decree nisi from being confirmed by this Court under s. 17 of the Divorce Act, either by compromise or otherwise?

This is the direct question in the case, and it is one which is far from being free from doubt and difficulty. Here the husband and wife in their joint application to this Court state "that your petitioners subsequent to the passing of the decree nisi in the above suit have come to terms, and have resolved that on the petitioner leaving the military service two years hence or thereabouts they will live together again as man and wife, and have arranged that meantime the respondent shall go to England, there to remain with the petitioner's father and mother," and it is upon this ground that they pray that the District Judge's decree nisi of the 1st December, 1887, be not confirmed.

It will be observed that in this statement there is no allegation that the parties had already resumed co-habitation, or that there [568] had been any kind of condonation by the petitioner who had obtained the decree nisi from the District Judge on the 1st December, 1887. The recital in the petition amounts to nothing more than the expression of a deliberate intention on the part of the husband and wife to co-habit after the lapse of two years if certain conditions were fulfilled.

Is such an application entertainable under the Indian Divorce Act, as a reason for not confirming the District Judge's decree nisi of the 1st December, 1887? Pandit Sundar Lal has argued that under s. 45 of the Act all the rules of the Code of Civil Procedure are rendered applicable to proceedings of this nature, and that the provisions of s. 375 of that Code entitle the parties to enter into any compromise as to the final adjudication of this Court in respect of the District Judge's decree nisi of the 1st December, 1887.

I am of opinion that this contention is entirely unsound, because in the first place the terms of s. 45 of the Indian Divorce Act itself render the application of the Civil Procedure Code subject to the provisions of the Divorce Act, and in the next place the very nature of the provisions of s. 375 of the Code militates against the very nature of proceedings in the Divorce Court as I have already shown. That section therefore has no application to this case, for it furnishes no guide in respect of matrimonial causes. We have, therefore, to fall back upon the provisions of the Indian Divorce Act itself in deciding whether the application now made can be granted. But as I have already said that Act contains no express provisions upon the subject, beyond the general provisions of s. 7 of that enactment requiring us to act on principles of the practice of the English Divorce Court.

This being so, I think the case of Lewis v. Lewis (1) furnishes a state of things closely similar to the facts of this case, and I may quote from the judgment of Sir C. Cresswell in that case to indicate its application to this case. The learned Judge Ordinary, after stating that the petitioner being entitled to a dissolution of her marriage, a decree nisi was pronounced, and when the motion to make it absolute came on, the husband interposed and stated that he and his wife had made up their differences and had renewed matri- [569] monial cohabitation, and therefore applied to have the petition dismissed, and it appeared from an affidavit of the clerk of the petitioner's attorney that she did not desire to take any further proceedings in the matter, went on to say:—"I doubt much whether after a decree nisi has been pronounced I can dismiss the petition at the instance of either of the parties to the suit; but if the petitioner either by her attorney or in person applies to the Court, I will at the desire of both parties make an order that no further proceedings be taken in the cause. All proceedings in the case will then be stayed. I doubt whether the Court has power to dismiss a petition for dissolution of marriage after a decree nisi has been pronounced, except in the manner pointed out by the 23 and 24 Vic, C. 144, s. 7, namely, at the instance of the Queen's Proctor or of a third person."

This case is to my mind an authority for the proposition that even co-habitation of the husband and wife after one of them has obtained a decree nisi for dissolution of marriage will not ipso facto nullify such decree, and that, even where the husband and wife (that is, petitioner and respondent) agree, such decree cannot be set aside, and that all that their mutual agreement can achieve is that further proceedings in the cause would be stayed.

(1) 30 L. J. P. and M. 199.

The English law of marriage and divorce, as reproduced in the Indian Divorce Act, has placed the matrimonial contract upon a footing so vastly different to that upon which ordinary civil contracts are placed, that it would be wrong to say that only private rights of the parties concerned in a matrimonial dispute are involved in the litigation which arises out of those disputes, or that the law as it stands leaves it open to the parties to settle such disputes by mutual agreement or compromise. The legislature itself has recognised the distinctions in passing the Indian Divorce Act, and it was because of those distinctions that I felt the difficulties which I have mentioned and which rendered it necessary for Pandit Sundar Lal to occupy the time of the Court in supporting the joint application of the husband and wife to prevent the decree nisi being confirmed by us.

But though these difficulties have occurred to me, the liberal interpretation which the learned Chief Justice has put upon the [570] Indian Divorce Act is so consistent with the general principles upon which the matrimonial law in civilized countries should proceed that I have willingly adopted the order which he has made. That order, as I understand it, is that we should desist from confirming the decree nisi and prevent it from being made absolute under the peculiar circumstances of this case. I do not understand the order to set aside the decree nisi; and I may respectfully add that if I had not so understood it I should probably have been unable to concur in it. As the order has been made its practical effect is virtually the same as that indicated by Sir C. Cresswell in Lewis v. Lewis (1), that is to say, staying further proceedings relative to the confirmation of the District Judge's decree nisi of the 1st December, 1887, by our not confirming it.

NOTE—As to whether or not an application for a decree absolute according to the practice in the English Divorce Court, is a step in the cause, see Ousey and Ousey v. Atkinson, L. R. I. P. Div. 56 and Brown, on the Law and Practice in Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 4th Ed., p. 325.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Mahmood.

KUDHAI (Defendant) v. SHEO DAYAL AND OTHERS
(Plaintiffs). * [21st June, 1888.]

Execution of decree—Joint decree—Decree for possession of immoveable property—Purchase by judgment-debtor of rights of some of the joint decree holders—Decree extinguished pro tanto—Validity of sale and extent of rights purchased to be determined by Court executing the decree—Civil Procedure Code, s. 244 (c).

Where subsequent to a decree a portion of the rights to which the decree relates devolves either by inheritance or otherwise upon the judgment-debtor, or is acquired by him under a valid transfer the decree does not become incapable of execution, but is extinguished only pro tanto. This rule of law is sufficiently general to comprehend alike cases in which the decree is for money only and where it is for immoveable property.

The rule of law against breaking up the integrity of a mortgage security is a rule aiming at the protection of the mortgagee, and is not applicable to cases where the mortgagee himself has acquired the ownership of a portion of the mortgaged property.

JUDGMENT.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts of this case may be recapitulated here to indicate the questions of law which require decision in this appeal.

On the 13th June, 1882, six persons, viz., (1) Mussammat Premu, (2) Debi Sahai, (3) Girdhari, (4) Chand Lal, (5) Bihari, and (6) Kudhai (appellant), obtained a joint decree for possession of a house by redemption on payment of Rs. 1,043-2-3 against three persons (1) Sheo Dayal, (2) Sheo Singh, and (3) Johri Mal.

On the 5th June, 1885, Kudhai by himself applied for execution of the decree, praying for possession of only half of the house, which he claimed as his share therein. To this application objections were raised by the judgment-debtors, and during the pendency of that application the Court executing the decree allowed him to amend his application so as to seek possession of the entire house.

On the 28th August, 1885, the Court allowed Kudhai, appellant, to execute the decree in respect of the whole house on furnishing security for Rs. 869-2-8 (which represented five-sixths of the mortgage money) to protect the interests of the other decree-holders who had not joined in the application for execution. The order was reversed in appeal by the lower appellate Court, but was restored by this Court on the 20th May, 1886 (4).

Having so far succeeded, Kudhai, appellant, having filed the requisite security applied again for execution of the decree in respect of the whole house, by an application dated 13th September, 1886, which must be taken to revive the execution proceeding commenced by him with the application of the 5th June, 1885.

Meanwhile, on the 2nd August, 1882, Musammat Premu and others who were joint decree-holders with Kudhai, sold their rights [572] to one Sujan Chand, who on the 21st September, 1886, sold those rights to the judgment-debtors, that is to say, to the persons who were already in possession of the house. Relying upon their purchase the judgment-debtors raised objections to the execution, contending that the rights of the decree-holder Kudhai who sought execution, in respect of the whole house, were limited to a one-fifth share, and that he could not, therefore, seek possession of more than that share. On the other hand, the appellant Kudhai, decree-holder, contended that the extent of his share was at least one-half of the whole house, and that he could execute the decree in respect of the whole house as the purchase made by the judgment-debtors was illegal, and the question had already been settled as to his right to execute the whole decree.

(2) 7 W. R. 136.

(3) 25 W. R. 343.

(4) A. W. N. (1886) 125.

The Court of first instance held that the purchase made by the judgment-debtors having been made subsequent to the High Court's order of the 20th May, 1886, such purchase could not nullify the effect of that order; that the judgment-debtors are bound by that order, "and should give possession to Kudhai of the whole house"; that the question as to the extent of Kudhai's share in the house could not be determined in execution proceedings; and that "the judgment-debtors may obtain their remedy as to the determination of their shares in the house and as to the possession thereof as representatives of Premu, &c., decree-holders, by a regular suit in the same manner as their predecessors in title would have done." Upon these grounds the first Court rejected the objections of the judgment-debtors, and allowed execution to proceed in respect of the whole house.

From that order the judgment-debtors appealed to the lower appellate Court, and the learned Judge of that Court reversed the order of the first Court in a judgment which goes to show that he regarded the share of the decree-holder Kudhai to be only one-fifth in the house, though the order passed in appeal does not show that the learned Judge allowed execution of decree even to that extent.

From the order of the lower appellate Court, this second appeal has been preferred, and the arguments addressed to me by the [573] learned pleaders for the parties raise the following questions for determination:—

(1) Whether the purchase by the judgment-debtors of the shares of their decree-holders, Musammatt Premu and others, renders the decree of the 13th June, 1882, incapable of execution in respect of the whole house, notwithstanding the order of this Court dated the 20th May, 1886, which restored the first Court's order of the 28th August, 1885, allowing execution in respect of the whole house.

(2) Whether the question as to the legality of the purchase by the judgment-debtors and the extent of the share which they so acquired can form the subject of investigation in execution proceedings such as this case.

I am of opinion that the questions so raised are not free from difficulty, principally because the Code of Civil Procedure contains no express provision to meet cases such as this. The questions, however, are not dissimilar in principle from those which arose in the case of Banarsi Das v. Maharani Kuar (1), where my brother Straight and I concurred in holding that when by operation of law one of several joint judgment-debtors acquires the position of decree-holder in respect of the whole judgment-debt, the effect is to extinguish the liability of the other judgment-debtors, and the decree cannot be executed against them, but that when one of them so acquires only a partial interest in the decree, the effect is not to extinguish the entire judgment-debt, but so much only of it as such judgment-debtor has so acquired. That was a case in which the decree was for money, but in arriving at the principle upon which that judgment proceeded we relied upon the case of Wise v. Abdool Ali (2), where Loch and Macpherson, JJ., held that "even if it should appear that the principal defendant has (as one of the representatives of his son) an interest as one of the decree-holders that fact will not bar execution being issued by other decree-holders according to such rights as they may be able to prove." Similarly, reference was made to the case of Pogose v. Fukuooddeen Mahomed Ahsan (3), where Jackson and McDonell, JJ., observed:—"We [574] considered for a moment whether it was possible to make any distinction between the capacity in which Azim Chaudhri was the judgment-debtor and that in which he became one of the decree-holders as representing his deceased wife; but it appears to us that the consequence as regards that share in the decree is the same as it would have been if he had purchased the whole or a part. We think the effect of inheritance as to a part or as to the whole is the extinction of the decree pro-tanto."

In both these cases, though the reports are not very clear, it would appear that the decrees were for immoveable property, and the rights of one of the decree-holders had during the pendency of execution proceedings devolved upon the judgment-debtor; and in the latter case Sir Louis Jackson, in delivering the judgment of the Court, expressly stated that the effect of such devolution was similar to that of a purchase by the judgment-debtor of a portion of the property in respect of which the decree had been obtained.

I am of opinion that these two rulings are applicable in principle to this case, and are in accord with the juristic reasons upon which my judgment in the case of Banarsi Das v. Maharani Kuar (1) proceeded. The general effect of these rulings seems to me to be that where subsequent to a decree a portion of the rights to which the decree relates devolves either by inheritance or otherwise upon the judgment-debtor, or is acquired by him under a valid transfer, the decree does not become incapable of execution, but is extinguished only pro-tanto. The theory of law upon which this rule proceeds is, in my opinion, sufficiently general to comprehend alike, cases in which the decree is for money and cases in which the decree awards possession of immoveable property. For instance, in a case where A and B jointly obtain a decree for money against C, and C as judgment-debtor either pays off the share of A, or purchases his share in the decree, or inherits such share from A, the result would be the extinguishment of the decree pro-tanto, and the remaining decree-holder B could not execute for more than his own share. This is the effect of the ruling in Banarsi Das v. Maharani Kuar (1), and the cases to which the ruling refers. Similarly, and on the same principle, I hold that where A and B obtain a decree [575] for possession of a house or other immoveable property against C, and C purchases or inherits the rights and interests of A in such property, the decree is extinguished pro-tanto, though the remaining decree-holder B can, of course, execute the decree in respect of his own share. Both classes of cases rest upon the common principle of jurisprudence that a person cannot at one and the same time unite in himself two opposite characters. For instance, a person cannot be his own creditor, or the mortgagee of his own rights, and it is upon this principle that the doctrine of merger and what would in Roman law be called confusio proceed.

Applying these principles to this case, I am of opinion that if the defendants-mortgagees judgment-debtors of the decree of the 13th June, 1882, have validly acquired by purchase the rights and interests of the mortgagors decree-holders Musammatt Premu and others, the decree cannot, to that extent, be executed against them, because it has been extinguished pro-tanto, and all that Kudhai, decree-holder, appellant, could seek to recover possession of by enforcement of the decree would be such share in the mortgaged house as has not been validly purchased by the mortgagees judgment-debtors. This view does not, in any way, affect this Court's order of the 20th May, 1886, because at that time the judgment-debtors-respondents had not acquired the rights of ownership in the house and were not in a position to raise the pleas which they have now set up. As already stated, Kudhai's joint decree-holders Musammatt Premu and others sold their share in the mortgaged house to Sukan Chand on the 2nd August, 1882, but neither the vendors nor Sukan Chand were parties to the litigation which ended in this Court's order of the 20th May, 1886. The effect of that order no doubt is to allow Kudhai to execute the decree of the 13th June, 1882, in respect of the whole house, but at that time the judgment-debtors had not purchased a portion of the house from Sukan Chand, for the sale is dated the 21st September, 1886, and it is upon the grounds of that purchase that the plea they now raise is founded.

For these reasons I hold that the decree-holder appellant Kudhai, is entitled to execute the decree only in respect of so much of the house as has not been validly purchased by the judgment-debtors-respondents under the sale of the 21st September, 1886. [576] These judgment-debtors are mortgagees in possession, and the decree of the 13th June, 1882, is a decree for redemption; and it seems to me obvious that it would be a most circuitous method to force these judgment-debtors mortgagors to receive in these execution proceedings the entire mortgage money including so much as is due by the shares which they themselves have purchased, and then to relegate them to another regular suit in which they would seek redemption of their shares from Kudhai on payment of the very money which Kudhai had paid to them in these execution proceedings. The rule of law against breaking up the integrity of a mortgage security is a rule aiming at protection of the mortgagee, but that rule does not apply to cases where the mortgagee himself has acquired the ownership of a portion of the mortgaged property. This rule, which has always been recognised in India, has been formulated in the last part of s. 60 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), and although it is a rule of substantive law, the principle upon which it proceeds is, in my opinion, applicable also to adjective law, that is, rules of procedure such as those relating to execution of decrees of this character.

These observations dispose of the first question in this case as enunciated by me, and they render the decision of the second question an easy matter. The whole of that question comes to this, is the dispute as to the legality of the purchase by the judgment-debtors and the extent of the share which they so purchased a matter falling within the purview of clause (c) of s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure? That section, in enumerating the questions to be decided by the Court executing the decree, goes on to say in cl. (c), "any questions arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed, or their representatives, and relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree." Here the decree-holder appellant, Kudhai, as also the judgment-debtors-respondents were parties to the suit which ended in the decree of 13th June, 1882, and which decree is sought to be executed in these proceedings, and this being so, I hold that the terms of cl. (c) of s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure are sufficiently wide to include such questions as those raised in this case, relating to the validity and extent of the share purchased by the judgment-debtors in the mortgaged house to which the decree relates.

[577] But in this case neither of the Courts below has tried the case upon the merits, with reference to the question how far the decree sought to be executed has been extinguished by reason of the purchase made by the judgment-debtors-respondents on the 21st September, 1886, and till that question is decided upon the merits, it is not possible to determine to what extent the decree can be executed by Kudhai, and what amount he should pay in order to secure possession of so much of the house as has not been purchased by the mortgagees judgment-debtors respondents. And in this connection I may state that the fifth ground of appeal before me, which proceeds upon the assumption that the decree-holder Kudhai appellant had already paid the mortgage-money as provided by the decree, is also a matter relating to the merits and cannot be dealt with by this Court as a Court of second appeal.

Under these circumstances, the proper course is to decree this appeal, setting aside the order of both the Courts below and to remand the case to the Court of first instance for disposal upon the merits, with reference to the observations which I have made. I order accordingly. Costs will abide the result.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Brodhurst and Mr. Justice Mahmood.

DEBI PRASAD (Plaintiff) v. RUP RAM AND OTHERS (Defendants).*
[23rd June, 1888.]

Act XXII of 1881 (Excise Act), ss. 5, 12, 35, 42—License—Sub-lease—Breach of conditions of license—Consideration forbidden by law—Immoral consideration—Consideration opposed to public policy—Act IX of 1872 (Contract Act), s. 23.

The plaintiff obtained from the excise authorities a license to manufacture and sell country liquor, such license containing a condition against sub-letting the benefits of the license. By s. 42 of the Excise Act (XXII of 1881) the violation of any condition of a license granted under the Act is made a punishable offence. The plaintiff sub-let the license to defendants who on the 5th of September, 1884, executed an agreement to pay to the plaintiff a certain sum of money, in which was included the sum of Rs. 1,500, which the defendants had undertaken to pay to plaintiff as rent reserved on the sub-lease. The plaintiff instituted the suit for recovery of the amount due to him on the agreement and it was decreed by the Court of first instance but dismissed by the lower appellate Court.

[578] On second appeal the plaintiff contended on the authority of Gauri Shankar v. Mumtaz Ali Khan (1), that his suit had been wrongly dismissed.

Held, that the sub-letting of license to manufacture and sell country liquor having been made punishable as an offence is to be deemed as an act contrary to law within the meaning of s. 23 of the Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872), and the claim to recover money due on such sub-lease was therefore not enforceable in a Court of justice.

JUDGMENT.

BRODHURST and MAHMOOD, JJ.—This was a suit for recovery of Rs. 1,043-15-1½, principal and interest, due upon a sarkhat (agreement) executed by the defendants on the 5th September, 1884. In that agreement is included a sum of Rs. 1,500, which the defendants promised to pay to the plaintiff as the sub-lessees of a license obtained by the plaintiff from the revenue authorities under the Excise Act for distillery. The suit was defended upon various grounds, but it was decreed by the Court of first instance.

Upon appeal the lower appellate Court reversed the decree of the first Court upon a question of law, which has to be considered by us here, as it is the main point upon which this second appeal has been preferred to us. The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has held that the sum of Rs. 1,500 included in the sarkhat could not be lawfully taken into account, because it represented money due upon a contract of sub-leasing a license, which contract was opposed to the Excise Act (XXII of 1881), by s. 5 of which enactment it is only persons to whom the license has been granted who can take benefit of it, and by s. 12 of the same enactment such licensee can take advantage of the license subject to the terms of the license itself and not in contravention thereof. Again, s. 35 and the following sections provide for regulations which bind the licensee and subject the license to certain conditions, and s. 42 in general terms says that any person who breaks any rule made under the Act, or any condition of a license granted under the Act, for the breach of which rule no other penalty is herewith provided, shall be punished with a fine of Rs. 50.

[579] In this case the license which had been obtained by the plaintiff in 1883, contained in para. 12 express prohibition against sub-letting the benefits of the license, and there can be no doubt that the sub-letting of the license by the plaintiff to the defendants was an action in contravention of the terms of the license above-mentioned, and was so punishable under s. 42 of the Excise Act (XXII of 1881).

We therefore hold that the sub-letting of the license was an action contrary to law within the meaning of s. 23 of the Contract Act (IX of 1872), and as such not enforceable by us as a Court of justice.

Mr. Conlan in arguing the case on behalf of the appellant has relied upon a Full Bench ruling of this Court in Gauri Shankar v. Mumtaz Ali Khan (1), and the learned counsel contends that that case is an authority to support the proposition that the restrictions upon sub-leasing a license are intended only for the protection of the public revenue and do not vitiate the contract entered into by a licensee with a third party. So far as that case is concerned it is enough to say that Regulation VI of 1819, upon which the case proceeded, is in many respects different, both in point of nature and policy, from the Excise Act (XXII of 1881) with which this case is concerned, and that the ruling cited is one in which there was a case of partnership, and the license did not contain any express prohibition against such partnership being entered into.

Pandit Sundar Lal in supporting the case for the respondents has called our attention to certain English cases—Ritchie v. Smith (2); Cundell v. Dawson (3); Smith v. Mawhood (4); Taylor v. The Crowland Gas & Coke

Co. (1)—for supporting the contention that in connection with Excise Acts, the person to whom the license is given is the only person who can avail himself of such license, and that it would be defeating the policy of such enactments if such licensee is allowed to sub-lease the license by any agreement. Again, the learned pleader relies upon a ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Judoonath Shaha v. Nobin Chunder Shaha (2), where Sir Richard Couch, in dealing with the Bengal Excise Act, held that “a contract by which a licensee lets the shop and the [580] use of the license for a fixed term, receiving rent, is contrary to the policy of the law, and comes within the rule that a contract which is illegal, or is contrary to public policy, cannot be enforced.”

We are of opinion that the general effect of those cases and especially the last mentioned case is that no licensee under the excise laws can transfer the license or sub-lease it to any person, and that it would be defeating the policy of the law if such contracts were to be allowed. This view is based not only upon the general principle that anything which defeats statutory provisions or is against the public morals should not be allowed, but upon the especial matters of the excise law that the capacity of the licensee is a matter to be taken into account, and that the consideration of the public morals also forms part of the granting of such license with reference to the character of such licensee. We hold therefore that the lower appellate Court was right in holding that the suit, taking into account the sum of Rs. 1,500 as rent due under the license which the plaintiff had taken from the revenue authorities and sub-leased to the defendants, was not maintainable. That Court has also found that once the item of Rs. 1,500 is kept out of account nothing of the account proffered by the plaintiff himself remains due to him. This being so, we dismiss the appeal with costs.

CRIMINAL REVISION.

EMPRESS v. NIADAR [7th July 1888].

Act XLV of 1860 (Penal Code), s. 498—Detaining with criminal intent a married woman.

The words “such woman” in s. 498 of the Indian Penal Code do not mean such a woman as has been so enticed as mentioned in that section but mean such woman whom the accused knows or has reason to believe to be the wife of any other man; the detention of such a woman with the particular intent defined in the section is one of the offences made punishable under that section.

[F—16 P.R. 1891 Cr.]

THIS was an application for revision on behalf of Niadar, convicted under s. 498 of the Indian Penal Code.

The evidence in the case proved that the wife of the complainant ran away from him and was eventually found residing with the petitioner. Complainant claimed back his wife, but petitioner persisted [581] in detaining her knowing that she was then the complainant's wife. On these facts the petitioner was convicted by a Magistrate under s. 498 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for four months. On appeal to the learned Sessions Judge, that officer observing that "it is fairly proved that the accused when complainant claimed his wife detained her, having then reason to believe she was complainant's wife," affirmed the conviction and sentence.

The second ground on which revision was sought was as follows:—"Because when enticing away a married woman is not established, no conviction can be had as against the prisoner under s. 498 of the Indian Penal Code."

Mr. Niblett, for the petitioner.

The Government Pleader (Ram Prasad), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—If I understand the judgment aright it has been found as a fact by the learned Judge that the petitioner, knowing or having reason to believe that the woman was the wife of the complainant, detained her in his home and kept her from her husband with the intent that she should continue to co-habit with him. It is admitted by the learned pleader for the petitioner, that his first plea as to the proof of the marriage cannot be sustained, but he contends that on the facts found by the Judge, and in the absence of proof of enticement, there can be no conviction under s. 498 of the Penal Code. In support of the view he refers to a ruling of Pearson and Oldfield, JJ. (1), which no doubt favours his contention, though whether the decision of those learned Judges is to be regarded as confined to the facts of that particular case is not altogether clear. At any rate, the point now raised does not seem to have been discussed. In my opinion, the words "such woman" in s. 498 do not mean "such woman so enticed as aforesaid," but do mean "such woman whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the wife of any other man," and that the detention of such a woman with the intent therein provided is one of the offences comprehended in the section. The petitioner therefore was, in my opinion, rightly convicted. But I think upon all the facts disclosed here a sentence of one month's simple imprisonment would have been ample, and I direct that the record be so amended.

A suit for arrears of rent under s. 93 cl. (a), Act XII of 1881, was heard by a Tahsildar having the powers of and acting as an Assistant Collector. Application was made to him for an order sanctioning the prosecution of a witness for having given false evidence in the course of the trial of the suit. being of opinion that the Court of the Collector was not subordinate to it in the matter within the meaning of s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, declined to interfere. The witness then applied to the Commissioner of the Division, and that officer holding that he had no jurisdiction in the matter also declined to interfere. On application by the witness to the High Court for revision of the order of the Court of the District Judge :

Held, that the Court of a Collector when granting sanction for prosecution under s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, in respect of false evidence given in the course of the trial of a rent case from the final decision in which there was no appeal to the Court of the Judge of the District, was still to be deemed subordinate to it, within the meaning of that section, and the Court of the District Judge may be taken to be the Court to which appeals from the decisions of the collector ordinarily lie.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—This is a reference by my brother Straight to this Bench now composed of my brothers Straight, Tyrrell and myself. In a suit for arrears of rent under s. 93, clause (a), Act XII of 1881, which was heard by a Tahsildar having the powers of and acting as an Assistant Collector of the second class, application was made to him for an order sanctioning the prosecution of a witness in the suit for perjury. The Tahsildar, thinking he had no jurisdiction, referred the matter to the Magistrate of the District, who was the Collector. The latter officer made an order sanctioning the prosecution. From that order the witness applied to the Sessions Judge to revoke the sanction. The Sessions Judge, being of opinion that the Collector was not sub-[583]ordinate to the Court of the Sessions Judge in this matter within the meaning of s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882, declined to interfere. The witness then applied to the Commissioner of the Division. The Commissioner of the Division, being of opinion that he had no jurisdiction under s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882, also declined to interfere. The witness then through counsel applied to this Court to revise the order of the Sessions Judge, the principal plea taken being that the Judge of Gorakhpur had jurisdiction to hear the application to revoke the sanction. My brother Tyrrell and I are only asked to express our opinion in the matter. It will be for my brother Straight to pass orders in the case. The question on which we are asked for an opinion is whether the Judge's Court is the Court to which appeals from the Collector's Court ordinarily lie. I have great difficulty in answering that question in the light of the provisions of the N.W.P. Rent Act on the subject of appeals. Under that Act one set of appeals—from a Collector's decrees in suits—goes necessarily to the District Judge. Another class of appeals—from his orders made in applications—goes necessarily to the Commissioner of the Division. In either case the course of appeal may be described as ordinary : and it is difficult to say whether the Commissioner's Court or the Judge's Court is the Court to which appeals from the Collector's Court ordinarily lie. It would be inconvenient to hold that, in cases arising out of s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Court to which applications to set aside or to grant a sanction given or refused in the Court below should be made should have to be determined by a consideration of the question of the forum of appeal in the particular matter in which the perjury is alleged to have been committed. It has been suggested by my brother Tyrrell that the framers of s. 195, as amended in 1882, had in mind the normal course of appeals in a district, as provided, for example, in Act VI of 1871, rather than the appellate provisions of peculiar local or special Acts, and that for the purposes of s. 195 the Court of the Judge of the District may be taken to be the Court to which appeals from the Collector's Court ordinarily lie. I think we may come to this conclusion, but I must say that I doubt whether the framers of s. 195 of Act X of 1882 had present to their minds the difficulty or ambiguity in this respect arising out [584] of the provisions of the Rent Act XII of 1881. The reference will be returned to our brother Straight with our opinion thereon.

STRAIGHT, J.—I agree.

TYRRELL, J.—I agree. It was held by a Full Bench (1) of this Court that a Court of Revenue was a Civil Court within the meaning of ss. 468 and 469 of Act X of 1872, which are replaced by s. 195 of the present Code. It is true that those sections did not contain the provision that "every Court shall be deemed to be subordinate only to the Court to which appeals from the former Court ordinarily lie." But the reasons for holding that a Collector trying a suit under the Rent Act is a Civil Court for the purposes of Chapter XXXV of the former Code of Criminal Procedure seem to me to retain all their original force and to be unaffected by the alterations introduced in the corresponding Chapter XV of the present Code. And this being so, I think that the normal course of appeal applicable to civil cases was contemplated in the clause containing the words "the Court to which appeals from the former Court ordinarily lie." Moreover, as a very substantial part of a Collector's judicial work under our Rent Act is appealable only to the District Judge (s. 189, Act XII of 1881, and s. 191 id., where the District Judge is indicated as the Court of "regular appeal" from a Collector's decree in "all suits mentioned in s. 93"), I do not discern a sufficient reason in the mere fact that the Collector's orders in certain cases (s. 196) are not appealable to the Judge but to the Commissioner, for departing from the rule and practice we laid down in Q. E. v. Sabsukh (1).

The arguments from convenience preponderate largely in favour of the local and more accessible jurisdiction. [Upon this expression of opinion Straight, J., set aside the order of the District Judge declining jurisdiction and directed him to restore the application for revision from the Collector's order to his file and dispose of it according to law.]

[R. 21 M.L.J. 57 (61).]

THIS was a suit to enforce the right of pre-emption in respect of the sale of a plot of land situated in muhalla Saraogian, or of the Saraogis, in qasba Kandhla, zila Muzaffarnagar. The plaintiff based this claim on the custom of the town. Both the lower Courts gave the plaintiff a decree. The defendant vendee appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and TYRRELL, J.—This was a suit for pre-emption. The plaintiff alleges generally in the plaint that by reason of his co-sharership he was entitled to a pre-emptive right with regard to the property, and that he had made the necessary demand. By the written statement the defendant denied that there was any custom. The custom has been found on the evidence, some of which was oral, namely, that of the inhabitants of the town. Other evidence which was put in consisted of sale-deeds relating to sales in which the right was enforced, but without the assistance of the Courts of law. Another class of evidence consisted of decrees in suits relating to property in the town, by which the right of pre-emption was recognised and enforced. For the defendants, witnesses were called who [586] gave a general denial of the existence of the custom. Those witnesses could not mention any instance in which a claim of pre-emption had been successfully resisted.

It is said that the decrees to which I referred were not admissible in evidence. It appears to me that they were the best evidence of instances in which the right was recognised. They are to my mind the most satisfactory evidence, because they are the result of decisions in cases in which one party alleged the custom and the other denied it. The Courts having heard the evidence decided in favour of the custom. As those decrees were not in suits between these parties, they were not conclusive, but they were excellent evidence to show that the right was asserted in the town by other persons and was recognised by the lawfully constituted legal tribunals. We have been referred to the Full Bench judgment of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Gujju Lal v. Fateh Lal (1). That case does not bear on the question here. There the question between the parties was as to the right to recover possession of particular property, and the judgment that was sought to be made use of was a judgment in a suit to which the plaintiff was not a party. That the judgments such as we have here are admissible in evidence of the local custom was established by the case of Koodoottoollah v. Mohinee Mohun Shaha (2). That was a pre-emption suit, and the custom there sought to be established was a custom of pre-emption. In the case of Sheo Churn v. Goodur (3) the learned Judges of this Court considered that instances of an enforcement of a custom were good evidence. The most satisfactory evidence of an enforcement of a custom is a final decree based on the custom. If we want further authority, it is to be found in the case of Lachman Rai v. Akbar Khan (1), in which case the learned Judges considered that proof afforded by judicial record was amongst the most cogent evidence of an existing custom and that it had been enforced. Judicial records in England not between the same parties have been admitted as evidence of the existence of local customs.

It appears to us that the learned District Judge was fully authorised in finding that the custom of pre-emption existed in [587] the town. It is said that there was no evidence of the custom having existed or of its having been enforced in this particular part of the town or muhalla. That in our judgment is immaterial. The custom applied to the whole town and the greater included the less. There was no evidence that the custom did not apply to this particular ward.

The remaining question is as to the price. The sale-deed stated the price at Rs. 2,500. The Judge found that the true price was Rs. 1,500. It was proved that Rs. 2,500 had been paid in the presence of the Registrar, but there was evidence that immediately afterwards Rs. 1,000 of that sum was returned to the vendee, and there was evidence that the vendor and vendee had said that Rs. 1,500 was the price. That was a question for the Judge, and we cannot interfere with his finding.

There is one point which we have omitted to mention, that is, it is contended that the plaint is bad because it does not specifically set out what the custom was. No doubt it would have been more regular if the custom had been specifically defined in the plaint, but the parties were put to no inconvenience. Each side called evidence, one to the custom and the other to rebut it.

We are of opinion that there is no sufficient reason to warrant us in disturbing the judgment of the Court below. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

S. 14 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) does not contemplate cases where questions of want of jurisdiction arise from simple ignorance of the law, the facts being fully apparent, but is limited to cases where from bona fide mistake of fact the suitor has been misled into litigating in a wrong Court. The phrase "other cause of a like nature" in the section is vague, and cannot be held to release a person from the obligation to know the law of the land.

The decree in this suit was passed by the Subordinate Judge as the Court of first instance on the 31st March, 1886. Against the decree the plaintiff preferred an appeal to the District Court on the 1st July, 1886, and on the 11th December, 1886, the District Court returned the memorandum of appeal filed in that Court to the plaintiff upon the ground that the subject-matter in dispute was above Rs. 5,000. The plaintiff then on the 20th December, 1886, presented the memorandum of appeal to the High Court, and it was admitted, subject to the consideration by the Bench determining the appeal of any question as to its admissibility, after the period of limitation prescribed for presentation of appeals to the High Court. Upon the hearing of the appeal, the respondent objected to the appeal being entertained, on the ground that it was presented beyond the period of limitation.

Held, that no sufficient cause being shown for the delay in the presentation of the appeal, the appeal must be dismissed.

Balwant Singh v. Gumani Ram (1) explained.

The entertainment of objections under s. 561 of the Civil Procedure Code is contingent and dependent upon the hearing of the appeal in which such objections are taken, and when that appeal itself fails, is rejected, or dismissed without being disposed of upon the merits, the objections cannot be entertained either.

Cas. 207, Cons., 19 A. 348 (352)=17 A.W.N. 86.]

THE plaintiffs and the defendants carried on a trading business under certain written articles of co-partnership, and according to which the plaintiffs were the proprietors of one-third of the business and the defendants of the remaining two-thirds. Disputes and differences arising between the partners, the plaintiffs requested the defendants to settle the partnership accounts and wind up the business, but the defendants not showing any readiness to do so, the plaintiffs instituted this suit. They prayed the Court to decree a dissolution of the partnership and that the accounts of the said partnership business might be taken by the Court and the assets thereof realised, and that each party might be ordered to pay into Court any balance due from him upon such partnership accounts being taken, and that the debts and liabilities of the partnership might be paid and discharged, and that the costs of the suit might be paid out of the partnership assets, and the balance might be [589] divided between the parties according to the terms of the agreement and in the event of the assets being found to be insufficient, the parties might be ordered to contribute in such proportion as should be just to a fund to be raised for the payment and discharge of debts, liabilities, and costs. The plaintiffs also prayed for such other reliefs as the Court might think fit to grant. The approximate value of the claim was laid at Rs. 2,000.

The defendants raised several pleas, the only one material for the purposes of this report being as follows:—An inspection of the account books of the firm would show and prove that Rs. 34,000 were due to the firm from the traders and many other respectable persons of Azamgarh, for which, under the provisions of the contract of partnership, the plaintiffs were and should be responsible, until the whole amount were received by the firm; and that Rs. 23,354-10-3 were due from the plaintiffs, who had appropriated the same. Moreover, the plaintiffs should settle the accounts of the profits.

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Azamgarh) laid down the following among other issues, viz.,—"with reference to the accounts entered in the books and papers of the joint firm and the articles contained in the agreement which is admitted, how much is due from one party to the other?" Finally on the 31st March, 1883, he decreed dissolution of partnership, appointed a receiver to collect all the partnership estates and effects, and ordered a sale of the stock in trade, and he further decreed and ordered that the plaintiffs should pay to the defendants the sum of Rs. 8,041-7-0 within one month of the date of the decree, with costs and interest.

Against this decree the plaintiffs on the 1st July, 1886, preferred an appeal to the Court of the District Judge, and on the 11th December, 1886, the memorandum of appeal was returned to them to be presented to the proper Court on the ground that the subject matter in dispute was above the value of Rs. 5,000.

On the 20th December, 1886, the plaintiffs presented the said memorandum of appeal to the High Court, and the appeal was admitted subject to the consideration of the Bench determining the appeal of any question as to the presentation of the appeal after the period prescribed therefor by law. The respondents to the appeal [590] filed objections to the decree appealed from, under s. 561 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

At the hearing of the appeal the respondents objected to the appeal being entertained on the ground that the same was not presented to the Court within the time prescribed by law for presentation of appeals to the High Court, and the appellants answered by urging that the time during which they were bona fide prosecuting their appeal in the Court of the District Judge should be excluded from the computation of the period of limitation, and that under those circumstances they were entitled to the indulgence allowed by s. 5 of the Limitation Act.

JUDGMENTS OF THE COURT IN THE APPEAL.

STRAIGHT, J.—This appeal relates to a suit which was instituted by the plaintiffs-appellants before us in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Azamgarh upon a plaint which, alleging a partnership as subsisting between the plaintiffs and the defendants, prayed for the following relief:—"That the plaintiffs pray the Court to decree a dissolution of the partnership, and that the accounts of the said partnership trading may be taken by the Court and the assets thereof realized, and that each party may be ordered to pay into Court any balance due from him upon such partnership-account, and that the debts and liabilities of the partnership may be paid and discharged, and that the costs of the suit may be paid out of the partnership assets, and that any balance remaining of such assets, after such payment and discharge and the payment of the said costs, may be divided between the plaintiffs and the defendants according to the terms matter ceases, because it is specifically provided by s. 216 of the Civil Procedure Code that in matters of this kind, where a set-off has been claimed and a decree has been passed in favour of the defendant, the amount of that decree in the defendant's favour determines the forum of appeal. The decree of the Subordinate Judge, being for a sum in excess of Rs. 8,000, in favour of the defendants, it is obvious therefore that the appeal of the plaintiffs did, according to the terms of s. 216 of the Civil Procedure Code, lie to this Court and not to the Court of the District Judge, and in going to that Court they made a mistake of law, for which, according to the ordinary rules, they are not entitled to be excused.

It has been argued on behalf of the appellants that looking to the difficulty of the question which has involved us in so much discussion here, this is another indication that their action in going to the District Court should be regarded as a not unreasonable mistake, and that they, though acting erroneously, acted with perfect bona fides in the matter. It does not appear to me that there is any adequate or sufficient explanation offered here to us to justify us in extending the indulgence mentioned in s. 5 of the Limitation Act. They are supposed, or those who advise them are supposed, to know the provisions of the statute, and to be aware that under its terms, if an appeal is preferred, it has to be preferred to a particular Court. It is no excuse merely to say that they preferred their appeal to a wrong Court by mistake. As regards the interval of time which elapsed between the 11th December, when the memorandum was returned, and the 20th December, when it was presented to this Court, the case is absolutely bare of any explanation at all as to that delay. Under all the circumstances I am of opinion that it has not been made out to my satisfaction that the appellants acted bona fide in this matter, or that they have shown any good cause for granting them the indulgence mentioned in s. 5 of the Limitation Act. That being so, I have come to the conclusion that the objection of Mr. Conlan to the hearing of this appeal is entitled to succeed, and the appeal must be and is dismissed with costs.

MAHMOOD, J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion as my learned brother. But because in the course of the argument upon [595] the preliminary point raised by Mr. Conlan in this case as to the hearing of the appeal, there was not full accord between the view which I was inclined to take of the case and that which my learned brother was inclined to take, I think it necessary to state the exact reasons why I have arrived at the same conclusion.

So far as the preliminary point is concerned, the arguments of Mr. Conlan, on the one hand, and that of Pandit Ajudhia Nath, on the other, raise two questions for consideration, both questions being only part and parcel of one and the same point, that is, whether this appeal has been presented within the time provided by art. 156, sch. ii, Limitation Act, and whether the provisions of s. 5 of the Limitation Act would justify us in extending the ordinary period of limitation. The decree from which this appeal has been preferred was a decree passed on the 31st March, 1886, and this appeal was not preferred to this Court till the 20th December, 1886, that is to say, long after the period of limitation provided by the article to which I have referred. It is clear that in administering the rule of limitation we are bound to administer it in two manners only, either as a lax system, the periods of limitation to be held in terrorem over the heads of the litigants and to be modified, varied or fluctuating according to the individual views or wishes of the Judges, or as definite rules of law, giving to the population for whom those laws have been framed a guarantee that after a lapse of a certain period they may rest in peace and rely upon titles or other rights which they have acquired. This is a matter upon which many judgments have been delivered in England and other civilized countries. In India the question as to the exact manner in which such statutes should be administered was, no doubt, fully considered by the Legislature in framing s. 4 of the Limitation Act, which gave expression not to a modifiable, variable or fluctuating rule, but to a very definite rule, namely, "every suit instituted, appeal presented, and application made, after the period of limitation prescribed therefor by the second schedule hereto annexed, shall be dismissed, although limitation has not been set up as a defence." That rule, stringent as it is, is subject to the other provisions of the enactment, among which s. 5 is no doubt an important provision. It was in connection with the manner in which the statutes of limitation should be [596] interpreted that, in delivering my judgment in the case of Mangu Lal v. Kandhai Lal (1), I went out of my way to give as definite an expression as I could to the view, following the language of Mr. Justice Story, that statutes of limitation were statutes of repose and that they should be administered, not in a variable manner, but as strictly as possible, in order to strengthen the repose at which they aim. That same ratio was the reason why in the case of Husaini Begam v. The Collector of Muzaffarnagar (2) I applied the period of limitation as against a Muhammadan pardahnashin lady who had not chosen to come within the proper period. In that case I had the misfortune to differ with my learned colleague, but the judgment which I delivered was upheld in appeal (3).

To the views which I then expressed I still adhere; and in determining this case I shall base my judgment upon the solitary question whether or not the present appellants have preferred this appeal within time, even taking the indulgence of the provisions of s. 5 into account. Now it has been argued on behalf of the appellants by Pandit Ajudhia Nath upon the authority of the ruling to which my learned brother has referred in Balwant Singh v. Guman Ram (4), that the provisions of s. 14 of the Limitation Act, are virtually imported into s. 5 of the Limitation Act, and that when there has been a bona fide prosecution of a case in a Court having no jurisdiction, such circumstance ipso facto amounts to a rule of protection with reference to such cases, so as to entitle the appellants to deduct from the period of limitation such period as has been spent in litigation in a wrong Court. My brother Straight has already stated that that is not the effect of that ruling, and I do not understand it to amount to any thing more than this, that the considerations mentioned in s. 14, Limitation Act, are or may be elements for consideration whether the delay is or is not to be excused within the meaning of s. 5 of the Limitation Act. Beyond that I am not prepared to go, because I hold that the provisions of s. 14 are not applicable to limitation for appeals, but to limitation for original suits and applications. If I were to hold otherwise, I should be crediting the Legislature with a surplusage, namely, the surplusage of framing s. 5 notwithstanding s. 14.

[597] The question then is, is this appeal barred by limitation or not; and for the purposes of determining this, there is no doubt that, even giving the appellants the benefit of such analogical principles as are contained in s. 14, we have to determine whether or not the action of the present plaintiffs-appellants in going to the Court of the District Judge of Azamgarh was or was not a bona fide one. The expression bona fide, which is translated in English as "good faith," is not exhaustive, and is defined in the last part of s. 3 of the Limitation Act, where it is said "nothing shall be deemed to be done in good faith which is not done with due care and attention." Did the plaintiffs in this case act with due care and attention when they in this suit, notwithstanding the fact that the decree was for an amount exceeding Rs. 8,000, went up to the District Judge, instead of coming up in first appeal to this Court, from the decree of the 31st March, 1886? Indeed, Pandit Ajudhia Nath on behalf of the appellants conceded, and he could not well do otherwise, considering that the order whereby the appeal was returned by the District Judge to the appellants was never contested in any proceeding, and that this appeal has been finally preferred to this Court, that the appeal would lie to this Court, and that this Court was the proper Court to entertain such an appeal.

In connection with the question of bona fide, however, the learned pleader has argued that the provisions of s. 14 of the Limitation Act are so broad as to include within their scope, not only mistakes of fact, but also mistakes of law. The learned pleader has gone the length of contending that in the present case, although the appeal would lie here, it was an innocent mistake made by the appellants to go to the Court of the District Judge with their appeal.

I am of opinion that, so far as this contention concerns mistakes of law, the authority of the maxim, Ignurancia legis neminem excusat, has been so formally settled both in England and India that it would be the shaking of established authority to maintain that ignorance of law or mistakes of law are reasons for the excuse, and, as such, furnish elements for extending the period of limitation which the statute law has provided.

In my opinion s. 14 of the Limitation Act itself does not contemplate cases where questions of want of jurisdiction arise from [598] simple ignorance of the law, the facts being fully apparent and clear, but is limited to cases where from bona fide mistakes of fact the suitor has been misled into litigating in a wrong Court. The phrase "other cause of a like nature" which occurs in the section is rather vague, but it cannot be held to undo the effect of the constitutional obligation which the law imposes upon every citizen to know the law of the land in which he lives.

But the learned Pandit went further in supporting the case of the appellants, and he contended that in the present case jurisdiction did properly lie in the Court of the Judge of Azamgarh. This is an argument which is inconsistent with the fact of this appeal having been finally filed here. But I have listened to it with care, because, as I hold, we are bound to see whether the learned Judge of Azamgarh was not the proper authority to hear the appeal and whether we as the Judges of the High Court have any jurisdiction to hear the appeal. The whole contention so far as this part of the argument is concerned rests entirely upon the interpretation of s. 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure read with the later s. 216 of the same Code. The plaintiffs came into Court assessing by estimate the value of their claim to be Rs. 2,000, and a further relief was also prayed that such balance as might be found due to the plaintiffs might be made over to them. The suit as brought was no doubt a suit for dissolution of partnership, a claim which neither in the Courts of equity nor in the Courts of law can be decided without the taking of accounts. As I understand, in such an action, both in England and in India, the ordinary relief prayed for and the ordinary decree made is that upon such accounts being taken the balance should be made over to the parties to whom such sums might be due. I mention this, because unless this suit falls under the category of a suit for money within the meaning of s. 111 of the Civil Procedure Code, I should have had considerable difficulty in deciding whether or not we, as the High Court, are the proper Court of appeal in this case. The suit is, in my opinion, a suit for money, within the meaning of this section; because the illustrations which the Legislature has provided to that section show that, no matter what the title may be, no matter whether such title arises ex delicto or ex contractu, so long as the relief sought is to recover money, it is a suit for money, and such [599] a plea of set-off may be raised within the meaning of that section. There are cases cited by Mr. Conlan: Kishorchand Champalal v. Madhowji Visram (1), Bhagbat Panda v. Bambeb Panda (2), Kistnasamy Pillay v. The Municipal Commissioners of the Town of Madras (3), in which Courts of justice in India have extended the rule, and have held that the provisions of that section are not exhaustive, and the Courts of justice have allowed set-off in those cases. Whether I am prepared to adopt and go the whole length of the rules therein laid down it is not necessary for me to say. But I am clearly of opinion that this present suit was a suit for money, and that it was a suit which would admit of a set-off.

In this case the defendants came into Court not denying the partnership, but setting up accounts of their own, and alleged that as the results of those accounts the defendants were entitled to a decree for a sum of Rs. 23,000. It was, indeed, in consequence of such a plea of set-off that the Court below in acting under that section took accounts, and as the result of that account gave the defendants a decree exceeding a sum of Rs. 8,000. It could not be understood to have been a decree which would ordinarily be appealable to the District Judge of Azamgarh, because the jurisdiction of the District Judge in appeal is limited to Rs. 5,000 (vide s. 22, Act VI of 1871). There seems therefore no reason to think that this decree was other than such as s. 216 of the Civil Procedure Code contemplates, and in respect of which the second paragraph of that section is fully applicable. That paragraph says:—"The decree of the Court with respect to any sum awarded to the defendant shall have the same effect, and be subject to the same rules in respect of appeal or otherwise, as if such had been claimed by the defendant in a separate suit against the plaintiff." Here the decree being beyond the jurisdiction of the Judge, clearly the appeal lay here.

There is no explanation supported by affidavit or otherwise why this appeal was not duly preferred in due and proper time directly from the judgment of the Subordinate Judge. But even if it be granted that the period during which the appeal was pending in the Court of the District Judge of Azamgarh be excluded, there is [600] no explanation why between the dates mentioned by my brother Straight sufficient diligence was not employed by the appellants to come to this Court with their appeal. I hold, therefore, that the decree now appealed from was a decree appealable only to this Court, and that the appeal should have been preferred within the period prescribed by art. 156, sch. ii, Limitation Act; and that not having been so preferred, the delay which has taken place is not duly explained, and that the appeal is therefore barred by limitation; and I agree with my brother Straight in dismissing the appeal with costs.

JUDGMENT DISPOSING OF OBJECTIONS.

[The judgment of the Court disposing of the objections taken by the respondents was as follows :—]

MAHMOOD, J.—The question which has arisen to-day relates to certain objections taken by Pandit Sundar Lal's clients, the defendants-respondents in the suit, to the decree of the lower appellate Court, under s. 561, Civil Procedure Code. By reason of the judgment of my brother Straight and myself, the appeal in which these objections were raised was dismissed yesterday, not upon the merits, which were never heard, but upon the ground that the appeal should not have been admitted, because it was barred by limitation. Pandit Sundar Lal argues that notwithstanding this circumstance, and notwithstanding the fact that the dismissal of the appeal was due to the objections and contentions raised on behalf of those defendants-respondents, we, as a matter of law, are bound to proceed with those objections under s. 561 and to deal with them upon their merits both as to fact and law.

There is authority in the Indian cases to be found in the cases of Baroda Kant Bhattacharjee v. Pearee Mohun Mookerjee (1) and Coomar Poresb Narain Roy v. Watson and Co. (2), where it was held that when an appeal is dismissed for default, the hearing of objections under s. 348 of Act VIII of 1859 cannot be allowed to proceed, and similarly it has been held that where an appeal is withdrawn the same is the effect upon the cross-objections. The same is the effect of the case of Bahadoor Singh v. Bhugwan Dass (3) and of the case of Dhondi Jagannath v. The Collector of Salt [601] Revenue (4), which case was followed with my concurrence by Oldfield, J., in Maktab Beg v. Hasan Ali (5).

I take the effect of these various cases to be that the entertainment of objections such as s. 561, Civil Procedure Code, contemplates, is contingent and dependent upon the hearing of the appeal in which such objections are raised, and that when the appeal itself fails, is rejected or dismissed without being disposed of upon the merits, the objections follow its fate, and cannot be entertained either.

Pandit Sundar Lal has argued that this exact point has never yet been ruled, because, as the learned pleader contends, here the appeal was heard, though it was dismissed upon the ground that it was barred by limitation. This contention may at first sight appear to be supported by the ratio decidendi of the ruling of the Madras High Court in Venkataramanaiya v. Kuppi (6), which was followed by the Bombay High Court in Dhondi Jagannath v. The Collector of Salt Revenue (4), but in my opinion those cases are inapplicable because there the object of withdrawing the appeal aimed at preventing the respondent, after the hearing of the appeal had commenced, from insisting upon his cross-objections. Under such circumstances, withdrawal of an appeal being a matter within the volition of the appellant, the Court was probably right in hearing the cross-objections notwithstanding the withdrawal. Here the plea of limitation is fatal to the hearing of the appeal upon the merits, and the plea has been taken by the respondents themselves, and being a plea in limine barring the hearing of the appeal upon the merits, we have given effect to it as we are bound to do under s. 4, Limitation Act, and have not heard the appeal upon the merits. Like the privilege of set-off in original actions, and I say this only analogically, the Legislature has thought fit to confer upon the parties respondents in appeal the right of being able to raise objections such as s. 561 contemplates. The practical effect of such objections is that they are in themselves appeals to be dealt with as such, but the privilege is qualified by very serious considerations. One consideration is that such objections are not subject to the same period of limitation as appeals. In the next place, [602] they may be argued as against the decree of the Court below itself, although from that decree no appeal has been preferred. These rights were not intended to be used in such a fashion as to be available to the respondent who apparently accepted the terms of the decree of the Court of first instance, and who never wanted to appeal therefrom, and it was only after the opposite party had appealed that he raised objections. We have already held that the original appeal of the plaintiffs in the suit could not be heard on the merits, as it was barred by limitation, and were we to allow these objections to be dealt with now separately and irrespective of that appeal, we should be practically holding that an appellant who prefers an appeal long after the prescribed period of limitation, may confer upon the respondent the right of having an appeal of his own heard in the shape of objections under s. 561, Civil Procedure Code, although, if the original appeal was barred by limitation, a fortiori such objections ought to be barred also.

I am of opinion that the ratio decidendi of the cases which I have cited applies as much to cases where an appeal is rejected or dismissed, as this appeal was dismissed by us yesterday, upon the ground that it could not be entertained because it was barred by limitation.

It is therefore not necessary for us to enter into those objections, and they are rejected with costs.

BHAGWAT DAS (Plaintiff) v. PARSHAD SINGH (Defendant).
[25th May, 1888.]

Mortgage—Redemption before expiration of term—Mortgagor entitled to redeem before expiration of term unless mortgagee can show that the term binds mortgagor—Usufructuary mortgage.

No such general rule of law exists in India as would preclude a mortgagor from redeeming a mortgage before the expiry of the term for which the mortgage was intended to be made, unless the mortgagee succeeds in showing that by reason of the terms of the mortgage itself, the mortgagor is precluded from paying off the [603] debt due by him to the mortgagee. Where parties agree that possession of any property shall be transferred to a mortgagee by way of security and repayment of the loan for a certain term, it may be inferred that they intended that redemption should be postponed until the end of the term, though the creation of a term is by no means conclusive on the point.

The term fixed for payment of a debt should be presumed to be a protection only for the debtor till a contrary intention is shown.

THIS was a suit for redemption of a usufructuary mortgage made on the 15th December, 1876, by two persons, Udit Singh and Musammat Maharaji, in favour of one Mohar Singh. On the 19th of August, 1878, the mortgagors conveyed their equity of redemption to Bhagwat Das, the plaintiff in the suit. Both the lower Courts dismissed the suit, and on appeal to the High Court, the point for contention was whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to redeem the mortgage before the expiry of the stipulated period for redemption mentioned in the instrument of mortgage.

The material clause in the instrument of mortgage, and the facts as well as the arguments of counsel are fully set forth in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. G. T. Spankie, for the appellant.

Mr. S. Howell, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MAHMOOD, J.—In order to explain the question of law which arises in this case it is necessary to state the following facts:—

On the 15th December, 1876, two persons, Udit Singh and Musammat Maharaji, borrowed a sum of Rs. 100 from one Mohar Singh, deceased, (represented in this litigation by the defendants-respondents) and executed a mortgage-deed in his favour. The nature of the mortgage was usufructuary, and under its terms the mortgagee was to be placed in possession and to appropriate the profits of the mortgaged property in lieu of interest, the rate whereof is not specified in the mortgage-deed. The principal part of the deed, so far as the question in appeal is concerned, runs as follows:—

"We have now delivered the possession of the mortgaged zemindari share to the mortgagee. Neither shall we claim profits and mesne profits from the date of the mortgagee's possession, nor shall the mortgagee claim interest on the debt. We shall pay the principal mortgage money in 15 years (asl zar-i-rahn arsa pandrah [604] baras men ada karengen). If upon the stipulated promise we are unable to pay the mortgage-debt above mentioned, then whenever we repay the principal mortgage-money at the end of Jaith in any year, the mortgaged property shall be redeemed."

The mortgagee was accordingly placed in possession, and on the 19th August, 1878, the aforesaid mortgagors, Udit Singh and Musammat Maharaji, executed a sale-deed whereby they conveyed their rights and interests in the mortgaged property to the present plaintiff, Bhagwat Das.

Upon the title so derived, the plaintiff instituted the present suit on the 15th June, 1886, with the object of obtaining possession of the mortgaged property by redemption on payment of the sum of Rs. 100 mortgage-debt above-mentioned.

The only ground upon which the suit was resisted is that it was premature, inasmuch as it was instituted before the expiry of the term of 15 years specified in the mortgage-deed of the 15th December, 1876.

Both the Courts below in interpreting that document have arrived at the conclusion that the term of 15 years was binding as much upon the mortgagor as upon the mortgagee, and upon this ground they held that the right to redeem could not accrue before the expiry of the stipulated term of 15 years, and that the action was therefore premature and should be dismissed.

From the decree of the lower appellate Court this second appeal has been preferred, and Mr. Spankie in arguing the case for the appellant has addressed a learned argument to me upon the contention, that, in the first place, the Courts below have misconstrued the mortgage-deed, and in the next place, even if their construction be accepted to be correct, the plaintiff as representing the equity of redemption, is entitled to redeem the mortgage even before the expiry of the term of the mortgage; because, as the learned counsel contends, such terms must be understood to be stipulations for the protection of the mortgagor, and so long as the mortgagee receives all that is due upon the mortgage he cannot resist such a suit.

This contention is opposed by Mr. Howell on behalf of the defendants-mortgagees, and the contention of the parties therefore [605] raises two points for determination; one relating to the interpretation of the mortgage-deed, and the second as to the rule of law applicable to such suits.

1888) 263.

Upon the first of these points, having consulted the terms of the mortgage-deed in the original Hindustani, I am of opinion that the parties intended that the mortgage should continue at least for a period of 15 years, after which it would become redeemable. The Hindustani words "arsa pandrah baras men" may no doubt be interpreted to mean "within a period of 15 years," but followed as those words are by the phrase wadha par, "at the promised time," they cannot have any meaning other than that 15 years was the term fixed for the mortgage. Mr. Spankie's contention would involve the conclusion that the term of 15 years need never have been mentioned at all, as the mortgage was redeemable at any time according to his contention. I cannot give the parties credit for any such surplusage, there being nothing in the document to justify such a construction. On the contrary, as I have already said, the phrase wadha par, "at the promised period," must refer to the expiry of 15 years, for otherwise the sentence which immediately follows, which provides that in subsequent years the mortgage would be redeemable at the end of any Jaith, would also become superfluous.

Then as to the latter part of Mr. Spankie's argument—I am not aware of any such general rule of law as would go the length of laying down that in all cases and in all circumstances the term for which a mortgage is executed is binding only upon the mortgage and that the mortgagor can enforce redemption even before the expiry of the stipulated period. A mortgage is only a kind of contract whereby certain rights and obligations are created as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee. Such rights and obligations may be subjected to any terms and conditions not prohibited by law, and the fixation of any particular period as the term of the mortgage or as the time when redemption is to take place is not such a stipulation as the law prohibits. Indeed, Mr. Spankie himself conceded that the term of 15 years mentioned in the mortgage-deed was binding upon the mortgagee, so as to preclude him from foreclosure or any other remedy which he may have for recovery of the mortgage-[606] debt before the lapse of that time. But the learned counsel argues that in the absence of any express covenant in the mortgage-deed to the effect that the same shall not be redeemable before the expiry of 15 years, the presumption of law is that the term was intended only for the protection of the debtor, i.e., the mortgagor.

I think there might have been considerable force in this contention, if the nature of the mortgage and the terms of the deed did not preclude it. The relation between the mortgagor and the mortgagee is that of debtor and creditor, and redemption is the process by which the debt due on the mortgage is paid off. When in such a contract of mortgage a term of payment is fixed, the ordinary rule would be the same as in regard to a term of payment fixed in any other kind of obligations of debt. Upon this point Pothier in his treatise on Obligations (Vol. I, p. 132) has the following:—

“It remains to observe, concerning the effect of a term, that being presumed to be inserted in favour of the debtor, the debtor may very well defend himself from payment before the expiration of the term, but the creditor cannot refuse receiving if the debtor is willing to pay, at least unless it appears from the circumstances that the term was appointed in favour of the creditor, who is the holder, as well as of the debtor.”

This, then, being the general principle, I have to consider how it is applicable to mortgages. In Vadju v. Vadju (1) Westropp, C. J., following the authority of Brown v. Cole (2) and some Indian cases, held that the right of redemption and the right of foreclosure are co-extensive, in the absence of any stipulation, express or implied, to the contrary, and that in such cases when a day is fixed for payment, the mortgagor is not at liberty to insist on redemption before the expiration of the period named. In that case the mortgage deed stipulated that the mortgagor would pay the mortgage-debt within ten years and redeem the mortgaged property, and the suit having been brought before the expiry of that term, the learned Chief Justice held that the suit was unsustainable because prematurely instituted, and that the mere use of the word “within” was not a sufficient indication of the intention of the parties that the mortgagor might redeem in a less period than the ten years mentioned in the mortgage-deed. The same question was considered by Turner, C. J., in Sri Raja Setrucherla Ramabhadra Raju Bahadur v. Sri Raja Vairicherla Surianarayanaraju Bahadur (3) upon somewhat broader principles than the rule of the English law as to the right of redemption and the right of foreclosure being presumed to be co-extensive, with reference to the period mentioned in the mortgage-deed for payment of the mortgage-debt, and the ratio decidendi adopted in that case seems to me to be scarcely in full accord, upon minor points, with the views upon which the judgment of Westropp, C. J., in Vadju v. Vadju (4) proceeded. To put the matter briefly, the general effect of the Bombay case is to lay down that the mere fixation of a term for paying off the mortgage-debt is to be presumed to be binding as much upon the mortgagor as upon the mortgagee unless the contrary is clearly shown, whilst the effect of the Madras case is that where the mere fixation of the term occurs in a mortgage-deed, the presumption is that the date is fixed for the convenience of the debtor, and that he may repay the debt at an earlier period, unless the mortgagee could show that any such stipulations existed between him and the mortgagor as would debar the latter from redeeming the mortgage before the expiry of the term mentioned in the mortgage. In other words, whilst Westropp, C. J., would have the presumption as to the binding effect of the term of mortgage in favour of the mortgagee, Turner, C. J., would presume in favour of the mortgagor that the mortgage was redeemable at any time, unless the mortgagee could show from the nature of the mortgage or other circumstances that redemption should not be allowed before the expiry of the time mentioned in the mortgage-deed. The two cases are, however, undistinguishable so far as the result is concerned, because in both cases the mortgage appears to have been of a usufructuary nature, in which the term of the enjoyment of the possession of the mortgaged property seems to have formed a substantial part of the terms of the mortgage itself, as was also the case in Soorjun Chowdhry v. Imambundee Begum (1). The same principle, however, appears to have been extended by a Division Bench of this Court in Raghubar Dayal v. Budhu Lal (2) to simple mortgages or hypothecation bonds in which a term of years is stated as the period of payment of the mortgage-debt, and in doing [608] so the learned Judges seem to have adopted in its integrity the rule laid down by Westropp, C. J., in Vadju v. Vadju (3), where, as I have already said, the nature of the mortgage being usufructuary, the period of enjoyment of possession by the mortgagee would form a substantial part of the contract, lending force to the contention that such possession and enjoyment could not be put an end to at the will of the mortgagor before the expiry of the term for which the mortgage was made.

Having so far referred to the principal rulings bearing upon the subject I have no hesitation in adopting the ratio decidendi upon which the judgment of Turner, C. J., in Sri Raja Setrucherlar Ramabhadra Raju Bahadur v. Sri Raja Vairicherla Surianarayanaraju Bahadur (4) proceeded, for, as I understand, that judgment enunciates no such rigid principle as that adopted by Westropp, C. J., in Vadju v. Vadju (3) that redemption and foreclosure are co-extensive in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary.

I have already said that the relation between a mortgagor and mortgagee is that of a debtor and creditor respectively, the main distinction between a simple debt and a mortgage-debt being that, whilst in the former case the obligation to pay the money is a simple personal obligation, in the latter a security of property is given as the means whereby such obligation is to be discharged. The difference rests, not in the essence of the contract but in the modus operandi agreed upon by the parties in respect of discharge of the obligation of the debt. In the case of a simple debt, the law provides a suit resulting in a simple money-decree to be executed or enforced in such manner as the rules of procedure for the time being prescribed. In the case of a mortgage-debt, the remedies of the mortgagee-creditor for realising his debt may lie either in foreclosure, or in obtaining possession of the mortgaged property, or in bringing such property to sale, according as the terms of the mortgage contract itself may be. But whether the debt is a simple money-debt or a debt secured by mortgage, one element is common to them all, namely, that before the obligation can be extinguished it must be discharged by payment or by such other methods as are appropriate to the nature of the obligation.

[609] This being the common element of the obligation to pay a debt, the fixation of any particular period for discharge of the obligation must necessarily be governed by the same principles. Parties to a contract of debt, as indeed parties to any other class of contracts, are at liberty to enter into any stipulations as to the time, place, and mode of discharging such obligations so long as such stipulations are consistent with the law of the land where they are made. The fixation of a period for discharge of a debt is nothing more or less than one kind of such stipulations, and I am not aware of any rule of law which would prohibit a debtor from stipulating that the debt should not be demandable from him before the expiry of particular period, nor of any rule which would prohibit a creditor from stipulating that the debt due to him will not be received by him till after the expiry of any particular period. Where such stipulations are already expressed no such difficulties arise as those in this case, for, if here the mortgage-deed of 15th December, 1876, expressly stated that the mortgagor could not redeem the mortgage before the expiry of the 15 years term mentioned therein, this litigation would probably never have been commenced. But the mortgage-deed contains no such stipulation in express language, and the Courts have to decide whether any such stipulation was implied in the contract of mortgage.

In the present case I am of opinion that because the terms of the mortgage itself do not expressly state that the mortgage shall not be redeemable (that is, the mortgage-debt shall not be paid off) before the expiry of the 15 years mentioned therein, it rested upon the mortgagee to show that he is entitled to decline to receive payment of the mortgage-debt before the expiry of that period. With all respect due to the ruling of Westropp, C. J., in Vadju v. Vadju (1) which was followed by a Division Bench of this Court in Raghubar Dayal v. Budhu Lal (2), I am of opinion that no such general rule of law exists in India as would preclude a mortgagor from redeeming a mortgage before the expiry of the term for which the mortgage was intended to be made, unless indeed the mortgagee succeeds in showing that by reason of the terms of the mortgage itself the mortgagor is precluded from paying off the debt due by him to the mortgagee, and, to use the [610] language of Turner, C.J., in Marana Ammanna v. Pendyala Peru-botulu (3), "it requires a clear expression of intention to deprive a mortgagor of his right to redeem at any time on payment of the debt." I respectfully think that the rule that the right of redemption and the right of foreclosure are co-extensive and coincident, as to the time when these rights may be respectively exercised by the mortgagor and the mortgagee, is not a rule recognised by the law of mortgage, at least in this part of the country. As I take the law, both these rights rest upon the terms of the mortgage itself, and considering that the juristic reasoning as stated by Pothier requires that a term fixed for payment of a debt should be presumed to be a protection only for the debtor till the contrary is shown, I hold that in this case it rested upon the mortgagee to show why he is justified in declining to accept all that is due to him upon the mortgage, though the offer of such payment is made before the period of 15 years at the end of which the mortgagor, at the time of the mortgage, as interpreted by me, expected to be able to pay off the mortgage-debt.

But whilst holding these views upon the principles of law applicable to such payment of debts, I am of opinion that in the present case the mortgagee has succeeded in showing that, by reason of the very nature of the mortgage and the circumstances of the contract, he is entitled to resist redemption on the ground that the period of 15 years mentioned therein must be taken to form a material part of the contract itself, and to have been named not only for the protection of the mortgagor-debtor but also for that of the mortgagee-creditor. The mortgage was of a usufructuary character, in which no rate of interest on the mortgage-debt was specified, and the mortgagee, whilst entitled to possession and the appropriation of profits in lieu of interest, had to run the risk of appropriating only such profits as he could recover during the period of his possession of the mortgaged property, so that, to use the words of Turner, C. J., in the case already cited, "the continuance of the enjoyment of the mortgaged property for a prescribed period forms a material part of the contract," and "it would be inequitable to deprive the mortgagee of this right on the mere ground that the contract was one of mortgage;" and I agree with [611] what was said by him in the same case that "where parties agree that possession of the property shall be transferred to a mortgagee for a certain term it may be inferred that they intended that redemption should be postponed until the end of the term," though "the creation of a term is by no means conclusive on this point."

In this view of the case I am of opinion that the lower Courts were right in interpreting the terms of the mortgage-deed of the 15th December, 1876, and that they were right in holding that this suit for redemption, which was brought before the expiry of the term of 15 years stipulated as the promised date of redeeming that mortgage, was premature and, as such, not sustainable.

I dismiss this appeal with costs.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Straight and Mr. Justice Mahmood.

GIRDHAR LAL AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. BHOLA NATH AND OTHERS (Defendants).* [14th June, 1888.]

Mortgage—Usufructuary mortgage—Covenant by the mortgagor to pay the mortgagee arrears of rent due at the time of redemption—Payment by mortgagee of arrears of revenue—Right of mortgagee to reimbursement before redemption—Act IV of 1882 (Transfer of Property Act), s. 72 (b).

On the 27th August 1883, M and B jointly executed two usufructuary mortgages for the sums of Rs. 3,000 and 5,000 respectively in favour of the defendants. On the 24th March, 1886, the mortgagors executed another usufructuary mortgage in favour of the plaintiffs for Rs. 15,000, entitling them to possession of the property mortgaged. The second mortgagees instituted a suit to redeem the prior mortgages by depositing in Court the principal sum of Rs. 8,000. The defendants urged that a sum of Rs. 4,000 was due to them besides the principal amount, without payment of which the property in suit could not be redeemed. The Court found that a sum of Rs. 498-15-9 only composed of certain arrears of rent, and an item of arrears of Government revenue paid by the defendants, was due to them, and decreed redemption of the property on condition of payment of the aforesaid sum. Both the parties appealed.

Held that the items of arrears of rent were recoverable under the covenant contained in that behalf in the mortgage deeds; as to the item for arrears of Government revenue, it was clear that unless this revenue was duly paid the whole estate might have been sold to realise it, thereby putting an end to all the rights of the mortgagors and mortgagees; and therefore upon the general principles of law upon which the doctrine of salvage and subrogation proceeds, persons in the position of mortgagees in possession are entitled to claim that sum before the property which they saved from sale for arrears of revenue could be redeemed.

[612] Held further, that s. 72 of the Transfer of Property Act only reproduces the rules of law which Courts of justice in India have uniformly adopted.

JUDGMENT.

JUNE 14.

LATE
CIVIL.10 A. 611=
8 A.W.N.
(1888) 238.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts of this case are simple, and may be briefly stated for the purpose of disposing of this appeal. On the 27th August, 1883, Musammatt Bibi Makundi Dei and Bishambhar Nath executed a mortgage-deed, whereby they mortgaged the property now in suit to Dhani Ram and Chakkhan Lal for a sum of Rs. 3,000, and the mortgage was of a usufructuary character. Among the covenants contained in the mortgage-deed was the following:—

“At the time of redemption, we shall pay along with the mortgage-money whatever amount of arrears of rent may be found due from tenants at that time. The mortgagees shall, to the best of their abilities, take care of the fruitful and unfruitful trees.”

On the same date the aforesaid Bibi Makundi Dei and Bishambhar Nath executed another usufructuary mortgage-deed in favour of the same defendants for a sum of Rs. 5,000, under exactly the same conditions, including the covenant as to payment for arrears of rent which I have already above-mentioned.

On the 24th March, 1886, the aforesaid mortgagors, Bibi Makundi Dei and Bishambhar Nath, executed another usufructuary mortgage-deed in favour of the present plaintiffs, Lala Girdhar Lal, Shigopal and Radha Kishen, for a sum of Rs. 15,000, entitling the second mortgagees to possession of the property in suit.

These second mortgagees have come into Court in this case with the object of redeeming the two mortgages of the 27th August, 1883, and their claim as such is maintainable, because they are puisne incumbrancers seeking to redeem an earlier incumbrance.

The suit was resisted by the first mortgagees upon various grounds; but those which we have to consider in connection with this appeal are that over and above the principal sum of Rs. 8,000 which formed the consideration of the two mortgages of [613] even date, namely, the 27th August, 1883, a sum of about Rs. 4,000 was due to the mortgagees, and that without the payment of such sum no redemption could take place.

The Court of first instance in dealing with this litigation has decreed the claim for redemption, holding that besides the principal sum of mortgage-money of Rs. 8,000 which had already been deposited by the plaintiffs under the special provisions of the Transfer of Property Act, the sum of Rs. 498-15-9 was still due under the two mortgages of the 27th August, 1883. This sum consisted of four items, which were the following:—

	Rs.	a.	p.
1. Arrears for 1292 and 1293 F. on account of mauza Ataus	...	165	3 6
2. Arrears for 1292 and 1293 F, on account of mauza Khaki	...	122	2 0
3. Arrears for 1293 F. on account of mauza Khutwari	...	68	1 9
4. Government Revenue for the village	...	143	8 6
Total Rs.	...	498	15 9

The lower Court upon this finding held that before the plaintiffs could sue for redemption as puisne mortgagees they were bound to pay up not only the principal sum of Rs. 8,000, but also this additional sum of

Rs. 498-15-9 which I have mentioned above; and that Court also directed that the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs should be recovered from the defendants.

From this decree this first appeal has been preferred by the plaintiffs; and the main contention which has been pressed upon us by Mr. Banerji is that the decree of the lower Court is wrong in so far as it renders the decree for redemption subject to the payment of the aforesaid sum of Rs. 498-15-9. In supporting the appeal the learned counsel relies upon the terms of the mortgages of the 27th August, 1883, and he contends that inasmuch as those mortgages did not mention anything expressly as to the payment of any sum of money due over and above Rs. 8,000, which was the amount of the principal mortgage-money, therefore the payment [614] of this additional sum could not be made a condition precedent to a decree for redemption.

I am of opinion that this contention is unsound. In the first place, so far as the first three items above mentioned by me are concerned, there is a distinct clause in the mortgages of the 27th August, 1883, which entitles the mortgagees to claim the arrears of rent as a part and parcel of the mortgage-money, or, to say the least, such arrears of rent (to use the words of the deed itself), as would be found due from tenants at that time, became in fact part and parcel of the mortgage-money itself, and the decree of the Court below was sound.

As to the 4th item, the Government revenue amounting to Rs. 143-8-6, it is true that this sum was a sum paid by the mortgagees in respect of arrears of revenue antecedent to the 27th August, 1883, but the revenue fell due after this mortgage. It is clear that unless this revenue was duly paid not only would the mortgagees lose their rights but the mortgagors themselves would also cease to have any right in the property; because arrears of revenue may result in a sale such as would put an end to all the rights, not only of the first mortgagees, as well as of the second mortgagees, but also to the mortgagors' rights. Under these circumstances, though the terms of the mortgage-deed of the 27th August, 1883, are silent upon the point, yet the general law upon which the doctrine of salvage and subrogation proceeds, and the principles of which have been uniformly adopted by the Courts of India, lays down that persons in the position of the present defendants as mortgagees in possession are entitled to claim that sum before the property which they saved from sale for arrears of revenue, could be redeemed. Such a right no doubt cannot be exercised by a person not interested in the property. But here there is no question that these two mortgages gave to the defendants in this action such interest in the property as would entitle them to spend the money to save that property.

It is not necessary to decide whether this particular case is governed by the specific rules contained in the Transfer of Property Act, because I am of opinion that the rules contained in s. 72 of that enactment only reproduce the doctrines which the Courts of [615] justice in India have uniformly adopted, and it reproduces the older law. Clause (b) of s. 72 read with the earlier part of the section enacts:—"When, during the continuance of the mortgage, the mortgagee takes possession of the mortgaged property, he may spend such money as is necessary—(b) for its preservation from destruction, forfeiture or sale;" and the antepenultimate paragraph of that section goes on to say he "may, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, add such money to the principal money, at the rate of interest payable on the principal, and where no such rate is fixed, at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum." So far as the question of the rate of interest is concerned, it is not necessary to determine it; because no interest is claimed upon Rs. 143-8-6 paid as arrears of revenue. But I hold that the principle to which I have alluded entitles the defendants-mortgagees to make that a part and parcel of the mortgage-money, the payment whereof should be a condition precedent before they are ousted from the mortgaged property.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that this appeal No. 101 of 1887 fails and should be dismissed.

(The learned Judge then proceeded to dispose of the connected appeal preferred by the defendants, and to dismiss the same, ordering that both appeals should be dismissed without costs of the High Court.)

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Brodhurst and Mr. Justice Mahmood.

KAURI THAKURAI (Defendant) v. GANGA NARAIN LAL AND OTHERS

Landholder and tenant—Agreement by occupancy tenant to relinquish his holding—Agreement not enforceable—Suit for specific performance of agreement—Jurisdiction of Civil Courts.

The defendant, who was a tenant with a right of occupancy in the land cultivated and held by him, executed a kabuliat in respect of the said land in favor of the plaintiffs (his landlords), agreeing that on the expiry of the term fixed in the kabuliat he should have no claim to retain possession of the cultivatory holding, but that he should give it up. Plaintiffs sued for ejectment of the defendant on the basis of the [616] agreement, and obtained a decree from the lower appellate Court. On second appeal by the defendant.

Held that inasmuch as the plaintiffs sought to enforce the covenant contained in the kabuliat in such a manner as to extinguish the rights of occupancy found upon the facts of the case to have been acquired by the defendant in the land in suit, such suit must fail, as opposed to the policy of the law as shown in the provisions of s. 9 of the Rent Act (Act XII of 1881). Such a tenant may be ousted from his holding by enforcement of the remedies given in that behalf in s. 95 (d) and (f), but not in the manner sought by the plaintiff in this action.

THE plaintiffs in this case were the zamindars of mauza Kahkaha in the district of Gorakhpur. The defendant was a tenant with rights of occupancy in certain land situate in the mauza. It appeared that previous to the mutiny in 1857, the defendant was admittedly a person who owned the mauza, but owing to his misconduct during the disturbances of the mutiny, his rights and interests in the mauza were confiscated by Government; and the proprietary rights therein came to the plaintiffs by right of purchase.

On the 29th June, 1874, the defendant executed a kabuliat in respect of the land in suit in which he agreed to relinquish it at the end of five years, the wording of the clause being to the following effect: "On the expiry of the term he (defendant) shall have no claim or excuse for retaining possession of the cultivatory holding, but he shall give it up." This kabuliat appears to have been preceded by a decree of the Revenue Court passed in 1870 in favour of the plaintiffs ordering ejectment of the defendant from the land in suit, but there was no evidence to show that the defendant had ever been ejected; on the contrary he continued to pay rent to the plaintiffs and remained their tenant, till at the last settlement he got his name recorded as a tenant with rights of occupancy in respect of the land in suit. The plaintiffs then brought this suit in the Court of the Munsif of Bansgaon for possession of the land, basing their claim on the agreement contained in the aforesaid kabuliat.

The defendant contended that the suit was not cognizable by the Civil Court; that he had been in continuous possession of the land for more than 12 years, and had thereby acquired rights of occupancy in the land in suit, and that the agreement in the kabuliat to surrender the land after five years was void in law.

[617] The Munsif, holding that the suit was cognizable in the Civil Courts, dismissed it on the ground that the agreement in effect was a transfer of the defendant's rights of occupancy, and that as such a transfer was prohibited by s. 9 of the Rent Act (XII of 1881), the agreement was not enforceable. On appeal by the plaintiffs the Subordinate Judge gave them a decree, holding that the agreement did not operate as a transfer of the right of occupancy, and was enforceable at law. He referred to Lalji v. Nuran (1).

The defendant appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

BRODHURST and MAHMOOD, JJ.—The plaintiffs in this case are admittedly the zamindars of the land in suit, and the defendant, Kauri Thakurai, is admittedly a person who formerly owned the village, and was in cultivation of certain lands, when, in consequence of his misconduct during the disturbances of the mutiny of 1857, his rights and interests in the village were confiscated by Government, and the proprietary rights came by purchase to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs came into Court alleging that a few years after the confiscation the defendant-appellant was ousted, and that, by an agreement or kabuliat, dated the 29th June, 1874, executed by the defendant, the latter agreed to cultivate those lands for a period of five years, and in executing that document entered into a covenant that after the lapse of five years he, the defendant, would vacate the land.

It appears from the judgment of the lower appellate Court that the agreement or kabuliat continued, and the defendant remained upon the land as a tenant paying rent to the plaintiffs. The kabuliat above mentioned appears from the same judgment to have been preceded by a Revenue Court's decree, passed in 1870, for ejectment of defendant; but, as Mr. Ram Prasad for the appellant states, there is not a particle of evidence to show that the decree for ejectment was executed, or that the defendant was ousted from the land in suit. On the other hand, it is conceded that he [618] continued to pay rent to the plaintiffs, and, for all purposes, to occupy the status of a tenant towards the landlord.

The plaintiffs appear to have made an application to the Revenue Court in respect of the mutation of names, with the object of having it recorded that the status of the defendant was not that of an occupancy-tenant, but only that of a tenant at will. On the 24th December, 1885, it was decided by the settlement officer that the defendant's position was that of a tenant with a right of occupancy, inasmuch as he had cultivated the land continuously for a period exceeding twelve years, and that decision was upheld by Mr. LaTouche, as the Court of appeal, on the 14th April, 1886. In that judgment it was found that "the parties admitted the status of the defendant to be that of an occupancy-tenant, he having cultivated the land for more than twelve years."

The present suit was begun on the 16th June, 1886, in the Civil Court by the plaintiffs-zamindars, with the object of enforcing the covenant contained in the kabuliat of the 29th June, 1874, whereby the defendant had covenanted, in taking the lease, that he would vacate the land at the end of five years. Some argument has been addressed to us as to whether or not such a suit was one cognizable by a Court of civil jurisdiction as distinguished from a Rent Court, within the meaning of s. 95 of the Rent Act (XII of 1881). Mr. Ram Prashad argued that the nature of the suit was such as was contemplated by clauses (d) and (f) of s. 95 of Act XII of 1881, but we are of opinion that this contention is unsound, because here the nature of the prayer in the plaint was not that of ejectment, but it was a prayer which required consideration whether the covenant contained in the kabuliat of the 29th June, 1874, could be regarded as valid. The suit was therefore of a civil nature, and in this view we are supported by the ruling in Lalji v. Nuran (1), to which the lower appellate Court has also referred.

The same ruling has, however, been understood by the lower appellate Court as justifying the conclusion that because the present defendant in executing the kabuliat of the 29th June, 1874, promised to vacate the land at the end of five years from that date, therefore he should be so ejected. One of us was a party to that [619] judgment, and, reading the ruling as we do, we are of opinion that the case is no authority for maintaining that where a person already possessing a right of occupancy promises to vacate the land at some future period (in this case it was five years), such action is to be regarded as a contract of relinquishment. All that the case laid down was that an occupancy-tenant, or indeed any kind of tenant, could, if he pleased, leave the land alone and relinquish it so as to render the right of the landlord available to him for the purpose of securing the cultivation of the land.

Here it was admitted before the settlement officer by the respondents in the case to which reference has already been made, that the defendant was an occupancy-tenant at the time when the kabuliat of the 29th June, 1874, was executed. Such right no doubt depends on continuous cultivation extending beyond twelve years, and in giving rise to the right the provisions of s. 6 of the old Rent Act (X of 1859,) were no doubt applicable. But at the time when the kabuliat was executed, namely, the 29th June, 1874, there existed the Rent Act (XIII of 1873), the policy of which enactment was to prevent the extinction of occupancy-tenure, so much so that s. 9 of the enactment, reproduced in Act XII of 1881, prohibited transfer of such tenures; or, in other words, continued the right of occupancy to one who would hold on to the land and continue to cultivate it.

(1) 5 A. 103.

This is not therefore a case in which there has been any actual relinquishment of the tenure by the defendant, because, as a matter of fact, he has not relinquished the tenure. This is not a case in which the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties is denied by either of the parties to the litigation. This is a case in which the right of landlord and tenant being admitted, the plaintiffs seek to enforce the covenant contained in the kabuliat of the 29th June, 1874, in such a manner as to extinguish the rights of occupancy which are found, upon the facts of the case, to belong to the defendant.

In our opinion such a suit cannot prevail. The policy of the law was to make occupancy-tenures firm, to give fixity of tenure to those who had cultivated the land for a period exceeding twelve years, and there are provisions in the Rent Act of 1859, as also [620] in the Rent Act of 1873 and again in the present Rent Act of 1881, which go to show that such tenures are regarded with care by the Legislature, and that the ouster of persons having rights of occupancy is not to be allowed even where persons having such rights promise to relinquish the land under an agreement such as that of the 29th June, 1874. The Court therefore could not have enforced the ejectment of the defendant. The Court of first instance was therefore right in dismissing the claim as to the enforcement of the forfeiture clause of the kabuliat of the 29th June, 1874.

Mr. Madho Prasad, in defending the appeal, has asked us to remand the case for trial of the specific question as to whether or not the decree of 1870 was ever executed, and as to the various questions arising from it, with reference to the rights which the plaintiffs as zamindars may have in connection with the land and against the defendant-appellant. We are of opinion that the relation of landlord and tenant being admitted, proved, and shown in the case, and also the kabuliat of the 29th June, 1874, upon the ground of which alone such a suit could be maintained in the Civil Court, the remaining questions as to whether the defendant could be ousted is a matter, not for the Civil Court to determine, but for the Rent Court to deal with. There may be such remedies as clauses (d) and (f) of s. 95 of Act XII of 1881 contemplate, and those remedies may still be open to the plaintiffs-respondents. They may, having admitted the defendant to be their tenant, either seek to enhance the rent, or seek to recover payment of such rent, or upon failure of such payment to enforce a decree for ejectment. These are questions for the Rent Court and not for the Civil Court, and we are not concerned with them. The result of this view is to decree the appeal, and reversing the decree of the lower appellate Court to restore that of the Court of first instance with costs in all the Courts. We order accordingly.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[621] Before Mr. Justice Brodhurst and Mr. Justice Mahmood.

UPMANI KUAR (Plaintiff) v. RAM DIN AND OTHERS (Defendants).*
[18th June, 1888.]10 A. 621 =
8 A.W.N.
(1888) 243.Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz—Clause fixing price in case of sale to a co-sharer—Agreement running with the land—Pre-emptor entitled to take property on payment of price fixed in wajib-ul-arz.

The pre-emptive clause in the wajib-ul-arz of a village contained the provision that the right of pre-emption could be enforced on payment of such sum as would represent the "kimat-i-muravvajah," that is, according to current rates. A suit for pre-emption was brought against the vendor and vendee of a certain fractional share in the village, and the plaintiff claiming the benefit of the above provision disputed the price entered in the sale deed as the proper price for the share according to current rates.

Held, following Karim Bakhsh Khan v. Phula Bibi (1), that a co-sharer was entitled to purchase the share sold at a price to be ascertained according to the rule in that behalf contained in the wajib-ul-arz and the condition in the wajib-ul-arz regarding the price to be paid for the share sold was binding on the land and therefore binding on the stranger vendee.

[R., A.W.N. (1908) 98.]

THE plaintiff in this case, Musammatt Upmani Kuar, and the defendant, Khurshed Jahan, were co-sharers of the village Makhapur in the district of Azamgarh. The defendant, Khurshed Jahan, by a sale-deed dated the 21st May, 1885, sold a nine pies share in the village to the other defendants Ram Din and two others for the sum of Rs. 825, which was entered in the sale-deed as the price. The covenant of the village wajib-ul-arz relating to enforcement of the right of pre-emption contained the following provision for assessment of the price, viz., that the right of pre-emption could be enforced on payment of such a sum of money as would represent the "kimat-i-muravvajah," that is, price according to current rates. The plaintiff instituted this suit to enforce his right of pre-emption in respect of the share sold by the defendant, Khurshed Jahan, and contended that the price entered in the deed of sale, viz., Rs. 825, was fictitious and that the same should be calculated with reference to the rule for ascertaining the price as laid down in the pre-emptive clause in the wajib-ul-arz, and he maintained that Rs. 350 would be the real price.

The Munsif of Azamgarh, finding that the plaintiff had failed to prove either that the market value of the property was only [622] Rs. 350 or less than Rs. 825, accepted the latter sum as the "correct amount of the consideration money," and accordingly decreed the claim for pre-emption in favour of the plaintiff, subject to payment of Rs. 825.

The plaintiff appealed to the District Judge of Azamgarh, who dismissed the appeal. The main part of his judgment was as follows:—

"The lower Court did not hold the wording of the wajib-ul-arz as binding upon the parties; and I agree in this view of the lower Court; besides this, there is no reliable evidence that only Rs. 350 were paid, so if plaintiff wishes to buy the property, she must do so for Rs. 825."

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court, and contended that the lower Court had erred in law in not adopting the rule laid down in the wajib-ul-arz for ascertaining the price.

ORDER OF REMAND.

MAHMOOD, J.—The property to which this litigation relates is a nine pies share in mauza Makhapur, of which the plaintiff and the defendant, Khurshed Jahan, were co-sharers. On the 21st May, 1885, Khurshed Jahan executed a sale-deed in favour of Ram Din and other defendants, whereby he sold the above mentioned nine pies share for a price which is stated in the sale-deed to be Rs. 825.

The plaintiff thereupon instituted this suit to enforce her right of pre-emption in respect of the above mentioned sale, and in her claim she alleged that the sum of Rs. 825 had fraudulently and collusively been entered in the sale-deed to defeat her right of pre-emption; that the price actually paid was only Rs. 350; that according to the pre-emptive clause of the wajib-ul-arz of the village the right of pre-emption could be enforced on payment of such sum of money as would represent the "kimat-i-murav-vajah," that is, price according to current rates; that such current rate was to calculate the price at 8 annas per cent. profit; and to support her [623] contention she produced a bujharat of 1292 Fasli, showing that the annual profits of the nine pies share amounted to Rs. 21-1-8.

The suit was resisted by the vendor, Khurshed Jahan, defendant, on the allegation that he sold the property for Rs. 825 after the plaintiff had refused to purchase the share. Ram Din and others, vendees-defendants, took the same plea, and they further pleaded that the market value of the property in suit was Rs. 825, which they had paid as the consideration of the sale.

The Court of first instance held that refusal by the plaintiff to purchase the property was not proved; that the plaintiff had failed to prove either that the market-value of the property was only Rs. 350 or less than Rs. 825; that this last sum must, therefore, be taken as the "correct amount of the consideration-money and the same should be paid by the plaintiff." The Court accordingly decreed the claim for pre-emption subject to payment of Rs. 825.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed to the lower appellate Court upon grounds which impugned the judgment of the first Court as to the amount of purchase-money and the principle upon which it should be calculated. The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court dismissed the appeal and the main part of his judgment is thus worded:—

"The lower Court did not hold the wording of the wajib-ul-arz as binding upon the parties; and I agree in this view of the lower Court; besides this, there is no reliable evidence that only Rs. 350 were paid, so if plaintiff wishes to buy the property, she must do so for Rs. 825."

The plaintiff has preferred this second appeal, contending that in determining the price of the property in suit the lower appellate Court has erred in not following the terms of the wajib-ul-arz as to the "kimat-i-muravvajah" or the current rate; and that that Court has omitted to decide the exact amount of the price actually paid for the property in suit.

Mr. Abdul Majid, in supporting the appeal, has confined his argument to these two points, and contends that the decision of the lower appellate Court must be taken to proceed upon the preliminary point that the terms of the wajib-ul-arz as to the assessment of the price were not binding upon the parties, and that [624] therefore that Court has not tried the case upon the merits. On the other hand, Mr. Moti Lal, who appears for Mr. Juala Prasad, on behalf of the respondents, argues that the judgment of the lower appellate Court must be read so as to incorporate the findings and conclusions of the first Court, and so read, the case must be treated as having been tried upon the merits, leaving no room for second appeal.

I am of opinion that the appeal has force and that the case has not been tried upon the merits by the lower appellate Court, as that Court's judgment proceeds upon the view that the terms of the wajib-ul-arz as to the assessment of the price for pre-emptive purposes were not binding upon the parties. The question is no doubt one not altogether free from difficulty, when regarded as a general question of law, whether such covenants run with the land so as to bind purchasers who may or may not have notice of such covenants. The covenant may amount only to an obligation annexed to the ownership of immovable property, but not amounting to an interest therein, and in this light the covenant would fall under the class of obligations which have been well described in the second paragraph of s. 40 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), or, to use the language of jurisprudence, the right created by such a covenant would fall under the category of jus ad rem as distinguished from jus in rem; and if it be so, then the equitable doctrine of notice would come into play in dealing with such questions where bona fide transferees for value are concerned.

I am, however, relieved from entering into this somewhat difficult question by a long course of decisions in respect of such covenants when found in the pre-emptive clause of the wajib-ul-arzes in these Provinces. In Chotey v. Bulla (1), Hakeem Maher Ali v. Premsookh (2) and Balesur Aheer v. Pudarut Singh (3), the late Sadar Diwani Adalat of these Provinces laid down the rule that a condition in the wajib-ul-arz securing to co-sharers a right of pre-emption at a fixed sum per bigha, without reference to the actual price paid by a stranger, however, unusual and inexpedient, must be enforced, when its enforcement is claimed by a co-sharer. In laying down this rule the learned Judges do not seem to have [625] considered how far the doctrine of notice would affect the question when raised against bona fide transferees for value, and I can well imagine why in Akbar Singh v. Juala Singh (4), in dealing with a similar covenant, my brothers Straight and Tyrrell confined the effect of such covenants only to disputes as to price between the pre-emptor and the vendor, and would not extend the effect of such covenants to bona fide purchasers for value.

The case-law stood thus when a Full Bench of this Court in Karim Bakhsh v. Phula Bibi (5) had to consider the same question, and they unanimously arrived at the conclusion that covenants in the wajib-ul-arz as to the assessment of price for purposes of pre-emption run with the land so as to bind purchasers, that a pre-emptor co-sharer could enforce such a covenant both against the vendor and the vendee, and that if the stranger vendee had paid more than was payable according to the wajib-ul-arz, he was entitled to recover the surplus from the vendor. In delivering his judgment in that case my brother Tyrrell distinguished the ruling in Akbar Singh v. Juala Singh (1) to which I have already referred, and he adopted the Full Bench ruling in Hasrat Khan v. Jeobadh Upadhia (2) which is, so far I am aware, the latest ruling on the subject.

In none of the cases to which I have referred (and I am not aware of any other ruling) does the exact nature of the right created by covenants in the wajib-ul-arz as to the assessment of price for pre-emptive purposes appear to have been either argued or considered, with reference to the applicability of the equitable doctrine of notice to bona fide transferees for value, nor does it appear that the question how far such covenants are enforceable in law as opposed to public policy in consequence of derogating from the value of immovable property was considered or decided; and I confess that if the matter was res integra I should have considered it my duty to have considered these points before giving such unqualified effect to covenants as to price contained in the wajib-ul-arz as against transferees for value, the more so as I cannot help feeling that such covenants are opposed to the very nature of the right of pre-emption.

[626] The matter, however, as I have shown is not integra and the balance of authority of the case law which culminated in the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Karim Bakhsh Khan v. Phula Bibi (3) is entirely in favour of the appellant's case, for it goes the length of holding that irrespective of notice such covenants in the wajib-ul-arz run with the land and are enforceable against bona fide purchasers for value, whose only remedy is to recover the surplus from the vendor, that is, such money as may have been paid by the vendee over and above the price assessed according to the wajib-ul-arz. The ruling is binding upon us, and in accordance therewith I hold that the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court was wrong in law in holding that the terms of the wajib-ul-arz as to the enforcement of pre-emptive right on payment of price at the current rate was not binding upon the parties, and that he should have tried the case upon the merits with reference to the terms of the wajib-ul-arz above mentioned. In other words, he should have gone fully into the merits of the whole case in order to ascertain the exact current rate at which such property is sold. The circumstance that the defendants vendees paid any particular sum as the price of the property may no doubt form an element of consideration as to the exact market-value of the property with reference to the current rate at which such property is sold. But according to the Full Bench ruling above mentioned, the circumstance that the defendants-vendees actually paid Rs. 825 or even a lesser sum, as the price of the property, would not per se render the decree for pre-emption subject to payment of the price actually paid.

The lower appellate Court has not tried the case upon the merits with reference to these considerations, and under the circumstances I would decree this appeal, and setting aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, remand the case to that Court for trial upon the merits. Costs to abide the result.

BRODHURST, J.—For the reasons stated by my brother Mahmood, I concur with him in allowing the appeal, in setting aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, and in remanding the case to that Court for trial upon the merits.

The plaintiffs in a suit denounced in the plaint their two signatures to a sale-deed as forgeries, and never alleged that they witnessed it under pressure. The Court of first instance found them to be genuine, and the lower appellate Court, while agreeing with the Court below in its findings upon the question of the genuineness of the signatures, observed that they were obtained under pressure, and so reversed the decree of the Court below. On second appeal to the High Court.

Held that Courts are not to raise important and serious issues in a case for the parties when they have not raised it themselves by their own pleadings in the cause.

[D., 12 A. 556 (558).]

SALAMAT-ULLAH Khan, Wali-ullah Khan, and Sakhawat-ullah Khan were three brothers owning jointly several zamindari villages and other lands and houses. By a partition and division between the brothers by means of an arbitration award, all their joint property was divided between them, and each brother became separate and undivided owner of the zamindari village land and houses allotted to him, and the award further provided that in case of sale or transfer by any of the parties of the property so acquired by him in severalty, the other parties should have a right of pre-emption. By this partition mauza Bahori, tahsil Pawayan, was allotted to Wali-ullah Khan, the defendant, and his name was recorded in the revenue papers as proprietor of the said mauza.

By a sale-deed dated the 6th March, 1885, Wali-ullah Khan conveyed 5 biswas out of the entire 20 biswas of the said mauza and another plot of land which he also held in severalty, to Muhammad Iftikhar-ullah Khan in the sum of Rs. 2,000, and the plaintiffs, who each the sons of Salamat-ullah Khan, signed the deed as witnesses.

The plaintiffs then brought this action to enforce their right of pre-emption in respect of the aforesaid sale, alleging also at the same time that they were not among the witnesses to the sale-deed and that the signatures purporting to be theirs on the deed were not genuine.

The defendants contested the suit on various grounds, and maintained that the signatures on the sale-deed purporting to be those of the plaintiffs as witnesses thereto were genuine.

[628] The Subordinate Judge of Shahjahanpur, who tried the suit in the first instance, fixed several issues for determination arising out of the material allegations of the parties, and one of them was, "Were the signatures to the sale-deed affixed by the plaintiffs themselves, or had the defendants forged them without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, and how will these signatures affect them?" Finding in favour of the defendants upon this issue as well as on the several other issues in the case, he dismissed the suit. On appeal by the plaintiffs to the District Judge, that officer upon this particular issue found as follows:—"I also agree with the Subordinate Judge that the plaintiffs did really sign the deed of sale or gift, or whatever it may be considered to be. It has been held—Rajlakhi Debi v. Gokul Chandra Chowdhry (1) that the mere attestation of a deed of sale by a relative does not necessarily import his concurrence. In this case the defendant, uncle of the plaintiffs, no doubt used his family influence to obtain the signature of the plaintiffs to his deed of sale, and I see every reason to believe that such signatures were obtained under compulsion and with no real intention or concurrence in the transaction or of waiver of any right. The plaintiffs did not intend to surrender any right when they signed the deed, and it was simply, to my mind, to relieve themselves from the importunities of their uncle that they affixed their signatures to the deed.” On the other issues in the case he found in favour of the plaintiffs and decreed their claim, but without costs.

On second appeal to the High Court by the defendants, it was contended, among other things, that the finding of the District Judge, that the plaintiffs signed the sale-deed as witnesses under compulsion, was opposed to their own statement in their plaint wherein they denounced their signature as forgeries.

Mr. G. E. A. Ross, the Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath, and Mr. Zahur Husain, for the appellants.

The Hon. T. Conlan and Mr. W. M. Colvin, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and TYRRELL, J.—This is a pre-emption suit. The plaintiffs, who claim a right of pre-emption, had signed the sale-deed as witnesses. As to that part of the case their allegation in the plaint was that they had not signed the sale-deed, and that their signatures were forgeries. The Subordinate Judge and the District Judge found that the signatures of the plaintiffs to the sale-deed were their genuine signatures. The Subordinate Judge found that the plaintiffs knew to what the sale-deed related, and he dismissed the suit. The District Judge allowed the appeal on the finding that the plaintiffs had witnessed the deed in question under pressure. There was no such issue raised on the pleadings in the case, and no such issue was before the District Judge. The simple issue on this point was—were those signatures the genuine signatures or not of the plaintiffs? The plaintiffs did not allege in their plaint that they had signed the sale-deed under pressure or that they did not know what the contents of the sale-deed were. The issue which the District Judge found in their favour was a very serious issue, and of that class of issues, which, in our opinion, the Privy Council has more than once pointed out, should not be raised by the Judge for the parties when they had not raised it themselves. In the Privy Council case referred to by the District Judge—Rajlakhi Debi v. Gokul Chandra Chowdhry (1), the mere proof of the signature of a witness to the document was, we think properly, if we may say so, held to be no evidence that he knew what the contents of the document were. On the findings on the issue raised by the parties by their pleadings, to which we have referred, the plaintiffs had no cause of action. The appeal is allowed, and the suit is dismissed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

*Before Mr. Justice Straight, and Mr. Justice Tyrrell.*ZALIM GIR (Defendant) v. RAM CHARAN SINGH (Plaintiff).* [16th July, 1888.]Mortgage—Payment by mortgagee by conditional sale of prior mortgage—Decree obtained by intermediate simple mortgagee for sale—Mortgage by conditional sale foreclosed—Intermediate simple mortgagee not entitled to sell without paying first mortgage.

B made two mortgages, dated respectively the 10th October, 1871, and 10th October, 1872, of his zamindari property in favour of P. On 27th January, 1874, B [630] mortgaged 117 bighas 7 biswas and 10 dhurs of sir and cultivatory land belonging to his zamindari for Rs. 700 to the defendant. On 10th September, 1877, B made a conditional sale of his zamindari property to the plaintiff for Rs. 4,500 to pay off the two charges created in favour of P. On the 10th August, 1878, B made another mortgage to the defendant for Rs. 300 of the same 117 bighas, 7 biswas and 10 dhurs. On the 9th November, 1881, defendant obtained a decree on his two bonds of the 27th January, 1874, and 10th August, 1878, and on his application for execution of the decree the property mortgaged to him was advertised for sale on the 20th November, 1883. Meanwhile the plaintiff had taken the necessary proceedings to foreclose his conditional sale, and upon the 19th March, 1883, the sale was foreclosed. On the 19th November, 1883, plaintiff instituted this suit with the object of having it declared that defendant was not entitled to bring to sale the property mortgaged to him.

Held that by the conditional sale, which became absolute upon the 19th March, 1883, the plaintiff acquired all the rights that subsisted under the two mortgages of the 10th October, 1871, and 10th October, 1872, and was entitled to press those securities in his aid as prior incumbrances to that of the defendant, for the purpose of stopping him from bringing the property to sale in execution of his decree before first recouping the plaintiff the amount which the latter found to satisfy and discharge those incumbrances.

Held further that the only right which the defendant had to bring the property to sale was upon the strength of the decree obtained in the bond of 27th January, 1874, for he had no right under the instrument in his favour of the 10th August 1878. The defendant should therefore only be permitted to bring the property to sale under his decree in respect of the mortgage of 27th January, 1874, when he had satisfied and discharged the two mortgage bonds held by the plaintiff of the 10th October, 1871, and 10th October, 1872.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—It is impossible that I can allow this litigation to linger longer in the Court. The suit was instituted as far back as November, 1883, and we are now dealing with it, after a second trial in the lower appellate Court, in the month of July, 1888. The controversy between the parties was not of a specially complicated character, and if certain unnecessary elements had not been introduced into it by the lower Court, it might have been very readily and easily disposed of. Stripped

On the 10th October, 1871, and the 10th October, 1872, one Bhairo Singh made two mortgages for money advanced to him in favour of one Panna Lal, and as security for those advances he [631] hypothecated his zamindari property. On the 27th January, 1874, Bhairo Singh mortgaged 117 bighas 7 biswas and 10 dhurs of sir and cultivatory land belonging to his zemindari for a sum of Rs. 700 to Zalim Gir, the defendant-appellant before us. On the 10th September, 1877, Bhairo Singh made a conditional sale in favour of Ram Charan Singh, the plaintiff-respondent before us, for a sum of Rs. 4,500. The necessity for the taking of that loan, as recited in the deed of conditional sale, was a pressing obligation upon Bhairo Singh, the borrower, to pay off the two charges created in favour of Panna Lal on the 10th October, 1871, and the 10th October, 1872. On the 10th August, 1878, Bhairo Singh made another mortgage for Rs. 300 of the same 117 bighas 7 biswas and 10 dhurs to Zalim Gir, the defendant-appellant before us.

Subsequently Zalim Gir brought a suit upon his two bonds of the 27th January, 1874, and the 10th August, 1878, against his mortgagor, and on the 9th November, 1881, he obtained a decree for Rs. 2,064-14-0. Zalim Gir applied for execution of his decree and the mortgaged property was advertised for sale, the 20th November, 1883, being fixed for the sale. Meanwhile Ram Charan Singh, the plaintiff-respondent, had taken the necessary proceedings to foreclose his deed of conditional sale; and upon the 19th March, 1883, the sale was foreclosed and he became the absolute proprietor of the mortgaged property, which included within it the 117 bighas 7 biswas and 10 dhurs which had been charged in favour of the defendant-appellant. The defendant-appellant having, as I have already said, notified the mortgaged property for sale, and the 20th November, 1883, having been fixed for such sale, the present suit was instituted on the 19th November, 1883, the day before the sale, with the object, to put it shortly, to have it declared that Zalim Gir was not entitled to bring the property to sale.

It is unnecessary for me to travel through the judgments delivered, first by the Court of first instance, and next by the appellate Court when it had the case first before it, and on the last occasion when it had to re-try the appeal under our order of remand. It is enough to say that, in my opinion, we must now take it as found that by the conditional sale, which became absolute upon the 19th March, 1883, the plaintiff-respondent acquired all the rights that subsisted under the two mortgages of the 10th October, 1871, [632] and 10th October, 1872, and he therefore is also in my opinion entitled to pay those securities in his aid as prior incumbrances to that of the defendant-appellant, for the purpose of stopping him bringing the property to sale in execution of his decree, unless he recoups the plaintiff for the amount which he (the plaintiff) found to satisfy and discharge those incumbrances.

It is clear that the only right, supposing he gets those incumbrances out of the way by satisfying and discharging them, which the defendant-appellant has is upon the strength of the decree obtained in reference to his bond of the 27th January, 1874, to bring the property to sale, because he can have no right whatever under the instrument which was made in his favour on the 10th August, 1878. It therefore seems to me that the proper course for us to pursue in this case is, while allowing this appeal, to modify the decree of the Court below by declaring that the defendant shall only

GOPAL DAS (Decree-Holder) v. ALI MUHAMMAD AND OTHERS

Mortgage—Decree for sale—Decree not to be treated as a money-decree—Act IV of 1882 (Transfer of Property Act), ss. 88, 89, 90.

A decree in favour of a mortgagee for sale of the mortgaged property cannot be treated as one for money. According to the Transfer of Property Act, ss. 88, 89 and 90, the mortgagee must first sell the mortgaged property, and if the net proceeds of such sale be insufficient to pay the amount due for the time being on the mortgage, and if the balance be legally recoverable from the mortgagor otherwise than out of the property sold, he may ask the Court for a decree for such balance.

[R.—9 A.W.N. 149; 12 Ind. Cas. 70 (72) = 14 C.L.J. 639 = 16 C.W.N. 132 (135).]

THE appellant in this case, a mortgagee who had obtained a decree against the mortgagors for the mortgage-money, costs, and [633] interest, and for the sale of the mortgaged property, attached certain immoveable property of the mortgagors, respondents, other than the mortgaged property. The mortgaged property had not been sold at the time. The respondents objected that the decree-holder was not entitled to proceed against the property attached until the mortgaged property had been sold. This objection the Court of first instance allowed so far as to stay any further proceedings in respect of the attached property, and to direct the decree-holder to bring the mortgaged property to sale, but it maintained the order of attachment. On appeal by the judgment-debtors the lower appellate Court ordered that the attachment should be removed. The decree-holder appealed to the High Court.

Pandit Moti Lal Nehru, for the appellant.

Mr. Amiruddin for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—I think the learned Judge was right. The appellant decree-holder had obtained a decree on his mortgage-security for sale of the mortgaged property, and it was the business of the Court executing it to proceed in the manner directed by ss. 88, 89 and 90 of the Transfer of Property Act. In my opinion, the presumption should be that immoveable property which a mortgagee has accepted as adequate security for his loan to the mortgagor will, if sold, realize enough to satisfy his charge, and this view seems to me to be borne out by the sections of the Act referred to above, more particularly by the provisions contained in s. 90. I do not think under the law as it now stands, that a mortgagee with a decree for sale of the mortgaged property, the execution of which is now specially provided for in the Transfer of Property Act, can treat such decree as one for money, which entitles him to ask for attachment of the other property of his mortgagor judgment-debtor; on the contrary, what I think the statute means and says, is, that he must first sell the mortgaged property, and if it does not fetch enough to pay his charge, interest and costs, then he may ask the Court for a decree for the money balance, if it is recoverable personally from the defendant and his other property, and execute that in the ordinary manner as a money-decree is executed. I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Suit for removal of trees—Limitation—Act XV of 1877, Limitation Act, sch. ii, Nos. 32, 120.

A suit by a zemindar for removal of trees planted in certain waste land of his village by persons who have no right to plant them, is governed by art. 120, schedule ii of the Limitation Act, and not by art. 32, schedule ii of the Act.

Where a defendant having a right to use property for a specified purpose perverts it to other purposes, and a suit has to be instituted for any relief in respect of any injurious consequences arising from such perversion, such a suit will be governed by art. 32, schedule ii of the Limitation Act.

THE defendants had planted some trees on the waste land of the village of which the plaintiffs were the zemindars, and this suit was brought to have the trees removed. The defendant contended inter alia that the trees were planted with the consent or acquiescence of the zemindars, and that the claim for their removal was barred by limitation.

The lower appellate Court found that the trees in suit were not twelve years old; that the suit was not for recovery of land, and overruling the contention of the defendant that article 32, schedule ii of the Limitation Act governed the suit, gave the plaintiffs a decree for the removal of the trees.

The defendant appealed to the High Court, and contended upon the authority of Gangadhar v. Zahurriya (1), that the suit was governed by article 32, schedule ii of the Limitation Act.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—It is admitted by the learned pleader for the defendants appellants that the learned Judge has found in specific terms that the land upon which the trees have been planted by the defendants, of which act or acts the plaintiffs complain, is the waste-land of the zemindars, and accordingly the defendants had no rights in that land, which would justify them in so planting the [635] trees. Mr. Ram Prasad has contended for the appellants that art. 32 of the Limitation Law applies to the present case, and in support of that view he has quoted the ruling of my brothers Tyrrell and Mahmood in Gangadhar v. Zahurriya (1).

It would be out of place for me to criticise that ruling if I disagreed with it, which I do not. But the facts of that case are totally distinct from the facts disclosed here. There, there was an undoubted right in the defendants, who were occupancy-tenants of the plaintiff's land, to use that land for certain specific purposes, and what the plaintiff complained of was that instead of using it as arable land, for which it had been let to them, they had converted it into a bagh or grove; consequently art. 32 was held to be applicable. Here the case is a totally different one. Upon the admission of the learned pleader for the appellants, the defendants had no right in this waste-land of the zamindars-plaintiffs under colour of which they could plant trees in the zamindars' waste; and except that they could have asserted any title by adverse possession for more than 12 years to the land, they could have acquired no right to plant trees therein. They have proved no such adverse proprietary title in the land, and all that they have sought to do, is to show that what they did, of which the plaintiffs complain, was done either with their direct leave or license or with acquiescence upon their part. Dealing with the point of limitation, I think that the learned Judge was right in applying art. 120 of the Limitation Law. The only question further that I have to determine is, when did the right to bring the suit accrue to the plaintiffs? Mr. Ram Prasad has not satisfied me that the plaintiffs' right to sue accrued more than six years prior to the date of the institution of the suit, and this view seems to have been held by the learned Judge in the Court below. That being so, I dismiss the appeal with costs.

RAHIM BAKHSH (Defendant) v. MUHAMMAD HASAN (Plaintiff).*
[5th July, 1888.]

Muhammadian Law—Gift—Hiba-bil-iwaz—Gift made in consideration of services rendered—Donor not in possession—Possession not delivered to donee—Gift invalid.

The fundamental conception of hiba-bil-iwaz, or a gift for an exchange, as understood in the Muhammadan Law, is that it is a transaction made up of two separate acts of donation, i.e., of mutual or reciprocal gifts of specific property between two persons, each of whom is alternately donor and donee. It does not include the case of a gift in consideration only of natural love and affection or of services or favors rendered. Nor does such a gift fall under the category of hiba-bil-iwaz in its improper sense of sale; but it is an ordinary gift subject to all the conditions as to validity which the Muhammadan law provides.

A gift of immoveable property not at any time in the possession of the donor, but in that of a trespasser, and consequently never delivered by the donor to the donee, is void under the Muhammadan Law. *Kasim Hossein v. It is admitted that the property to which this suit relates was originally owned by Nabi Bakhsh, who died in the year 1876, leaving a widow, Mussammat Sakina, and a son, Shakurullah, as his heirs under the Muhammadan law.

Shakurullah died on the 12th July, 1881, leaving his mother Musammat Sakina and Fateh Ali, who (as the pedigree shows) was his father's paternal uncle's son, and as such entitled to inherit a share in the estate of the aforesaid Shakurullah.

It appears that upon the death of Shakurullah, his mother Musammat Sakina, having a right of inheritance partly by inheritance from her husband Nabi Bakhsh and partly by inheritance from her son Shakurullah, remained in possession of the entire property up to the time of her death, which occurred on the 25th March, 1883.

Subsequently, that is, on the 4th May, 1883, the aforesaid Fateh Ali (whose name appears in the pedigree) executed a deed of gift, whereby he purported to convey all such rights of inheritance as he might have in the property to Muhammad Hasan, plaintiff-respondent.

In consequence of this deed of gift certain quarrels arose between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the mutation of names [3] in respect of the zamindari portion of the property, but the plaintiff's claims were rejected by the revenue authorities on the 22nd November, 1883, and the defendant appears to have maintained his possession of the entire property, which, as before said, had come into the possession of Musammat Sakina, widow of Nabi Bakhsh and mother of Shakurullah. Fateh Ali died on the 29th August, 1884.

The present suit was instituted on the 25th September, 1886, by Muhammad Hasan, plaintiff-respondent; and in order to clear the case of possible confusion it is necessary to state that the suit rests entirely upon the deed of gift of the 4th May, 1883, and that the plaintiff claims the property as the share which the donor Fateh Ali is said to have inherited from Shakurullah and to have gifted to the plaintiff under that deed; that there is no allegation in the plaint that Fateh Ali ever obtained possession of the share which he claimed to have inherited from Shakurullah; and that therefore the plaintiff's suit will fail if the gift upon which he relies is found to be invalid under the Muhammadan law.

The grounds of appeal and the arguments which have been addressed to us on behalf of the parties raise only two main questions for determination:—

(1) Whether the gift of the 4th May, 1883, was a hiba-bil-iwaz, or a gift for an exchange as understood in the Muhammadan Law, rendering delivery of possession of the gifted property unnecessary for the validity of such gift.

(2) If not, was the gift of the 4th May, 1883, valid under the Muhammadan Law in view of the circumstance that the donor Fateh Ali was never in possession of the gifted property either at the time of the gift or at the time of his death, and that, as a matter of fact, the plaintiff, donee, never obtained possession of the property which he claims under the gift?

The view of the law which I entertain upon these two questions renders it unnecessary for me either to consider the question as to the exact extent of the share which the donor Fateh Ali may have [4] inherited from Shakurullah, or to decide the question of fact raised in the seventh ground of appeal relating to the house in Jafra Bazar, which is alleged by the appellant to have been built by himself. Nor is it necessary to consider the question raised by the plea that the defendant-appellant had spent a large sum of money in performing the several ceremonies of Shakurullah, and that such money was a charge upon the estate which the plaintiff was bound to pay before claiming any share in the estate.

In dealing with this case I shall confine myself to the two points above mentioned, because according to my opinion the decision upon those points will be fatal to the plaintiff's whole suit.

In considering the first of those points it is necessary to examine closely the terms of the deed of gift, dated the 4th May, 1883, executed by the deceased Fateh Ali in favour of the plaintiff-respondent Muhammad Hasan. That deed, after making certain recitals as to the manner in which the donor felt himself entitled to inherit a share in the estate of Shakurullah, goes on to say :—

"I, the executant, have now become old and weak and have no issue. Sheikh Muhammad Hasan, a near relative of mine, has all along, with cordial affection and love, rendered service to me, maintained and treated me with kindness and indulgence, and shown all sorts of favours to me. Besides the above the executant cannot attend even to the necessary management of the said share. Therefore for this reason, as also in consideration of the natural love and affection which Muhammad Hasan bears, as well as for all the past favours and indulgence shown by him, I, the executant, have, with my free will and consent, and in sound state of body and mind, without coercion or restraint, transferred and given away to Muhammad Hasan my entire share in the estate of Muhammad Shakurullah specified below, which devolves upon me as a residuary heir, together with all the zamindari rights appertaining thereto. For my heirs have now no connection with the aforesaid share. Sheikh Muhammad Hasan is the absolute owner of the said share from this date, and he is authorized to get his name entered in the revenue department on the strength of this deed [5] and take possession of the property transferred. He should spend out of his own pocket what is necessary for the purpose of bringing any suit in connection with the share. I, the executant, shall not be liable for it, nor have I any claim in respect of the share transferred. If in present or in future, any claim in respect of the said share be made under the Muhammadan law or otherwise by me or my heirs, contrary to this deed and to the transfer in favour of Sheikh Muhammad Hasan aforesaid, it will be held false and unentertainable. The value of the property transferred is Rs. 7,500. These few words have therefore been written by way of a deed of transfer that they may be of use in time of need."

In interpreting this document, the lower Court has held that "it is a deed of gift executed in exchange of services" and that "the word iwaz (exchange), includes service, and a gift in exchange of service cannot be revoked." Upon this ground the Court has held that "Fateh Ali, not being in possession of the subject of gift, which had been left by Shakurullah, could not deliver the possession thereof to the plaintiff," but that this circumstance would not render the gift invalid.

I am of opinion that the learned Subordinate Judge has taken an erroneous view of the Muhammadan law in holding that the transaction of the 4th May, 1883, was a hiba-bil-iwaz, or gift for an exchange. The real nature of a hiba-bil-iwaz is fully described in Chapter VI of Book VIII on Gift in Mr. Baillie's Digest of Muhammadan Law, which is only an abbreviated reproduction of the Fatwa Alamgiri; but I need only refer to such passages as have an immediate bearing upon this case. The fundamental conception of a hiba-bil-iwaz in Muhammadan law is that it is a transaction made of two separate acts of donation, that is, it is a transaction made up of mutual or reciprocal gifts between two persons, each of whom is alternately the donor of one gift and the donee of the other. "The iwaz, or exchange, in gift, is of two kinds—one subsequent to the contract, the other stipulated for in it—" (Baillie's Digest, 2nd., ed., p. 541). "When the exchanging takes place subsequent to the gift, the iwaz is, without any [6] difference of opinion between our masters, a gift ab initio. So that it is valid, where gift is valid, and void where gift void, there being no difference between them except as to the dropping of the power of revocation in the case of the iwaz, while it is established in that of the gift. And after possession has been taken of the iwaz, the power to revoke drops also with respect to the gift. So that neither party can reclaim from his fellow what he has become possessed of, whether the iwaz were given by the donee or by a stranger, with or without his direction. All the conditions of gift are applicable to the iwaz; and the transaction does not come within the meaning of a contract of mooawuzut, or mutual exchange, either in its inception or completion."—(Baillie's Digest, p. 543).

Now, such being the rule of the Muhammadan Law the transaction of the 4th May, 1883, cannot be regarded as a hiba-bil-iwaz, or a gift for an exchange, unless it can be shown that the consideration for which that transaction took place was a previous gift passing from the plaintiff, the donee of the deed of the 4th May, 1883, to Fateh Ali, the donor. In other words, does the consideration mentioned in the deed of the 4th May, 1883, represent any gift made by the plaintiff to Fateh Ali on a former occasion? The answer to this question must be in the negative, because all the deed mentions as the consideration of the gift is "natural love and affection," which induced the plaintiff, donee, to render services to the donor, to maintain him and treat him "with kindness and indulgence," and to show him "all sorts of favours." This being so, the next step in the reasoning is whether such natural love and affection, services and favours, could be made the subject of gift by the plaintiff to Fateh Ali, the donor of the deed of the 4th May, 1883.

The law upon the subject is perfectly clear, for the very nature of gift under the Muhammadan Law requires that the subject thereof must be a right of property in something specific without an exchange.—"Baillie's Digest, p. 515). The Hedaya defines gift in the same sense:—"Hiba, in its literal sense, signifies the donation of a thing from which the donee may derive a benefit: in the language of the law, it means a transfer of property, made immediately, and [7] without any exchange."—(Hamilton's Hedaya, Vol. III, p. 673, Grady's Ed., p. 482). It is therefore impossible to hold that the natural affection, kindness, services and favours mentioned in the deed of the 4th May, 1883, can be regarded as a hiba-bil-iwaz, or a gift for an exchange, as understood in the Muhammadan Law.

There is, however, another aspect of this point to which I should like to refer, because it may have led to misapprehension of the Muhammadan Law by the learned Subordinate Judge. The term hiba-bil-iwaz is often misused by the Indian Muhammadans in respect of transactions which either amount to exchange or sale. Mr. Baillie has explained the matter at page 122 of his Digest in the following terms:—

"Hiba-bil-iwaz means, literally, gift for an exchange; and it is of two kinds, according as the iwaz, or exchange, is, or is not, stipulated for at the time of the gift. In both kinds there are two distinct acts; first, the original gift, and second, the iwaz, or exchange. But in the hiba-bil-iwaz of India, there is only one act; the iwaz, or exchange, being involved in the contract of gift as its direct consideration. 'And all are agreed that if a person should say, 'I have given this to thee for so much,' it would be a sale; for the definition of sale is an exchange of property for property, and the exchange may be effected by the word 'give' as well as by the word 'sell.' The transaction which goes by the name of hiba-bil-iwaz in India is, therefore, in reality not a proper hiba-bil-iwaz of either kind, but a sale; and has all the incidents of the latter contract. Accordingly, possession is not required to complete the transfer of it, though absolutely necessary in gift, and, what is of great importance in India, an undivided share in property capable of division may be lawfully transferred by it, though that cannot be done by either of the forms of the true hiba-bil-iwaz."

Even in the light of this explanation, I cannot hold that the learned Subordinate Judge was right in holding that the transaction evidenced by the deed of the 4th May, 1883, was a hiba-bil-iwaz amounting to sale, there being no "exchange of property for property" in the sense of the Muhammadan Law of sale, nor "a [8] transfer of ownership in exchange for a price paid or promised or part paid and part promised," within the meaning of s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882).

I have no doubt that the transaction evidenced by the deed of the 4th May, 1883, is nothing more or less than an ordinary gift under the Muhammadan Law, and that it is therefore subject to all the conditions as to validity which that law provides in respect of such gifts.

This leads me to the consideration of the second point in the case as enunciated by me, namely, whether the facts that at the time of executing the gift of the 4th May, 1883, the donor Fateh Ali was not in possession of the property which he purported to convey by gift, that he never acquired possession of such property during his life-time, and that the plaintiff, donee, has never acquired possession of the property, are circumstances which render the gift invalid under the Muhammadan Law.

The answer to the question is not fraught with any difficulty, because the rule of the Muhammadan Law upon the subject is perfectly clear. Under that law delivery of possession to the donee is a condition precedent to the validity of a gift; for, to use the language of the Hedaya, "the Prophet has said, 'A gift is not valid without seisin,' meaning that the right of property is not established in a gift until after seisin."—(Hamilton's Hedaya by Grady, p. 482.) "Tender and acceptance are necessary, because a gift is a contract, and tender and acceptance are requisite in the formation of all contracts, and seisin is necessary in order to establish a right of property in the gift, because a right of property, according to our doctors, is not established in the thing given merely by means of the contract without seisin."—(Hedaya vol. iii, p. 291.) The same is the effect of the Fatwa Alamgiri as represented in Mr. Baillie's Digest:—"The legal effect of gift is not complete until possession is taken of the thing given, and, in this respect, a stranger and the child of the donor are on the same footing when the child is adult."—(Baillie's Digest, p. 520.) It has, indeed, never been doubted that under the Muhammadan Law of the Hanafi [9] school, which governs this case, actual delivery of possession of the gift of property is a condition precedent to the validity of the transfer of ownership to the donee, and, indeed, it is in consequence of the stringent requirements of that law on this point that gifts of property held in joint co-parcenership (musha) have been held to be invalid,

JULY 5. because perfect and exclusive possession of joint undivided shares cannot be given to the donee—(vide Note No. 4 at p. 520; Baillie's Digest).
APPEL- Such then being the rules of the Muhammadan Law as to the indis-
LATE pensability of possession by the donee, it follows, a fortiori, that property
CIVIL. of which the donor himself is not in possession, and never acquired possession thereof, so as to deliver it to the donee, cannot be made the subject of a valid gift. The exact effect of the rule in respect of property which by its very nature is not capable of actual possession being delivered to the donee need not be considered, because such question does not arise in this case. Here all the property consists of immoveable property, and the donor Fateh Ali could have taken possession of his alleged share upon the death of Shakurullah from whom he claimed to inherit that share.
 The property was susceptible of possession, but it was in the possession of a trespasser, according to the statement in the deed of the 4th May, 1883, itself, and the case now set up by the plaintiff under that deed.

To such a state of things the rule of Muhammadan Law provides no exception from the rule as to possession being a condition precedent to the validity of a gift. Under the precedents of gifts contained in Macnaughten's work on Muhammadan Law, Case No. 6 seems to me to be closely applicable to the present case. There a person had executed a deed of gift in favour of his nephew, conferring upon him the proprietary right to certain lands of which the donor was not in possession, but to recover which he had brought an action, during the pendency of which the donor died, and the donee claimed the litigated property under the gift. It was there held that "the gift of a thing not in the possession of the donor during his lifetime is null and void, and the deed con-[10]taining such gift is of no effect, because, in cases of gift, seisin is a condition. Gift is rendered valid by tender, acceptance and seisin; but in gift seisin is necessary and absolutely indispensable to the establishment of proprietary right. According to the Hedaya,—'Gifts are rendered valid by tender, acceptance and seisin. The Prophet has said, a gift is not valid without seisin. So also if the thing given be pawned to or usurped by a stranger'. So also in the Shurhi Viqaya,—'A gift is perfected by complete seisin'. As the gift is, therefore, null, the claim of the donee is inadmissible, and the deed is invalid, as far as regards the lands of which the donor was never possessed."

Relying upon this precedent, Melvil and Pinhey, JJ., from whom Kemball, J. dissented, held that even in a case where the donor, being the owner of the property subject to the possession of a mortgagee, made a gift of his right of ownership, such gift was invalid under the Muhammadan Law for want of actual possession of the property by the donor at the time of the gift. The case is Mohinuddin v. Manchershah (1), and I may respectfully say that it probably carries the rule as to seisin too far, as is suggested by a Muhammadan lawyer, Mr. Syed Amir Ali of the Calcutta Bar, at page 70 of his Tagore Law Lectures for 1884. The question arising out of the rule of Muhammadan law as to possession being a condition precedent to the validity of a gift was fully argued and well considered by Garth, C. J., in Mullick Abdool Guffoor v. Muleka (2), who in delivering his judgment has made observations in which I concur, for they draw a clear distinction between cases where from the nature of the gifted property itself actual possession could not be given to the donee, and cases where such possession might be given to the donee or actual possession held by the donor. The principle upon which the judgment of Sir Richard Garth in the Calcutta case proceeded is scarcely consistent with the ratio decidendi of the Bombay ruling above cited, but it is in accord with the principle of Sir Barnes Peacock's judgment in Shahazadee Hazara Begum v. Khaja Hossein Ali Khan (1) which, though a case of [11] endowment, would, so far as the question of seisin is concerned, be governed by the same principles as questions of gift under the Muhammadan Law on that point.

It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to discuss these rulings more minutely, and it is enough to say that their general principle is that, for the validity of a gift under the Muhammadan Law, possession of the gifted property by the donor at the time of the gift, or at least at some time, so as to enable him to deliver possession of the same to the donee, and the actual delivery of such possession to the donee, are conditions precedent to the validity of gifts such as the gift evidenced by the deed executed by Fateh Ali in favour of the plaintiff on the 4th May, 1883.

The terms of that deed, however, clearly show, and it is proved and practically admitted on all hands, that in the first place no such possession ever existed in the donor Fateh Ali of the property which he intended to convey by the deed as would enable him to make a valid gift of the property; and in the next place it is equally clear, and indeed admitted, as shown by the very form of this suit, that the plaintiff donee never acquired possession of the property to which the suit relates and which he claims under the gift of the 4th May, 1883.

The matter therefore comes simply to this, that the deceased Fateh Ali, feeling himself entitled to a share of inheritance in the estate of the deceased Shakurullah, never having acquired possession of that share, executed the deed of 4th May, 1883, purporting to convey to the plaintiff such chances of success as the aforesaid Fateh Ali may have had in a litigation such as this, and, as a matter of fact, the plaintiff never obtained possession of the gifted share in pursuance of the deed of gift.

Under these conditions I am satisfied that the lower Court misapprehended the Muhammadan Law as to such gifts, and that the gift of the 4th May, 1883, was invalid owing to the absence of possession in the donor and the absence of the delivery of possession to the donee.

[12] The lower Court has, however, relied on two rulings of this Court, one being, Kasim Hossein v. Sharifunnissa (2) and the other Sahibunissa Bibi v. Hafiza Bibi (3), in support of its view. So far as these rulings are concerned, I need only say that the first of these, which was a judgment of my brother Straight and Mr. Justice Oldfield, only gave effect to the ruling of the Lords of the Privy Council cited in that judgment, and which was repeated by their Lordships in Ameeroonissa Khatoon v. Abadoonisa Khatoon (4) to the effect that the rule of Muhammadan Law, that a gift of musha or an undivided part in property capable of partition is invalid, does not apply to definite shares of zemindaris, which are in their nature separate estates with separate and defined rents; and that the second ruling, in which the judgment of the Court was delivered by Edge, C. J., related to a class of property of which the nature regulated by statute is vastly different from the nature of the property involved in this litigation. Again, so far as the lower Court has relied upon the Bombay ruling in Shaik Ibham v. Shaik Suleman (5) it is enough to say that in that case possession such as the nature of the property admitted of was given to the donee, and in the case of the house the property was already in possession of the donee. All these cases are distinguishable from the present, because here the donor Fateh Ali was in no sort of possession of the share which he alleged himself to have inherited from Shakurullah, that the property was capable of being taken possession of by the afore-said Fateh Ali, that he never obtained such possession either before or after the gift of the 4th May, 1883, and that the plaintiff donee himself never acquired such possession under the gift.

Under these circumstances I hold that the deed of gift, dated the 4th May, 1883, was invalid under the Muhammadan Law, that it therefore did not confer upon the plaintiff any such right as would entitle him to maintain an action such as this, and for these reasons I would decree this appeal, and reversing the [13] decree of the lower Court, dismiss the suit with costs in both the Courts.

KIAM-UD-DIN AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs) v. RAJJO AND ANOTHER

Account stated—Hypothecation-bond for the amount due—Obligor preventing registration of bond by denying execution—Suit on account stated—Civil Procedure Code, s. 586—Small Cause Court suit.

For the purpose of determining whether a second appeal lies or is prohibited by s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code, what must be looked at is not the shape in which the case comes up to the High Court, but the shape in which the suit was originally instituted in the Court of first instance.

The plaintiff sued (i) for registration of a hypothecation-bond executed by the defendant, (ii) in the alternative for recovery of the amount of the bond upon an account stated. The defendant denied execution of the bond, and that she had had any dealings or stated any account with the plaintiff. The Courts below disallowed the first claim as barred by limitation, and disallowed the second on the ground that the bond had effected a novation of the contract implied by the statement of accounts.

Held that under the circumstances of the case the plaintiff was entitled to resort to the account stated and sue thereon. Sirdar Kuar v. Chandrawati (1) distinguished.

Where two parties enter into a contract of which registration is necessary, it is essential that each should do for the other all that is requisite towards such registration.

[Rel.—14 Ind. Cas. 399 (400) = 8 N.L.R. 7; Appl.—15 B. 400 (404), 405.]

The facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Straight, J.

Mr. Hamidullah, for the appellants.

Munshi Madho Prasad, for the respondents.

* Second Appeal, No. 504 of 1887, from a decree of Munshi Monmohan Lal, Subordinate Judge of Azamgarh, dated the 17th December, 1886, confirming a decree of Maulvi Muhammad Amin-ud-din, Munsiff of Muhammadabad, dated the 27th August 1886.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—This was a suit brought by the plaintiffs for two reliefs the first was for the registration of a bond, purporting to be a hypothecation bond executed by Musammat Rajjo Bibi, defendant, for the sum of Rs. 247-8-6; the second relief asked was, [14] in the event of the registration of that document being refused, for the recovery of that amount of money upon an account stated. The first Court dismissed the plaintiff's claim upon the ground that, as to the registration, the suit was barred by limitation; and upon the authority of the case of Sirdar Kuar v. Chandrawati (1) further held that the plaintiffs could not recover upon the account stated, because there had been a novation of contract by the execution of the bond with a fresh promise to pay; and the plaintiff not being able to produce the bond or to maintain a suit upon it by reason of its being unregistered and the registration having been refused, the claim upon the account stated failed.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Subordinate Judge solely in regard to the view expressed by the first Court upon this latter point; and the Subordinate Judge in regard to it adopted a similar view to that expressed by the Munsiff.

From that decision of the Subordinate Judge the second appeal before us is preferred to this Court, and a preliminary objection is taken by Mr. Madho Prasad on the part of the respondent, that the suit being in the nature of a Small Cause Court suit, no second appeal lay from the decision of the Subordinate Judge. I overrule that contention of Mr. Madho Prasad. In my opinion, for the purpose of determining whether a second appeal lies or is prohibited by s. 586, what must be looked at is not the shape in which the case comes up in appeal to this Court, but the shape in which the suit was originally instituted in the Court of first instance.

It was then contended on behalf of the appellants that the decision of the Subordinate Judge affirming that of the Munsiff is wrong; and I am clearly of opinion that this is so. The ruling relied on by him is wholly inapplicable to this case, and both the lower Courts have proceeded upon a misapprehension of the scope and meaning of that ruling. In that case it was admitted on both sides that there was a bond hypothecating immoveable property as collateral security for the account stated. Therefore, there was a clear and specific contract admitted between the parties which superseded altogether [15] any contract or obligation that might be assumed from the mere statement of accounts between them. But in the present case the fact is wholly different; because here the defendant denied not only the execution of the bond, but that there had been any dealings between herself and the plaintiff or that any account had been stated. As I pointed out in the course of the argument, if such a contention as that which is now put forward upon the other side in support of the judgments of the lower Courts, were to be allowed, these plaintiffs would be absolutely without remedy, because assuming there to have been a contract, then the plaintiffs would have been defeated by the action of the defendant in denying the execution of the bond and so preventing registration, and if there was an account stated, then the plaintiffs could not sue upon it, because the existence of the bond would prevent them from doing so.

But we cannot allow the defendant to take advantage of her own fraudulent conduct in preventing registration of the bond and to say that in that bond was represented the contract which superseded that which is to be inferred from the statement of accounts. In my opinion where two parties enter into a contract of which it is an essential incident that, in order to give legal effect to that contract and to enable the one party to enforce it against the other, the registration of the instrument embodying such contract is necessary, it is essential that each should do for the other all that is necessary towards securing the registration of the instrument which the law requires. Therefore I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to resort to their second relief and to bring their claim against the defendants upon the account stated. That being so, this appeal is decreed, the decision of the lower appellate Court being reversed the case will be returned to that Court for restoration to the file of pending appeals and disposal according to law. In dealing with the appeal it will be for the Subordinate Judge to determine whether there is evidence sufficient upon the record to enable him to deal with the question between the plaintiffs and the defendants with regard to the account stated. If there is evidence, he must deal with the case himself; if there is no evidence, or if there is no sufficient [16] evidence, then he must pursue the procedure laid down for his guidance in the Civil Procedure Code. Costs of this appeal will be costs in the cause.

KULWANTA (Decree-holder), v. MAHABIR PRASAD AND ANOTHER
(Judgment-debtors). [24th July, 1888.]

Stamp—Court fee—Security bond for costs of appeal—Act I of 1879 (Stamp Act), sch. i, No. 13—Act VII of 1870 (Court-fees Act) sch. ii, No. 6.

Held by the Full Bench that where a bond is given under the orders of a Court as security by one party for the costs of another, it is subject to two duties—(a) an ad valorem stamp under the Stamp Act, art 13, sch. i, (b) a court-fee of eight annas under the Court-fees Act, art. 6, sch. ii.

IN this case, Straight, J., made the following reference to a Division Bench:—

“This is a question of stamp reported to the Court by the Registrar under the following circumstances:—Mussammat Kulwanta, the appellant in this Court, was required by an order to find security for the costs of the respondent in the event of her appeal failing, and, in pursuance of that order, she has filed two security-bonds, one for Rs. 433-5-4, and the other for Rs. 866-10-8, and they are severally stamped with the court-fee stamp of eight annas. The Registrar’s attention being called to the instrument, and the stamps affixed upon them, has reported the matter to the Court in terms of his order of the 8th of the present month, and the matter has come before me for disposal. The Registrar has referred to an opinion expressed by this Court in the year 1881, which was given by four of the then Judges of the Court, expressing certain views with regard to art. 13, sch. ii. of the Stamp Act, and to art. 6 of the second schedule of the Court-fees Act. In that opinion it would appear that a view expressed by Jackson, J., in Soonjhare Koonwur v. Ramessur Pandey (1) was adopted; and [17] the Registrar from that opinion and the ruling to which it refers, suggests that the security-bonds in this case should have been stamped with a stamp under art. 13 of the Stamp Act of 1879. Mr Ram Prasad, for the appellant, contends that his client has sufficiently stamped the two security-bonds. He observes, and I think justly, that the opinion of this Court mentioned by the Registrar in his report was an opinion that was expressed extra-judicially, in the sense that it was without argument being heard. Upon comparing art. 6 of sch. ii of the Court-fees Act with art. 13 of the Stamp Act, I think there is considerable force in Mr. Ram Prasad's argument that the wide scope which has now been given to art. 6 of the Court-fees Act, in comparison with its terms in the older Court-fees Act, suggests that the instruments in this case are instruments of obligation given by the direction of the Court, and not otherwise specifically provided for. As, however, this view is in conflict with what I committed myself to in the former opinion, and as the holding it, if it be a right one, involves the necessity of overriding not only that opinion but the opinions of three other learned Judges, I think my proper course would be to refer the question here involved for disposal to a Division Bench, I direct accordingly."

The question was subsequently referred to the Full Bench.

Munshi Ram Prasad, for the appellant.

The following judgment was delivered by the Full Bench :—

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and STRAIGHT and TYRRELL, JJ.—We are of opinion that when a bond is given under the order of a Court as security by one party for the costs of another, it is subject to two duties, (a) one under the Stamp Act, art. 13, sch. i, according to its amount, (b) under the Court-fees Act, art. 6, sch. ii, and is liable to an ad valorem stamp and to a court-fee of eight annas. The analogy of an administration-bond is useful as a guide, because such an instrument is necessarily required by every Court granting letters of administration, and must be stamped under the Stamp Act and also under the Court-fees Act. This is our answer to the reference.

they nominated as agent or manager. The plaintiff, alleging that they had subsequently repossessed themselves of the land and the profits accruing therefrom, and that he was interested as a Hindu in worshipping at the temple, and professing to sue on behalf of the entire body of the worshippers thereat, sued for a declaration that the land was wakf, and the idol entitled to hold it in his own name; that the defendants should be directed to apply the income of the property to the purposes of the temple, and that the Court should give such orders and instructions as might be necessary and proper for the future management of the temple and payment of income. No sanction to the institution of the suit was obtained under s. 539 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Held by the Full Bench that the gift made by the defendants constituted a trust for the purposes of the temple.

Per EDGE, C. J., and TYRRELL, J., that the defendants before the Court did not constitute themselves trustees in any sense.

Held also by the Full Bench that the suit was not maintainable as against those defendants.

Per STRAIGHT, J., that the suit was not maintainable under the Hindu Law; that the trust was one for public religious purposes; that such a suit, in which the plaintiff asked to have the trust administered by the Court, could not be maintained without the sanction required by s. 539 of the Code; that assuming s. 539 to be inapplicable, and Act XX of 1863 to apply, the suit could not be maintained without the sanction required by that Act; and that, with reference to s. 30 of the Code, no cause of action had accrued to the plaintiff alone on which he could maintain the suit.

Per EDGE, C.J., and TYRRELL, J., that if the trust were one for public religious purposes, the suit as against the defendants before the Court must fail for non-compliance with the provisions of s. 539 of the Code, and if for private or quasi-private religious purposes, it must also fail, since there was no principle on which the plaintiff, as one of the public worshipping in the temple, could maintain it against those defendants who were not trustees but (if they had wrongfully taken possession) trespassers; that Act XX of 1863, could not apply; and that, with reference to s. 30 of the Code, the plaintiff could not maintain the suit alone on his own behalf, or on behalf of himself and others against those defendants.

THIS was a reference to the Full Bench by Brodhurst and Mahmood, JJ., the question referred being whether the suit was maintainable under Hindu Law by the plaintiff-respondent, and with reference to ss. 30 and 539 of the Civil Procedure Code. ## JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—The reference which is now before this Bench arose out of a suit in which one Kesho Ramanuj Das was the plaintiff, and, four persons, Behari Lal, Musammam Kunder Kuar, Raghubar Dial and Mohan Lal were the defendants. The question which is put to us in the order of reference is this:—"Was the suit maintainable under the Hindu Law by the plaintiff-respondent, and with reference to ss. 30 and 539 of the Civil Procedure Code."

It seems to me for the purposes of determining this question, that it is material to look at the terms of the plaint upon which the plaintiff came into Court and summarised they come to this. That Tika Ram was the absolute proprietor of 5 biswas of land situate in the Bareilly District; that he made a gift of those 5 biswas of land in favour of the four defendants, the female defendant being his daughter, Behari Lal being her husband, and the other two defendants being her sons; that Tika Ram died in or about 1867, leaving behind Musammat Pran Kuar his widow; that Musammat Pran Kuar, subsequent to the death of her husband, constructed a temple in honour of the God Janki Ballabhji, and dedicated it to that deity. The fifth paragraph of the plaint, which I had better state in terms, goes on to say:—"The defendants, in order to defray the expenses of the temple, made a gift of the said property in favour of [20] Janki Ballabh, and voluntarily made an application for mutation of names, which was allowed, and Behari Lal, defendant, was appointed a manager of the temple." The plaint then goes on to say that "in 1875, the Tahsildar, of his own accord, made a report to the effect that the deity had no existence and could not be deemed to be in possession, and that as the donors were in actual possession, their names should be recorded. This was allowed by the Board of Revenue and the names of the defendants were recorded, although the income of the property used to be spent in defraying the temple expenses.

"7. That since November, 1884, the donors have changed their mind and have stopped the payment of the expenses.

"8. The temple is a place of public worship and residents of neighbouring places visit the temple. The plaintiff has been a pujari (worshipper) for the last seven years, and resides in it. He, therefore, on behalf of the entire Hindu community who worship in the temple, prays as follows:—

"(1) That it may be declared that 5 biswas, &c., is wakf;

"(2) That it may be declared and established that Thakur Ballabhji in whose favour the gift was actually made, is entitled to hold the property in his name, as is customary with reference to temples;

"(3) That the defendants be directed to pay the income of the said property for defraying the expenses of the temple as hitherto;

"(4) That the Court may issue such orders and instructions as may be necessary and proper for the future management of, and as to the payment of the income for, the said temple."

I may as well at once say, in order to clear that consideration out of the way, that, as far as I am aware there is no rule of Hindu Law, substantive or otherwise, that deals with or governs a claim of this description. I am not aware that there is any principle of Hindu law which either sanctions or prohibits such a suit, nor is any suggested on either side. Therefore I reply in the negative as to the first question referred to us.

[21] Then arise the following three considerations. First, looking to the frame of the plaint, is the suit one that comes within the purview of s. 539, Civil Procedure Code? If it is such a suit, then it is conceded on the part of the plaintiff that it is prohibited by that section, and could not be maintained without the sanction of the Collector as provided in the last paragraph of that section. If it is not prohibited by that section, then is it within the provisions of Act XX of 1863? And, lastly, assuming it not to be governed by either s. 539, Civil Procedure Code, or the provisions of Act XX of 1863, are the provisions of s. 30, Civil Procedure Code, applicable to it?

The terms of the plaint are unmistakeable, and there can be no question as to what the plaintiff alleges. He says that in the year 1870, the four defendants between them, by an endowment, created a trust in respect of this temple of Janki Ballabhji and of the idol contained therein, which endowment consisted of 5 biswas of land, the income of which was to be devoted to the expenses of the temple. I think I may so far look into the evidence in the case as to refer to the mutation proceedings of the 5th August, 1870; because that is specifically referred to by the plaintiff in his plaint; and may be reasonably taken to be incorporated into it. It appears to me, reading the terms of that petition, that it is good evidence that the four defendants made an out and out gift of the 5 biswas of land in favour of the Thakurji; that they had created an endowment in respect of that particular land in favour of that idol; and that whether Behari alone be regarded as the trustee of that endowment, or whether they and Behari be regarded as joint trustees, there was a trust in favour of the idol, who was the beneficiary so to speak under such trust.

Referring to page 371 of Mr. Agnew's book upon Trusts in British India, I may quote a passage from it, as it rests upon the authority of case law. He says:—"As an idol cannot itself hold lands, the practice is to vest the lands in a trustee for the religious purpose, or to impose upon the holder of the lands a trust to defray the expense of worship. Sometimes the donor is himself the [22] trustee. Such a trust is of course valid, if perfectly created, though, being voluntary, the donor cannot be compelled to carry it out if he has left it imperfect. But the effect of the transaction will differ materially according as the property is absolutely given for the religious object or merely burthened with a trust for its support. And there will be a further difference where the trust is only an apparent and not a real one, and where it creates no rights in any one, except the holder of the fund."

This is quoted from Mr. Mayne's Hindu Law, para. 362, and, I believe, represents the rules bearing upon the subject, which are also very fully stated in the recent ruling of the Bombay High Court in Manohar Ganesh Tambekat v. Lakhmiram Govind Ram (1). It appears to me, as I said before, that the terms of that petition are an indication of an absolute gift to an endowment in favour of the Thakurji of the 5 biswas of land which belonged to the owners. That being so, it seems to me that one can only regard that, the temple being an open temple, as a public religious purpose. If that be so, we have then the main element that is required for the purpose of bringing into operation the provisions of s. 539, Civil Procedure Code.

Now, then, what does s. 539 provide? It says:—"In case of any alleged breach of any express or constructive trust created for public charitable or religious purposes, or whenever the direction of the Court is deemed necessary for the administration of any such trust. &c."

Now, it is not necessary, if I read that section aright, that there should have been any breach of trust; but it is sufficient if there be a public religious trust, and the direction of the Court is considered necessary for the administration of such trust. This view has been adopted by the learned

Judges of Calcutta High Court in Lutifunnissa Bibi v. Nazirun Bibi (1). Therefore, this may be fairly regarded as a suit, to put it in its narrowest form, in which the plaintiff asks to have the trust administered by the Court. That being so, it seems to me that the sanction [23] of the Collector or such officer as the Local Government might appoint was necessary for the purpose of empowering the plaintiff to bring such a suit. In the referring order the Full Bench ruling in Jawahra v. Akbar Husain (2), is referred to, and apparently treated by the learned Judges who referred this case as in their opinion applicable to the particular circumstances of this case. In my opinion, it is not applicable. In that case the plaintiff brought his suit as a worshipper for the purpose of removing the interference of the defendants who had altered the structure of the mosque and had turned it into a place for storing straw. My brother Mahmood in that case was perfectly justified in observing that there was no suggestion in the plaint of a misapplication or a breach of trust, or a prayer for the administration of the trust, such as would bring the case under s. 539 of the Code. I, therefore, speaking for myself, do not think the Full Bench ruling above referred to governs this case. That being so, I think that s. 539 was applicable.

If it was not, then does the case fall within Act XX of 1863? It is a pity, I think, that the learned pleader on behalf of the appellants could not have conceded that it did not. But if it does fall within that Act, then undoubtedly that Act required sanction to be given, which sanction has not been given, and therefore it would be prohibited and could not be maintained without sanction.

As to whether s. 30, Civil Procedure Code, is applicable, assuming that I am wrong as regards the view I have taken with regard to s. 539, I am at a loss to see what cause of action could have accrued to the plaintiff alone. It is impossible to understand upon what right the plaintiff can claim to maintain a suit such as the present against the defendants. As most material to this particular question and as supporting the view that I am now expressing, I may refer to the ruling of our late Chief Justice, Sir Comer Petheram, and Oldfield, J., in Wajid Ali Shah v. Dianatullah Beg (3). I think, therefore, I have now dealt with the matters that [24] seem to me necessary for answering this reference. My answer to it is as given above.

EDGE, C.J — In this case four persons, defendants in this suit in 1870 made a gift of 5 biswas of land to a Hindu temple for the purpose of bhog and arti and other expenses appertaining to the idol. They appointed the defendant Behari Lal the manager and agent, and they presented a petition to the revenue authorities to have their names expunged and the name of the deity inserted instead, and to have Behari recognised as the agent or manager. The plaintiff in his plaint alleges that he as a Hindu is interested in worshipping in this temple. He alleges also that the defendants have appropriated the income of the 5 biswas to their own purposes. He has brought this suit claiming the reliefs mentioned in my brother Straight's judgment. The Subordinate Judge who tried the suit decreed the claim against Behari and Bhagat alias Mohan. The latter had confessed judgment. Behari did not appeal, neither did Bhagwat, and as to whether the suit was maintainable as far as concerned them is consequently not a matter which we have now to consider. The plaintiff appealed from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, so far as the other two defendants were concerned, and on appeal the suit was decreed against them. They have now appealed to this Court; and out of that appeal has arisen this reference. We must, in my opinion, interpret this reference as applying only to the parties who can be affected by the appeal in this Court, that is, the defendants other than Bhagwat and Behari.

The first question to consider is as to whether a trust had been in fact created. It appears to me that the four defendants, short of executing a deed of declaration of trust, did everything else in their power to create a trust. They purported to give the 5 biswas to the god; they successfully applied to the revenue authorities for mutation of names in favour of the god, and for acknowledgment of the person whom they nominated as the manager or agent. One thing appears to me to be quite clear, that the defendants other than Behari, who was the manager, and whose case is not now before us, did not constitute themselves trustees in any sense. In [25] fact, as far as I can see, they divested themselves of their separate interest in these 5 biswas. That I think has some bearing upon the answer we should give to this reference. I may mention incidentally that of the two defendants now before us, one was found and the other was alleged to be a minor in 1870.

On behalf of the plaintiff, it was said that this was not a case coming within s. 539 of the Code, it being contended by Mr. Banerji that there was no express or constructive trust here for public religious purposes. He contends, of course, that there was a trust, but denies that the endowment of this small temple could be considered to be an endowment for public religious purposes. If this was an express or constructive trust for a public religious purpose, there is sufficient in the plaint itself to show that the case would come within s. 539, Civil Procedure Code, because in effect the plaint alleges that there has been a breach of such trust, that is, that Behari, who was appointed a manager, and who was also a donor, and the other defendants, who were donors, have, contrary to the objects of the trust, and the objects of the endowment, repossessed themselves of the 5 biswas and the profits accruing from them. It is quite true that in terms none of the reliefs claimed in this plaint are precisely the reliefs mentioned in clauses a, b, c, d, and e of s. 539 of the Code. But they are all, in my judgment, comprised within the phrase "or granting such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require." Here, not only does the plaintiff's plaint, if it states the facts truly, show that there has been misapplication and non-administration of the trust funds and trust property, but he asks in terms to have it declared that the 5 biswas were trust property of the god; and he calls in aid the assistance of the Court to enforce the trust. Consequently if the purpose for which the endowment was made was a public religious purpose, the suit must fail, the provisions of s. 539 of the Code not being complied with. On the other hand, if, as Mr. Banerji contends, the purpose was not a public religious purpose in the sense of s. 539, but a private trust, for a private religious purpose, I fail to see on what principle the [26] plaintiff is entitled to bring this action. I confine myself to the case of the two persons now before us in this appeal. They are not trustees. As far back as 1870 they did appoint a manager and did divest themselves of the property. If they have since that date wrongfully taken possession of those 5 biswas and appropriated to their own purposes the income, that in my judgment does not constitute them trustees, but would make them trespassers dealing with the property to which they are not entitled. How in that case a person, who is really one of the public, although he can worship in the temple, can maintain an action against these persons as trespassers, I fail to see. I have seen no authority to show that such an action is maintainable.

I may say also that I also fail to see how Act XX of 1863 can apply in this case. The temple and trust, if there was one, came into existence in 1870 and was not in existence at the date of that Act.

There is another question raised, as to whether this action could be maintained by reason of s. 30 of the Civil Procedure Code? In my opinion neither the plaintiff, nor the body of Hindus who might worship in this temple, nor the body of Hindus generally, could maintain this action, if the trust were a private trust. The fact that the plaintiff apparently had notices issued to the Hindus interested could not, in that view, entitle him to maintain the action alone, on his own behalf or on behalf of himself and others. If this trust was for a public religious purpose, s. 539, Civil Procedure Code, would still apply, whether the notices required by s. 30 of the Code had issued or not. I fully agree with my brother Straight that the ruling in the case of Jawahra v. Akbar Husain (1) referred to in the order of reference does not govern this case. That was a case in which a Muhammadan was suing the persons who, by their act of converting a mosque to purposes other than religious purposes, had prevented him exercising his undoubted right of using the mosque for purposes of prayer. The case which appears to me to be practically on all fours with this case is that [27] of Wajid Ali Shah v. Dianatullah Beg (2), and I must say, so far as the facts of that case are applicable here, I agree with the judgment of the late Chief Justice which was concurred in by Oldfield, J.

The passage quoted by my brother Straight from para. 362 of Mayne's Hindu law (3rd ed.) in my opinion correctly lays down the Hindu law with regard to trusts in favour of idols. That passage is elaborated and other considerations are referred to in subsequent paragraphs.

To put it shortly, whether this trust was a public trust or a private one, whether the purpose was a public religious or private or quasi-private religious purpose, in my opinion this suit is not maintainable as against the appellants to this appeal. From what I have already said may be gathered the opinion that I might have as to whether the suit was maintainable at all: but I decline to express any opinion whether it was maintainable against those defendants who are not parties to this appeal. It is not quite clear, from the form of the reference, whether our opinion was asked as to the suit being maintainable against all the defendants, or merely those defendants who are parties to the appeal.

TYRRELL, J.—I entirely concur with the opinions expressed by the learned Chief Justice; and would add this only that the true scope and purview of s. 30, Civil Procedure Code, has been laid down by three Judges of this Court in a case which was before four Judges of the Court, —Hira Lal v. Bhairon (3).

HARI TIWARI AND OTHERS (Defendants) v. RAGHUNATH TIWARI
AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs). [27th July, 1888.]

Exchange—Agreement that if either party were deprived of land received he should receive other land—Suit for specific performance—Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act), sch. ii, No. 113.

In 1871 the plaintiffs and the defendants executed a deed whereby they effected an exchange of certain lands, and each party agreed to resist by legal process or by bringing [28] an action any claim or interference with the other in respect of the property exchanged, and to bear the costs which might be incurred in such legal proceedings in certain proportions, and that if as a result of such proceedings either of the parties were deprived of the lands exchanged or any part of them, the other should make it up out of certain of his own land. In 1881 the plaintiffs brought an action against a third party who claimed title to some of the exchanged lands, and joined the defendants as defendants, the latter admitting the plaintiffs' title. The plaintiffs were defeated in that suit in 1882. In 1885 (within three years from the time the defendants refused to give them other land) they sued on the deed of 1871 to have the exchange therein provided for carried out.

Held by the Full Bench that the cause of action arose in 1882, when there was a loss to the plaintiffs in the sense contemplated in the deed, and the defendants were called upon specifically to perform their covenant, and that the present suit having been brought within three years after their refusal to perform it, was within the time fixed by art. 113, sch. ii of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877).

THE facts of this case were as follows:—By a deed dated the 14th April, 1871, executed by the plaintiffs and defendants, who were "gaw-andadars" in the villages of Bishunpura and Baghauli, 12 biswas and 2 dhurs of land in Baghauli belonging to the plaintiffs were exchanged for the same quantity of land in Bishunpura belonging to the defendants. The deed contained the following agreement by the parties:—"It is to be observed that if any co-sharer of the village or zemindar of the mahal in either village claims or interferes with the lands the subject of the exchange, we all, both parties, shall unite with one another to prevent him. The costs which may be incurred in consequence of such interference shall be paid by both parties in proportion to their shares, viz., two shares by the first party (defendants) and one share by the second party (plaintiffs); and if there be any loss of land, the subject of exchange, we shall make it up and equalize the difference from the waste land owned by each party close to the pucka wells in the two villages."

In 1881, the plaintiffs sued one Jadupat Tiwari and certain other persons for possession of a portion of the land which they had received in exchange, alleging they had been dispossessed by those persons. They joined as defendants in that suit the persons from whom they had received the land, the defendants in the [29] present suit, who supported them in their claim. That suit was dismissed on the ground that the land belonged to Jadupat and others, and not to the transferors. The decision was affirmed by the High Court in July, 1882.

Upon this, in August, 1885, within three years from the time the defendants refused to give them other land, the plaintiffs brought the present suit against the defendants, claiming by virtue of the deed of exchange to recover land from the defendants in the place of the land of which they had been deprived. The lower appellate Court gave the plaintiffs a decree, from which the defendants appealed.

The appeal, which raised the question whether the suit was barred by limitation or not, was eventually referred to and heard by the Full Bench.

Mr. J. E. Howard, for the appellants.

Munshi Juala Prasad, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—This is a suit brought upon a deed of the 14th April, 1871. The suit must be regarded as a suit for specific performance of one of the covenants contained in that deed. By that deed the parties to this action exchanged certain lands, and they covenanted in somewhat loose language, but legally to the following effect:—that if any co-sharer or zemindar should claim or interfere with the lands, the subject of exchange, the parties to the deed of exchange would unite with each other to resist such claim or interference; and that the costs to be incurred in consequence of any such interference should be borne by the parties to this deed, in the proportion of two-thirds and one-third. Then came the material words of the covenant. Those words as translated are as follows:—“And if there be any loss of the lands, the subject of exchange, we will make it up and equalize the difference from the waste land owned and possessed by each party close to the pucka wells in the two villages.”

I have no doubt that the true construction of that covenant, taking all those terms together, the terms that I have quoted, and [30] the terms that I have referred to, is that each party agreed to resist by legal process or by bringing an action any claim or interference with the other in respect of the land exchanged, and to bear the costs which might be incurred in such legal proceedings in certain proportions, and that if as a result of those legal proceedings one of the parties was deprived of the lands exchanged, or any part of them, the other party should make it up out of his own land situate close to pucka wells.

The plaintiffs alleged that they were dispossessed in 1881; it is doubtful whether they ever were in possession at all. But I think that point is not material in this particular case. In 1881, the plaintiffs brought an action against Jadupat Tiwari and others, who claimed title to some of the exchanged lands. In that action they joined the present defendants, who were the other parties to the deed of 1871, as defendants. They could not have joined them as plaintiffs. The present defendants acted up to their covenant, in this respect that they assisted the plaintiffs in that case by admitting their title as against Jadupat Tiwari and the others. The result of that litigation was that in 1882, by a decree which was confirmed in this Court, Jadupat Tiwari and his co-defendants who claimed title along with him in this land were held to be entitled to the land in question.

On that, and within three years, the plaintiffs brought their present claim on the deed of 1871, to have the exchange therein provided for carried out. The only question which we have got to decide is whether the plaintiffs' suit was brought within time. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that the cause of action arose in 1871, on the execution of the deed of exchange; that contention being based upon the fact that at that time the now defendants had not got title to the lands which are now in suit. If we had merely to consider the case in which a defendant was sued for the breach of a covenant for title, no doubt the period of limitation would begin to run from the time when the deed was executed. But this is not a covenant for title; this is a covenant to provide for what might happen in case of either of the parties to the deed being dispossessed by adverse title; and until the event arose which was contemplated by the covenant, the cause of action of the present plaintiffs could not arise. Now that event did not arise according to our construction of the covenant until 1882, when there was a loss owing to the adverse decision of the litigation. After the decision in 1882, the defendants were called upon specifically to perform their covenant, and this action was then brought within three years of their refusal to perform it. It was therefore brought within the time fixed by art. 113, sch. ii, Limitation Act. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

STRAIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I concur with the learned Chief Justice that this suit was not barred by limitation.

MAHMOOD, J.—I agree with the learned Chief Justice.

GIRWAR SINGH AND ANOTHER (Defendants) v. SITA RAM (Plaintiff).
[11th August, 1888.]

An Assistant Collector dismissed a suit without considering the merits, on the ground that it was not cognizable by a Revenue Court. On appeal, the District Judge held that it was unnecessary to determine the question of jurisdiction as he had power in any event under s. 203 of the N. W. P. Rent Act, to remand the suit to the Assistant Collector, and he remanded it accordingly.

Held that the Judge had rightly construed s. 203 of the Rent Act, and that the remand was proper. Ahmaduddin Khan v. Majlis Rai (1) distinguished.

THIS was a suit under s. 93 (g) of the N. W. P. Rent Act (XII of 1881) by a lambardar against certain co-sharers for arrears of Government revenue paid by him on account of their shares. The suit was dismissed by the Assistant Collector of Aligarh, without entering upon the merits on the ground that, when it was instituted, the defendants were no longer co-sharers in the village, and that he had therefore no jurisdiction to entertain it. The plea as to jurisdiction was raised before the Assistant Collector by the defendants. The plaintiff appealed to the District Judge of Aligarh, who observed:—"Under s. 203 of the Rent Act, this Court has power to remand the suit to the Revenue Court, whether that Court was competent to entertain the suit or not. It therefore is superfluous to determine the question whether the Revenue Court was competent or not to hear the suit. In any case I am clearly of opinion that the issues raised are such as would be more appropriately decided by a Revenue Court. I therefore under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure and s. 203 of the Rent Act remand the case to the Court of the

The defendants appealed to the High Court from the order of remand.

JUDGMENTS.

EDGE, C. J.—I think the District Judge of Aligarh is perfectly right in the construction he put on s. 208 of the Rent Act. Even if it was not strictly a Revenue Court suit, I do not think that the judgment of the Full Bench in the case of Ahmaduddin Khan v. Majlis Rai (1) shows that the District Judge had not power to remand the case to the Revenue Court. The question before the Court there was whether the District Judge, believing that the suit was brought in the wrong Court, was right in dismissing the suit altogether, or whether he ought not to have remanded it to the Court which he thought had jurisdiction. I infer from the judgment of my brothers Straight, Brodhurst and Tyrrell that that was all they meant to decide. I think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

MAHMOOD, J.—I agree with the interpretation which the learned Chief Justice has placed upon s. 208 of the Rent Act, and agree [33]ing with him I need say nothing further except that the order which he has passed is the only order which could be passed in the case.

Civil Procedure Code, ss. 28, 45—Mis-joinder of causes of action.

The judgment of the majority of the Full Bench in Narsingh Das v. Mangal Dubey (2), except in its general observations as to the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code relating to joinder of parties and causes of action, proceeded upon and had reference to the special circumstances of the case, and to the allegations made by the plaintiff in his plaint, and was not intended to be carried further.

In a suit for possession of immoveable property part of which had been usufructually mortgaged by defendant No. 1 to defendant No. 2, the plaintiff alleged that the first defendant had no title to make such a mortgage, while both defendants maintained such title.

Held that inasmuch as the title of defendant No. 2 was derived from defendant No. 1, and stood or fell with the failure or success of the plaintiff's claim against the latter, there were not two causes of action but one, namely, the infringement of the plaintiff's right, by the defendant No. 1, and hence the suit was not bad for misjoinder of causes of action.

ORDER OF REMAND.

8 A.W.N.
(1888) 283.

STRAIGHT, J.—The plaint in this case is somewhat prolix, but stripped of superfluous details and allegations, it comes to this, that as to the defendant Gur Prasad, the plaintiff seeks to have her title declared to and to obtain possession of a 4 annas 8 pies share in mauza Labra, and as to the defendant Bank, to eject it as a trespasser in possession from 2 annas 8 pies out of the 4 annas 8 pies of Sisai Sipah, which it professes to hold under a usufructuary mortgage executed in its favour by the defendant Gur Prasad, by [34] having it declared that he had no title to make such a mortgage, the share mortgaged, as well as the remaining share, being the property of the plaintiff by inheritance from his deceased mother Musamat Biija. It is unnecessary to say more of the defendant Gur Prasad's defence to the suit than that he denies that any share in property belonging to the plaintiff is now in his possession, and as to the 2 annas 8 pies of Sisai Sipah, he says it was mortgaged by him to the defendant Bank with possession in order to raise funds to save the share from auction-sale for arrears of Government revenue. The defendant Bank reiterates this statement, and claims the right of a usufructuary mortgagee to hold possession of the share until the mortgage-debt has been discharged. It is clear therefore from this that any right the defendant Bank has, flows through and from the defendant Gur Prasad: in other words, that as to part of the plaintiff's claim, they have a united interest, in the sense that any title the Bank can make must be made through him. The learned Subordinate Judge, who had the case before him, as the Court of first instance, has held the suit bad for misjoinder of causes of action for the reasons stated by him in his decision, relying more especially on a Full Bench ruling of this Court, Narsingh Das v. Mangal Dubey (1). As I am responsible for the terms of the judgment of the majority in that case, having written it, I think it right to say that, except in so far as the general observations in it as to the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code relating to joinder of parties and causes of action are concerned, it proceeded upon and had reference to the special facts and circumstances of the case itself and to the allegations made by the plaintiff in his plaint. I may also add that I know my brother Judges, who were parties to the ruling, took the same view, and had no intention that it should be carried further than the particular case in which it was made. In the present suit, as to the one head of claim in which the defendant Bank is interested, any title that it possesses flows through and is derived from the defendant Gur Prasad, and if he has usurped or appropriated rights [35] which belong to the plaintiff as to the village Sisai Sipah, such title stands or falls, according as the plaintiff establishes or fails to establish her claim against him. There cannot therefore properly be said to be two causes of action; on the contrary, there is a single cause of action, namely the infringement of the plaintiff's right by the defendant Gur Prasad, out of which has flowed the title asserted by the defendant Bank and denied by the plaintiff. For these reasons I think the learned Subordinate

Judge was wrong in the the view he took, and in applying the Full Bench ruling to the present case. I allow the appeal, and reversing his decree, direct him to restore the suit to his file of pending cases and to dispose of it according to law. Costs will be costs in the suit.

MAHMOOD, J.—I agree in all that has been said by my brother Straight in respect of this case; and as I was the only dissentient Judge in the Full Bench case of Narsing Das v. Mangal Dubey (1), I wish to say that I am very glad to adopt the interpretation which my brother has put upon that ruling, and concur in the order which he has made.

CHEDA LAL AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs) v. BADULLAH AND OTHERS
(Defendants).* [23rd May 1888.]

Practice—Appeal on full court-fee from decree dismissing suit in part—Remand of whole case, though no cross-appeal or objections preferred—Dismissal of whole suit on remand—High Court competent in second appeal to consider validity of remand order not specifically appealed—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 544, 561, 562, 578.

A plaintiff whose suit had been decreed in part appealed from so much of the first Court's decree as was adverse to him, and stamped his memorandum of appeal with a stamp which would have covered an appeal from the whole decree. The defendant did not appeal or file cross-objections. The lower appellate Court remanded the whole case to the first Court under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code, the plaintiff, [36] not appealing under s. 583 (28) from the order of remand. The first Court now dismissed the whole suit, and, on appeal by the plaintiff, the lower appellate Court confirmed the decree. On a second appeal to the High Court—

Held (i) that the High Court was competent to consider the validity or propriety of the order of remand, though it had not been specifically appealed against; (ii) that the order of remand was ultra vires, so far as it related to that part of the first Court's decree which was favourable to the plaintiff, the lower appellate Court not having jurisdiction, in the absence of any appeal or objections by the defendant, to disturb that part of the decree; (iii) that the order of remand was not made valid by the subsequent appearance of the plaintiff before the first Court or by the appeal from the first Court's decree on the remand; and (iv) that the case was not covered by s. 578 of the Code.

Per MAHMOOD, J.—S. 544 had no application to the case, that section relating only to cases where one or more of the parties arrayed on the same side appealed against a decree passed on a ground common to all, and not to cases where either of two opposite parties appealed from a part of the decree upon a court-fee sufficient for an appeal from the whole.

EDGE, C. J.—The plaintiffs brought their suit in the Munsif's Court of Moradabad. They claimed possession of land and to have a door which had been recently opened by the defendants closed. The Munsif decreed the plaintiffs' claim as to the land, and dismissed their suit as to the door. The plaintiffs appealed as to so much of that decree as dismissed their suit to the door. The defendants filed objections to so much of that decree as decreed the plaintiffs' claim to the land. The Subordinate Judge on that appeal and on those objections remanded the whole case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The Munsif on that remand again decreed the plaintiffs' claim as to the land and dismissed their claim as to the [37] door. The plaintiffs again appealed as to so much of the decree as dismissed their suit as to the door. The defendants did not appeal or file objections. The plaintiff stamped their appeal with a stamp which would have covered an appeal against the whole decree. On that appeal the Subordinate Judge again remanded the whole case under s. 562. The Munsif heard the case again, and on this occasion dismissed the whole of the plaintiffs' suit. From that decree the plaintiffs appealed. On appeal the Subordinate Judge confirmed the decree of the Munsif and dismissed the appeal. From that decree of the Subordinate Judge this second appeal has been preferred. As to so much of this appeal as relates to the plaintiffs' claim to have the door closed, Mr. Ratan Chand for the appellants does not contend that we can interfere with the findings below, those findings being findings of fact, so we need not consider that portion of the case. Mr. Ratan Chand contends that the second order of remand, namely, that of the 10th December, 1885, was ultra vires so far as that portion of the decree of the 25th September, 1885, which related to the plaintiffs' claim to the land was concerned, and that the only valid decree relating to the plaintiffs' claim to the land is the decree of the 25th September, 1885, which was not the subject of appeal, and as to which the defendants did not file objections. On the other hand, it is contended that we cannot in second appeal consider whether the order of remand of the 10th December, 1885, was good or bad, as it was not specifically appealed against as it might have been under s. 588 (28) of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the plaintiffs by appealing from the last decree of the Munsif waived any right to object to the order of the 10th December, 1885, and further that this is a case within s. 578 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

As to our power in second appeal to consider the validity or propriety of the order of the 10th December, 1885, there can be no doubt. There are two or three decisions of the Privy Council which show that that is a power we can now exercise. Was the order of the 10th December, 1885, so far as it related to the land, ultra vires or not? The Subordinate Judge thought that because [38] the plaintiffs had stamped their appeal with a stamp which would cover an appeal on the whole case, he might treat the appeal which, in truth, was only in respect of so much of the Munsif's Court's decree as dismissed the claim to close the door, as if the plaintiffs were appealing against the whole decree. It is an extraordinary proposition that a Subordinate Judge is to look at the stamp on a memorandum of appeal and not at the memorandum itself in order to see which part of a decree is the subject of an appeal before him. The plaintiffs' claim as to the land having been decreed on the 25th September, 1885, they could not have appealed against that portion of the decree; it gave them what they asked. The Subordinate Judge could no more deal with a part of a decree which was not challenged by a memorandum of appeal or by objections filed by the opposite party than he could pass an order reversing the decree of a Munsif when that decree was not in appeal before him. The memorandum of appeal or objections when filed are what give the Judge on appeal jurisdiction to interfere with the decree below. He cannot of his own motion deal with a decree which is not the subject of appeal to him, or with a portion of a decree against which portion there has been no appeal and no objections filed.

In so far as he assumed to set aside the decree of the Munsif of the 25th September, 1885, which decreed the plaintiffs' claim as to the land, he acted without any jurisdiction whatever. The fact that the plaintiffs on that remand appeared before the Munsif could not give the Munsif jurisdiction to re-open the question as to the land. The appeal against the decree of the Munsif could not validate the portion of the order of remand of the 10th December, 1885, which was made without jurisdiction. The parties by appearing before a Court which has no jurisdiction cannot give that Court jurisdiction in the absence of legislative enactment. In my opinion nothing which had taken place did make or could make that portion of the order of the 10th December, 1885, which remanded the case as to the land, valid. As to the contention that this is a case within s. 578 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the [39] answer to that is threefold. First of all, there is here more than an irregularity, it is an exercise of jurisdiction where there was none. Secondly, the act of the Subordinate Judge did affect the merits of the case in this way, that the plaintiffs rightly or wrongly having got a decree establishing their right to the land, and that portion of the decree not being before the Subordinate Judge on appeal, they had established their title so far as a Court of law could establish it for them. Thirdly, it is a question affecting the jurisdiction of the Court. In my opinion the Subordinate Judge had absolutely no jurisdiction to deal with that portion of the decree which was not the subject of the appeal before him. I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs so far as it relates to the claim to close the door, and that it should be allowed with costs here and below so far as it relates to the claim to the land, and that so much of the Subordinate Judge's order of the 10th December 1885, and of his last decree as relates to the plaintiffs' claim to the land must be reversed, and the decree of the Munsif of the 25th September 1885, be restored.

MAHMOOD, J.—I agree in all that has fallen from the learned Chief Justice and in the order which he has made. This being a case referred by me for decision, I wish to add a few observations. I understand the case now as I did when I made my order of reference of the 28th July, 1887, and that order enunciated the three points on which the decision of the case depends. As to the first of these points I have to refer to s. 544 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is the only section on which any reliance could be placed for the contention that when the plaintiff who has only partly succeeded had appealed from such portion of the decree as was against him upon the stamp valued in proportion to the whole amount of the claim in the appellate Court, he would be placed on a worse footing than that on which he stood before he had preferred an appeal. S. 544 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies in my opinion only to appeals by parties arrayed on the same side of a litigation in the original Court, and against whom judgment on a common ground has been passed and only some of them appealed from such judgment [40] on behalf of themselves and others who do not join in the appeal. That section does not relate to cases in which a party (be he plaintiff or defendant in the original Court) who has been unsuccessful only to a certain extent of the subject-matter of the litigation in appeal from so much of the decree as has been passed against him, happens to value the appeal as if it related to the whole subject-matter of the litigation, or to pay court-fees on such amount. No Court could take a matter such as the payment of the court-fee stamps as a test whereby its jurisdiction is to be decided. I hold, therefore, on the first point in the referring order that that question should be answered in the negative. As to the second question enunciated in my order of reference I agree with the learned Chief Justice in holding that so much of the decree of the first Court as was not appealed from was not within the scope of the jurisdiction of the lower appellate Court, and that Court in making its order acted ultra vires or without jurisdiction, because no tribunal has any power to deal with the subject-matter of the litigation which is not brought before it as the subject for adjudication. On the third question as stated by me in the order referring the case, I have no doubt, for the reasons which have been stated, that the provisions of s. 578 of the Code do not cover the case even though in consequence of the remanding order of the 10th December, 1885, which was passed under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a trial de novo has taken place in this case and a decree has been passed by the first Court dismissing the claim, and that decree has been confirmed by the lower appellate Court. The scope of that section cannot be so extensive as to bring within the scope of adjudication matters not subject to adjudication in the Court of first instance or in the Court of appeal, and therefore the interference by the lower appellate Court which it made by the order of the 10th December, 1885, was illegal, and, as such, fit for being interfered with by us even at this stage. It has been argued that because the lower appellate Court's order of the 10th December, 1885, might have been appealed from under s. 588 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, inasmuch as such appeal was not preferred, it [41] is no longer open to us in second appeal to consider the validity of that order. Orders of remand such as s. 562 contemplates are necessarily orders of an interlocutory character because they do not definitely purport to dispose of the litigation with which they deal. Such orders may no doubt be appealed from, and the Court of appeal can adjudicate on them with such power as to finality as the appellate Court possesses. But when in a case such as this such order is not appealed from, and, having been carried out, adjudication in pursuance thereof has been made, I do not think that the circumstance of such order not being appealed from would preclude the parties from bringing up such questions when the final decree in the case has been made and is rendered the subject of an appeal. The learned Chief Justice has stated why this should be so on legal reasoning, and indeed, if any further reason were required, I should say that the rulings of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Maharajah Moheshur Singh v. The Bengal Government (1), Forbes v. Ameeroonissa Begum (2) and Shah Mukhun Lall v. Baboo Sree Kishen Singh (3) were authorities for this proposition. These rulings proceeded no doubt on earlier law, but I am not aware that the rule has been modified in the Civil Procedure Code by which this case is covered. The effect of this view is to agree with the decree of the learned Chief Justice.

KHUMAN SINGH AND OTHERS (Defendants) v. HARDAI (Plaintiff)*

Pre-emption — Wajib-ul-arz — Construction — “Karibi” meaning of.

The word “karibi” used by itself in the pre-emptive clause of a wajib-ul-arz to indicate shareholders “near” to the vendor, is ambiguous and inadequate to express the intentions of the shareholders.

[42] The pre-emptive clause in the wajib-ul-arz of a village gave a right of pre-emption, in cases of sale by shareholders, first to “bhai hakiki (own brothers), next to “karibi” (near), and next to co-sharers in the same thoke as the vendor.

Held that although the word “karibi” must be read in connection with the preceding word “bhai,” the words “bhai karibi” could not reasonably be confined to cousins, but must be construed as meaning “bhai bund” or bhai log,” so as to include all near relatives, both male and female.

Held also that a vendor’s father’s brother’s widow, holding a share in the village absolutely and as heir of her deceased husband, was entitled to pre-emption in preference to the vendees, who were only sharers in the same thoke as the vendor.

[F. 2 A.L.J. 346. R. 5 Ind. Cas. 669 (670.)]

THIS was a suit for pre-emption, based on the following clause in the wajib-ul-arz of a village:—

“A shareholder wishing to sell his share, will sell it (i.e., offer it for sale) at a fair price, first to a bhai hakiki (an own brother), after that to karibi (near), after that to a sharer in the thoke or in a second (or another) thoke.”

The plaintiff was one Musammat Hardai, widow of one Jawahir Lal. The vendors (who did not contest the claim) were her nephews—sons of her husband’s brother. The defendants-vendees were sharers in the village, and in the same thoke as the plaintiff. Among other pleas they contended (i) that the plaintiff was not a sharer within the meaning of the wajib-ul-arz, as she was in possession of the share by virtue of which she claimed, by way of maintenance as a Hindu widow, and not by right of inheritance, (ii) that assuming her to be a sharer, she did not come within the category of “karibi,” and so had no right preferential to their own.

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Meerut) dismissed the suit. The Court observed:—

“Now the question is whether the plaintiff in this case, who is the aunt of the vendors, that is, the vendors’ father’s brother’s wife, comes within the word ‘karibi’. Reading the word ‘karibi’ with the preceding words ‘bhai hakiki,’ there remains no doubt that these words hakiki and karibi (real and near) are used in connection with the word bhai (brother), and that they both qualify the same word bhai. In fact, I see that no other construction can reasonably be [43] put to it. Whoever else may come under the words bhai karibi, I do not think that a female relative, such as the plaintiff, can be brought within those words. If the words bhai hakiki and bhai karibi be construed strictly, they would not include any but the brothers and cousins; by a broader construction, as the word bhai sometimes is used in vernacular common dialogue, it may mean and include some other male near relatives; but to include an aunt in the word bhai would certainly be going too far, and giving it a meaning which is never applied to it. I am of opinion that the second issue must be decided against the plaintiff, and the plaintiff's case must fall with this finding. The vendees being also sharers in the thoke, the plaintiff has no preferential right over the vendees. It is not now necessary to go into the other issues. I dismiss the plaintiff's case on the above finding, and order her to bear the costs of both sides."

On appeal, the District Judge of Meerut, being "clearly of opinion that the appellant as the widow of a karibi relative of the vendors, holding her husband's share by inheritance, is entitled to pre-emption" reversed the first Court's decision, and remanded the case, under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code, for trial on the merits. On the remand, the Court of first instance decided the remaining issues in favour of the plaintiff, and so decreed the claim. On appeal, the District Judge affirmed the decree. The defendants appealed to the High Court.

On the 24th January 1888, this appeal came for hearing before Edge, C. J. and Brodhurst and Mahmood, J. J., who made an order, the material portion of which was as follows.

"We remand this case under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure for a finding as to whether at the date of the sale, and at the date of the commencement of this action, the plaintiff was in possession of the share in the thoke by way of maintenance or by right of inheritance. The share to which we refer is the share by reason of which her pre-emptive right is alleged to accrue."

To this remand, the lower appellate Court returned a finding to the effect that at the dates mentioned the plaintiff held her [44] share absolutely, by right of inheritance to her deceased husband. No objections were filed to this finding.

The Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath and Munshi Ram Prasad, for the appellants.

The Hon. T. Conlan and Pandit Bishambhar Nath, for the respondent.

JUDGMENTS.

BRODHURST, J.—Plea No. 1 was withdrawn before we remanded the case under s. 566 of the Civil Procedure Code. The finding on the issue we remanded, namely, "whether at the date of the sale and at the date of the commencement of the action, the plaintiff was in possession of the share in the thoke by way of maintenance or by way of inheritance," is in the plaintiff's favour, the lower appellate Court having found that Musammât Hardai held her share absolutely as the heir of her deceased husband, Jawahir Lal, and was thus in enjoyment of it at the time of the sale, and to this finding no objection has been taken. The only other plea that on the former occasion was seriously pressed is No. 2; thus the sole point that remains for consideration is as to the meaning of the wajib-ul-arz. The passage in dispute is as follows:—"A shareholder wishing to sell his share will sell it (i.e., offer it for sale) at a fair price, first to a bhai hakiki (own brother), after that to 'karibi' (near), after that to a sharer, in the thoke or in a second (or another) thoke." The question here is, what is the meaning of the word "karibi"?

The difficulty that has arisen on this part of the case is owing to a word having been used that is ambiguous and inadequate to convey clearly the intentions of the shareholders. Obscure language such as that above referred to, should not be permitted by any settlement officer to be made use of in a wajib-ul-arz.

I have referred to several dictionaries, including those of Forbes, Wilson, Shakespear, Richardson, and Fallon. In none of them is the word "karibi" mentioned, but "karib" is shown in all of them to mean near either in space or relationship. In Wilson's Glossary, the meanings of the word are given as "near [45] near to, also near in relationship, a kinsman, a relative, a connection by birth or marriage excepting the relation of parent and child." "Karibi" apparently is not a word that could correctly be used alone, as are the words karabut-daran or rishtadaran to denote relations, and so far as I can learn it is not generally so used even by uneducated persons.

The first Court—the Subordinate Judge of Meerut—observes, "Now, the question is whether the plaintiff in this case, who is the aunt of the vendors, that is, the vendor's father's brother's wife comes within the word 'karibi.' Reading the word "karibi" with the preceding words 'bhai hakiki' there remains no doubt that both these words 'hakiki' and karibi (real and near) are used in connection with the word bhai (brother), and that they both qualify the same word bhai. In fact, I see that no other construction can be reasonably put to it. Whoever else may come under the words bhai karibi, I do not think that a female relative such as the plaintiff can be brought within those words. If the words bhai karibi and bhai hakiki be construed strictly, they would not include any but the brothers and cousins. By a broader construction, as the word bhai sometimes is used in vernacular common dialogue, it may mean and include some other male near relations, but to include an aunt in the word bhai would certainly be going too far and giving it a meaning for which it is never applied." I agree with the Subordinate Judge in thinking that the word karibi as well as the word hakiki must be read in connection with the word bhai.

I was first much impressed by the arguments of the learned pleader for the appellants, and was strongly inclined to think that the Subordinate Judge had placed a right interpretation on the words above referred to, and I was more especially inclined to think so as the lower appellate Court had given no reason whatever for arriving at a different conclusion; but, having regard to some remarks that fell from my brother Mahmood at the first hearing of the case, I consider that that although karibi must be read in connection with the preceding word bhai, the words bhai karibi must [46] be held to include more than cousins; for it appears unreasonable to suppose that the shareholders of the village in question can have intended to allow the right of pre-emption to a second or third cousin and to deny it to a father or an uncle or even to a paternal nephew, who among Hindus is frequently regarded with almost, if not as strong, affection as an own son.

Our attention has been drawn to the judgments in an earlier case, Second Appeal No. 316 of 1886, from the same district of Meerut (1). In that case, the lower appellate Court, the then Judge of Meerut, in considering similar words in a wajib-ul-arz observed: "The decision in this case depends on the interpretation to be put on the wajib-ul-arz. That document lays down that an own brother and then a karibi and then a co-sharer should have the option of purchase. The words are "awal bhai hakiki ba bhai karibi." The lower Court holds that the word bhai governs the word karibi and that it is own brothers and then near brothers or cousins that have the preference, and that after them all co-sharers are equal, and consequently the plaintiff and the purchaser both being sharers, the plaintiff has no right of pre-emption over the defendant, the purchaser. In the opinion of this Court the words in the wajib-ul-arz mean that after own brothers, persons karibi, that is, in any way connected, have a right of pre-emption, and that the word karibi is not confined to cousins. Even supposing that the word karibi is governed by the word bhai, the Court holds that the word bhai cannot be confined to cousins, but that the word is used in a much wider sense and means bhai bund. Connections, however distant, being of the same stock, are called bhais. Under either interpretation the Court holds that the plaintiff has a preferential right of pre-emption."

A Bench of this Court, Edge, C.J., and Straight, J., in disposing of that second appeal, remarked: "It seems to us that the Judge has placed a reasonable construction upon the wajib-ul-arz, and one which we ought not to disturb" and the appeal was accordingly dismissed.

[47] I am now of opinion that the point was properly decided, and I may add that if in the present case the words bhai karibi were intended to refer to cousins only, there was no necessity to have previously used the words bhai hakiki, as an own brother would have been included in the words bhai karibi, he being not only a near bhai but the nearest "bhai" of all. Moreover, if own brothers and cousins were the only relations that were to be allowed to pre-empt, own brothers having been clearly mentioned, cousins should not have been referred to in the words bhai karibi, but should have been described by the words "bhai chachera," "phuphera," "mamera," "mausera," according to the intentions of the share-holders.

Having regard to the considerations above mentioned, I think that in order to obtain the meaning intended by the co-sharers, we must not only read the words karibi with the word bhai, but must also regard the word bhai as meaning bhai bund or bhai log, so that bhai karibi shall include all near relations both male and female.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

EDGE, C. J.—I am of the same opinion.

MAHMOOD, J.—So am I.

PRESENT:

The Earl of Selborne, Lord Hobhouse, Lord Macnaghten, Sir B. Peacock, and Sir R. Couch.

[On appeal from the High Court for the North-Western Provinces.]

BASSU KUAR AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. DHUM SINGH (Defendant).
[21st June, and 7th July, 1888.]

Act XV of 1877 (Limitation Act), sch. ii, Nos. 64 and 97--Act IX of 1872 (Contract Act), s. 65.

Money due on an account stated which would, as such, have been barred in three years from the statement, under Act XV of 1877, sch. ii, art. 64, becomes, for purposes of limitation, a debt of another character, when, it having been the subject of an [48] arrangement whereby it was to be retained by the debtor as part of the consideration upon a proposed sale of land, that arrangement failed, the sale not being specifically enforceable, and so declared by decree.

In contemplation of a sale of land by the debtor to the creditor, it was agreed that the book-debt should be retained by the former in satisfaction of part of the price, but the parties failing to agree as to certain other terms, a suit, brought by the intending vendor for specific performance, was dismissed, on the ground that no effectual agreement had been made.

Held that this decree brought about a new state of things, and imposed a new obligation on the debtor, who could no longer allege that he was absolved by the creditors being entitled to the land instead of the money. He became bound to pay that which he had retained in payment of his land, the date of the decree giving the date of the failure of an existing consideration, within the meaning of art. 97.

The matter might also be regarded as falling under s. 65 of the Contract Act, IX of 1873, under which, when the agreement was decreed ineffectual, the debtor, having previously received an advantage under it, was made liable "to restore" that advantage, or "to make compensation for it."

APPEAL from a decree (12th March, 1886) of the High Court, reversing a decree (26th March, 1885), of the Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur.

The suit out of which this appeal arose was commenced by Lala Baru Mal, lately a Sharf at Saharanpur, with his wife Musammat Bassu Kuar, against Lala Dhum Singh. Baru Mal died pending the suit, and his sons having been joint with the widow as plaintiffs, were now appellants with her.

In 1879, Dhum Singh owing money to Baru Mal, they entered upon an arrangement that Baru Mal, buying villages of Dhum Singh, for Rs. 55,000, should give credit for and write off so much as was equal to the debt, receiving only the balance in cash ; it appearing from the accounts down to 1st September, 1879, that the debt was Rs. 33,359. The conveyance was to be made to Bassu Kuar, the wife. But, disputes afterwards arising, completion was refused by Baru Mal. On 3rd September, 1880, Dhum Singh sued him for specific performance ; but his suit, although decreed by the Court of first instance, was dismissed by the High Court on the 14th March, 1884 ; that Court holding that there had been no unqualified acceptance of the terms by Baru Mal, and [49] that no binding contract, enforceable by law, had been made between the parties (1).

The present suit was brought on the 18th September, 1884, the plaint stating that the defendant refused to refund the amount, for which an allowance in the "sale consideration" had been made, although, in consequence of his own acts, the contract of sale had been declared by the High Court, on the 14th March, 1884, not to be enforceable ; and inferring that the cause of action had arisen on that date.

The defendant by his written statement set up limitation under Act XV of 1877, alleging that nothing had occurred during the transactions and litigation between the parties to alter the nature of the original debt which had accrued in 1879.

The Subordinate Judge, M. Muhammad Maksud Ali Khan, decreed the claim for Rs. 3,359, with interest at 7 annas 9 pies per cent. per month, “Prior to September, 1879, there had been various transactions between the parties, and these transactions resulted in a debt due by the defendant to the plaintiff of Rs. 33,359-3-6, that being the identical amount which is claimed in the present suit. In September, 1879, the parties entered into negotiations as to the mode in which this debt should be liquidated. The defendant apparently was not in a position at that time to pay in money, but he had certain landed property and negotiations took place for the sale of this property to the plaintiffs and the extinguishment of the old debt thereby. These negotiations proceeded so far that the purchase-money was fixed at Rs. 55,000, and it was agreed that the plaintiff should pay this amount by giving credit to the defendant to the extent of the debt due by him, and paying the balance in cash. So far the negotiations were completed, except apparently a few minor points. In the end, however, a dispute [50] arose as to what had been settled as the actual terms of the bargain which were to be reduced into writing. The defendant brought a suit against the plaintiff for specific performance of the contract which he alleged had been settled and executed for the sale to the latter of the property in dispute. That suit was tried by the Subordinate Judge, who decreed the claim. In appeal the High Court reversed the Subordinate Judge's decree, as it appeared that the parties were never ad idem with reference to the contract set up by the then plaintiff. It is said now that this Court found that the true contract was not the contract set up by the then plaintiff, but was in fact the contract set up by the then defendant, who is now plaintiff. From the judgment of the Court, however, it appears that this is not what was then decided. All that the judgment shows is that the contract set up in that suit was not proved because there was no evidence that the parties had come to any agreement that that was to be the contract. That is all that was necessary for the decision of that case. The judgment in effect decided that there had been no contract, and the parties were therefore relegated to their original position. In other words, the negotiations failed, because they resulted in an agreement, and the original debt due by the present defendant to the present plaintiff always remained due and is so still. It is alleged that the contract was completed on the 1st September, 1879, and that is therefore the latest possible date we can look to in considering when the money became due. The whole amount had in fact become due before that date by reason of prior transactions, but, upon the view most favourable to the plaintiff, and assuming that an account was stated on that day, giving rise to a new period from which limitation would begin to run, it is impossible to assign the debt to a latter date than that. The present suit was brought on the 18th September, 1884, that is to say much more than three years from latest possible date upon which the debt can be said to have become due. Under these circumstances the suit is barred by limitation. The plaintiff's contention is that the contract which he set up was found to have been completed, and under its terms this money having been credited in the present defendant's books, was to be [51] treated as a payment by the present plaintiff as a deposit on account of the sale, and the present suit is therefore a suit for money had and received, upon a cause of action which did not arise until the contract had gone off, i.e., when this Court decided that the contract set up by the present defendant was not, but that set up by the plaintiff was, binding. I am of opinion that this contention must fail. In the first place, by the terms of the contract itself which is now set up by the plaintiff, no deposit was payable, and the price was not to be paid till the completion of the contract. Secondly, in the present plaintiff's letter to the defendant demanding payment of the money, and dated the 29th September, 1879, the plaintiff did not demand the money of the defendant or ask him to return it as a deposit, but demanded it simply as the balance of the old demand. Under these circumstances it is impossible to treat the money as any thing but the old balance due from the defendant to the plaintiff, and as that debt was barred by limitation at the time when this suit was brought, I am of opinion that the Subordinate Judge should have given the defendant a decree. The appeal must be decreed with costs."

Mr. R. V. Doyne, for the appellant, argued that the effect of the respondent's suit upon the agreement, which treated the debt as a subsisting part of the consideration, and to that amount part payment was that the appellant's claim was not barred under article 64, as on a debt upon an account stated in 1879. Upon one view, the transaction between the parties, and the suit for specific performance, showed grounds for deduction of the period occupied by the suit. This would give an addition to the three years, as the suit lasted from 3rd August, 1880, to 14th March, 1884. Until the agreement for the sale of the land had been finally brought to an end, the appellant was in the position of a person whose claim had been satisfied by the substitution of the land for his debt, and no suit could have been successfully brought. Upon this part of the argument Musammatt Rani Surnomoyi v. Shoshi Mokhi Burmonia (1) was cited, and it was argued that in another view, and if there was no [52] such suspension of the right to sue upon the account stated, the date itself of the decree, viz., 14th March, 1884, was the starting point of limitation, inasmuch as, on the dismissal of the suit, a new cause of action accrued. Also acknowledgment of liability had taken place. [Reference was made by one of their Lordships to Rose v. Watson (2) in regard to a suggestion of a temporary lien on so much of the land as would have been covered by the proportionate part of the purchase-money, represented by the debt retained for a time.] It was also argued that the claim should have been held to fall within the Contract Act, IX of 1872, s. 65. The interpretation clause, s. 2, of that Act explained a "void" agreement as being an agreement "not enforceable by law;" and it was submitted that Dhum Singh, on the dismissal of his suit on the 14th March, 1884, became bound to pay the amount of the debt previously retained; being made liable, by s. 65, to restore an advantage received under a contract that had become void.

Mr. Charles H. Hill, for the respondent, argued that the question raised must be disposed of upon the law of limitation as applied in the judgment of the High Court. It was the completion of the contract that alone could turn the retention of the debt into a payment, as the price of the land was not to be paid till then; and the debt remained, from first to last, the balance of the old account. Had there been a complete contract, a decree for specific performance would have followed. He referred to what was expressed in the judgment in Lachmi Bakhsh Roy v. Ranjit Ram Panday (3), showing that the law of limitation is strict and inflexible, and argued that article 64 alone could be applied. No later acknowledgment than the commencement of Dhum Singh's suit could be found, and that was too far back to be of any avail to the plaintiff. Reference was also made to the E. I. Company v. Odit Churn Paul (1), showing that on a simple contract the breach gave the date of the cause of action from which the period of limitation commenced, not the time of the refusal to perform the contract. Not till the bringing of the present suit was it ever [53] alleged that the principal sum now claimed was other than the debt due on the 1st September, 1879. No act had been done, with effect to alter the nature of this debt, or to afford a starting point for limitation, other than that date. What was now alleged for the appellant differed from the contention of Baru Mal, in his resisting the suit for specific performance, and was inconsistent with there having been, as the Court decreed, no definite terms of contract settled.

Mr. R. V. Doyne, replied, arguing that the 14th March, 1884, was the starting point for the period of limitation.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by LORD HOBHOUSE.

JUDGMENT.

LORD HOBHOUSE.—The question in this case is whether a debt which at one time was due from the respondent to one Baru Mal, whom the appellants represent, and which has never been paid, has been extinguished by lapse of time. The High Court, differing from the Subordinate Judge, have decided the point against the appellants, and have dismissed the suit brought by them for recovery of the debt.

Baru Mal and Dhum Singh, who were bankers in Saharanpur, had dealings together, and Dhum Singh came to owe Baru Mal Rs. 33,359-3-6. It was then agreed between them that Dhum Singh should convey to Baru Mal or to his wife, Bassu Kuar, certain villages for the sum of Rs. 55,000, and that his debt should be set off against the price. On the 1st September, 1879, he executed and delivered to Baru Mal a deed by which he acknowledged the receipt of the whole purchase-money, and conveyed the villages to Bassu Kuar, and he endorsed on the deed a memorandum showing that the balance only of the price, after allowing for the debt, was paid in cash. No money was actually paid.

On the same day Baru Mal took away the deed and signed a letter prepared by Dhum Singh, in which he agreed to register the deed and to pay the balance of the price. But very soon afterwards he found, or alleged, that the deed was not in accordance with certain conditions for which he had stipulated, and, declining [54] to complete the purchase, he demanded what was owing to him. Dhum Singh on his part insisted that the deed was in accordance with the contract, and after an attempt at arbitration had failed, he brought a suit on the 3rd August, 1880, against Baru Mal and Bassu for specific performance of the contract, praying that the deed might be registered, and that Baru Mal might be ordered to pay the balance of the Rs. 55,000 with interest, after setting off the debt of Rs. 33,359-3-6.

On the 24th of February, 1881, the Subordinate Judge decided in favour of Dhum Singh's view, and gave him a decree according to his prayer. Baru Mal appealed to the High Court. After reviewing the evidence, their conclusion was that Dhum Singh did not make out to their satisfaction that the sale-deed ever became a contract binding on Baru Mal, and enforceable against him in law. They therefore dismissed his suit. Their decree was made on the 14th of March, 1884 (1).

Upon that event Baru Mal renewed his demands for the payment of his debt, and not being able to get it, he, in conjunction with his wife Bassu, instituted the present suit on the 10th of September, 1884. He is since dead, and his sons have been substituted for him as co-plaintiffs with the widow. In his plaint he states the deed of the 1st of September, 1879, and alleges that, in the preparation of the deed, Dhum Singh took steps contrary to the engagement, that so disputes arose, that Dhum Singh unjustly brought a claim for enforcement of the contract, but that the claim was dismissed by the High Court, who held the contract to be invalid. He then claims that the amount for which Dhum Singh had given credit to him in the sale-deed ought to be refunded, and claims interest upon it.

Dhum Singh's defence is that Baru Mal always denied the existence of a contract; that the High Court held there was no contract; that the character of the debt never was altered; and that there was nothing to save it from being barred by limitation.

[55] The High Court hold that this defence is sound in law, and their decree dismisses the suit as being barred by limitation. They do not state under which article of Act XV of 1877 the case falls; but they consider Baru Mal's claim to be for nothing but the old balance due from Dhum Singh. Probably they would hold it to fall, as was argued at their Lordships' bar, under article 64 (in the second schedule); therefore, as none of the statutory provisions by which the time for suing is enlarged can be applied to this case, except that which relates to acknowledgment, and as no written acknowledgment can be found later than the plaint filed by Dhum Singh in the specific performance suit, Baru Mal's right to sue would be barred at latest long before he sued.

Their Lordships find themselves unable to agree with the High Court as to the nature of the claim. They think that it is substantially put upon the right ground in the plaint. It must be remembered that it has throughout been common ground to both disputants, that there was a contract made between them, and that among its terms were the sale of the villages for Rs. 55,000, the retention by Dhum Singh of his debt of Rs. 33,359-3-6 as part payment, and the payment by Baru Mal of the balance. Their quarrel was about other matters. Dhum Singh alleged that the terms just mentioned were all the terms of the contract, and he claimed its completion on that footing. Baru Mal alleged that there were other terms, accused Dhum Singh of dishonesty, and after a time claimed the right of receding from the bargain altogether. But the Subordinate Judge took the view of Dhum Singh, and decreed completion of the contract according to that view. Up to the date of the Subordinate Judge's decree in 1881, Dhum Singh retained the amount of his debt as of right, and in accordance with the contract alleged by him. After the decree of 1881 he still retained it as of right, and with a title which could not be disputed in any Court of Justice, except by the one mode of appeal from the decree of 1881. Baru Mal might have sued for his debt, but the utmost benefit that could have come to him from such a suit would have been to have it suspended or retained in Court till [56] after decision of the appeal in the specific performance suit. Dhum Singh's defence would have been that the debt was paid by virtue of the 1888 contract, and that defence must have prevailed if the suit were heard while the decree of 1881 still stood unreversed. It would be an inconvenient state of the law if it were found necessary for a man to institute a perfectly vain litigation under peril of losing his property if he does not. And it would be a lamentable state of the law if it were found that a debtor who for years has been insisting that his creditor shall take payment in a particular mode, can, when it is decided that he cannot enforce that mode, turn round and say that the lapse of time has relieved him from paying at all.

JUNE 21 & JULY 7. In their Lordships' view, the decree of the High Court in 1884, brought about a new state of things, and imposed a new obligation on Dhum Singh. He was now no longer in the position of being able to allege that his debt to Baru Mal had been wiped out by the contract, and that instead thereof Baru Mal was entitled to the villages. He became bound to pay that which he had retained in payment for his land. And the matter may be viewed in either of two ways, according to the terms of the Contract Act, IX of 1872, or according to the terms of the Limitation Act, XV of 1877.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

11 A. 47 (P.C.)= 15 I.A. 211=

5 Sar. P.C.J. 260=12 Ind. Jur. 450.

By the 65th section of the Contract Act "when an agreement is discovered to be void, or when a contract becomes void, any person who has received any advantage under such agreement or contract is bound to restore it, or to make compensation for it, to the person from whom he received it." In this case there most certainly was an agreement, which, as written, was in the terms alleged by Dhum Singh. But it was held not to be enforceable by him because there were other unwritten terms which he would not admit; and the other party did not seek to enforce the agreement according to his version of it, but threw it up altogether. The agreement became wholly ineffectual, and was discovered to be so when the High Court decreed it to be so. The advantage received by Dhum Singh under it was the retention of his debt. Therefore by the terms of the statute he became bound to pay his debt on the 14th March, 1884.

[57] Trying the case by the terms of the Limitation Act, their Lordships think that it falls within article 97. An action for money paid upon an existing consideration which afterwards fails, is not barred till three years after date of the failure. A debt retained in part payment of the purchase money is in effect, and as between vendor and purchaser, a payment of that part; and if that were doubtful on the first retention while there was yet undecided dispute, it could no longer be doubtful when a decree of a Court of justice authorized the retention, and in effect substituted the land for the debt. Dhum Singh retained the money, and Baru Mal lost the use of it, in consideration of the villages which formed the subject of the sale-deed. That consideration failed when the decree of 1884 was made, and it failed none the less because the failure was owing to Baru Mal's own reluctance to take it under the conditions insisted on by Dhum Singh.

The result is that in their Lordships' opinion the High Court ought to have sustained the Subordinate Judge's decree, and to have dismissed the appeal with costs, and they will now humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the decree of the High Court, and to make an order to that effect. The respondent must pay the costs of the appeal.

The result of the English cases regarding "hard" or "unconscionable bargains" is that in dealings with expectant heirs, reversioners or remaindermen, the fact that [58] the bargain was declined by others as not being sufficiently advantageous does not raise a presumption that it was fair and reasonable; and that until the contrary is satisfactorily proved by the party trying to maintain the bargain, the Court may presume that a bargain which apparently provides, in the opinion of the Court, for an unusually high return or for an exceptionally high rate of interest, is a hard and unconscionable bargain against which relief should be granted. The doctrine of equity on the subject of such bargains is applicable in England only to dealings with expectant heirs, reversioners or remaindermen. The judgment of the Privy Council in Srimati Kamini Sundari Chaodhrani v. Kali Prossunno Ghose (1) does not imply that the doctrine is to be applied in India to cases except where it would have been applied in England, or except where the case is in some way analogous to a case of snatching a bargain with an expectant heir, reversioner or remainderman, or except there is some fiduciary relationship between the lender and the borrower although there may be no fraud or undue influence, or except there is some incapacity, such as ignorance, on the part of the borrower to appreciate the true effect of his bargain.

The judgment of the Privy Council in Ram Coomar Coondoo v. Chunder Canto Mookerjee (2) shows that while the specific English law of maintenance and champerty has not been introduced into India, and while fair agreements to supply funds to carry on litigation in consideration of having a share of the property if recovered should not be regarded as per se opposed to public policy, yet such agreements should be carefully watched, and if extortionate and unconscionable, or made not with the bona fide object of assisting, for a reasonable recompense, a claim believed to be just, but for the purpose of gambling in litigation, or of injuring or oppressing others by encouraging unrighteous suits, should be held contrary to public policy, and not enforced.

For the purposes of meeting the expenses of an appeal to the High Court, the appellant, on the advice of his legal advisers, executed a bond for Rs. 25,000 in consideration of the obligee agreeing to defray such expenses. The obligor agreed to pay the Rs. 25,000 within one year from his recovering possession of the property in suit; and at the request of the obligor's pleader, the obligee advanced Rs. 3,700, which was applied to the expenses of the appeal. The High Court dismissed the appeal; and in a deed executed by the obligor in favour of the obligee and others for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a further appeal to the Privy Council, he admitted his liability under the former bond. The Privy Council decreed his appeal, and he obtained possession of the property in suit, but declined to pay the Rs. 25,000, upon which the obligee sued upon the bond. It was found that, apart from the moneys borrowed by the obligor from time to time, he was without even the means of subsistence; that he executed the bond with his eyes open and perfectly understood his position and the effect of both the instruments executed by him; that no fraud or improper pressure appeared to have been applied to him; that his legal advisers had acted honestly and to the best of their ability in his interests; that there [59] was nothing to show that, having regard to the risks of the litigation, he could have obtained the assistance necessary for the prosecution of his appeal on better terms than those contained in the bond; that without such assistance he could not have appealed to the High Court; and that the obligee gave him such assistance upon his application.

Held that although there was nothing to show that the obligor could have obtained an advance on terms more advantageous to himself, it was for the obligee to establish to the Court's satisfaction, without reasonable doubt, that he could not have done so; and that, this not having been established, and the reasonableness and fairness of the bargain not being proved by showing that there had been difficulties in negotiating it, or that others had refused it as not sufficiently advantageous to them, the Court should hold the bargain to be a hard and unconscionable one, which should not be enforced.

Held also that the obligee could not, under the circumstances, have considered both that the obligor's claim was a just one and reasonably likely to succeed, and that the Rs. 25,000 was a reasonable recompense in the event of success for the advance of Rs. 3,700; and the bond was therefore a gambling in litigation, which it would be contrary to public policy to enforce.

The Court gave the plaintiff a decree for the Rs. 3,700 actually advanced, with simple interest at 20 per cent. per annum from the date of the bond to the date of the decree, with costs in proportion, and interest at 6 per cent. per annum on the Rs. 3,700, interest and costs, from the date of the decree until payment.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and TYRRELL, J.—In the suit out of which these two first appeals arise, Bibi Chunni Kuar sued Raja Rup Singh on his bond, dated the 10th December, 1878, for Rs 25,000 with future interest at one per cent. from the date of the institution of the suit to the date of realization; she also claimed the costs of the suit. In her plaint she alleged that the defendant had, in 1877, instituted a suit in forma pauperis against Rani Baisni and the Collector, as Manager of the Court of Wards, for the recovery of the estates of Raj Barah; that the suit was dismissed, and that in order to enable him to file an appeal to this Court, he borrowed from her Rs. 3,700 on the 10th December, 1878, and in consideration of that advance executed the bond in suit, by which he promised her to pay Rs. 25,000 within a year from recovery of possession of the estate. In the plaint it was also alleged that the appeal to this Court was dismissed, and that subsequently the defendant executed a sale-deed in favour of the plaintiff and others in respect of the costs of an appeal to the Privy Council, in which he admitted that the debt sued for would, in future, be due by him, that a decree was passed by the Privy Council in the defendant's favour (1), and he obtained possession of the estate on the 13th August, 1884, but still evades payment of the debt due under his bond.

The defendant by his written statement pleaded amongst other things that the contract was one of champerty and, as such, illegal, that it was void as being contrary to the provisions of ss. 23 and 30 of the Indian Contract Act; that the plaintiff had not given any portion of the Rs. 3,700 to the defendant; that the moneys for the expenses incurred in this Court were advanced by Maulvi Muhammad Mohsin out of his own pocket; that the bond did not provide that the money would be paid in case of the defendant succeeding in the Privy Council, and that the defendant not having succeeded in this Court, the plaintiff was not entitled to make her claim.

The suit was heard by the then Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri, who held that the claim was not based on champerty; that ss. 23 and 30 of the Indian Contract Act did not apply; that the provision in the bond as to payment on the defendant succeeding was a general one and was not confined to the event of his succeeding in the High Court. The Subordinate Judge found that the defendant had received the consideration of the bond. The Subordinate Judge also found that the defendant's contract was entered into at a time when he was not in a composed state of mind, that at that time the defendant was without means and had to provide for an expense of several thousands of rupees at a critical time, and held that, under the circumstances, the plaintiff was not entitled to the full amount sued for, but only to the amount actually advanced with interest and costs. The Subordinate Judge on the 16th [61] of December, 1886, made a decree for Rs. 6,722-13-9 with proportionate costs and interest at 8 annas per centum, from the date of the suit to the 15th December, 1886, on the principle sum and thenceforth on the aggregate amount as against the defendant, and dismissed the rest of the claim with proportionate costs to the defendant, and allowed the pleaders' fees in full. From that decree the plaintiff and the defendant respectively appealed. Their appeals were heard by us, and we took time to consider our judgment.

The facts of the case are few and simple. The defendant on the death of his nephew, which happened in or shortly prior to 1877, made a claim to the Raj Barah estates. That claim was disputed, and in order to establish his title to the estates it became necessary for the defendant to institute a suit. At that time and until the defendant obtained his decree in the Privy Council, he was without any means, even the means of subsistence, and had no money except what he from time to time managed to borrow from others. He had, however, a friend, Maulvi Muhammad Mohsin, a vakil, who had previously acted for him and who also acted for him in some of the stages of the litigation as to the Raj Barah estates and in negotiating, amongst others, the loan in respect of which the bond in suit was given. The defendant requested Maulvi Muhammad Mohsin to assist him to bring a suit for possession of the estates. In view of the large expenses which such a suit would probably involve, Muhammad Mohsin hesitated, but ultimately Muhammad Mohsin and Babu Hemraj, a pleader, undertook to institute on behalf of the defendant a suit in forma pauperis. That suit was instituted, on the 24th July, 1877, in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri. Whilst that suit was pending in the Court at Mainpuri, the defendant and Lala Punni Lal agreed that Lala Punni Lal should assist the defendant to take his case to the Privy Council, and should for such assistance raise one lac of rupees. Muhammad Mohsin, on being informed by Lala Punni Lal of this agreement, told the defendant that he had made a mistake in agreeing to give a lac of rupees [62] to Lala Punni Lal without consulting him, Muhammad Mohsin. At that time the defendant had executed a vakalatnama in favour of Muhammad Mohsin and Babu Hemraj, who were conducting the defendant's suit in the Court at Mainpuri. The defendant told Muhammad Mohsin that he had given his word to Lala Punni Lal but that Muhammad Mohsin was to do what he could for him. Muhammad Mohsin replied that he and Babu Hemraj were willing to assist and provide for the expenses in the Court at Mainpuri, but that as the matter had been negotiated with Lala Punni Lal, he, Muhammad Mohsin, would ask Lala Punni Lal not to interfere with the suit in the Court of first instance, and to take Rs. 75,000 for assisting in the conducting of the case in this Court and in the Privy Council, that is, that Lala Punni Lal should receive a bond for Rs. 25,000 if it should be necessary to prosecute or defend an appeal in this Court, and a further bond for Rs. 50,000 if it should be necessary to conduct or defend an appeal in the Privy Council. The defendant's suit was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri. After the suit was dismissed in the Court at Mainpuri, it was, at first, intended that the defendant should file an appeal to this Court in forma pauperis, and that Lala Punni Lal should not be called upon for assistance. However, a well-known and most respected vakil of this Court, Munshi Hanuman Prasad, who has recently died, advised that the defendant could not get leave to appeal in forma pauperis except on grounds of law, and that the law did not provide for the re-admission of an appeal after it had been rejected in forma pauperis. The effect of the opinion of Munshi Hanuman Prasad was communicated to the defendant by his general attorney, Ganga Prasad, after which the defendant and Ganga Prasad went to Lala Punni Lal at Mainpuri, and after some discussion Lala Punni Lal agreed to the terms which, as we have above mentioned, had been suggested by Muhammad Mohsin to the defendant, that is to say, he agreed to defray the expenses of an appeal in this Court on receiving the defendant's bond for Rs. 25,000, and further, if necessary, to provide for the expenses of an appeal to the Privy Council in consideration of the defendant giving him his bond for Rs. 50,000. [63] Muhammad Mohsin applied to Lala Punni Lal to advance Rs. 3,700 for the purpose of filing and prosecuting the defendant's appeal in this Court. The defendant having executed the bond in suit on the 10th December, 1878, Lala Punni Lal advanced the Rs. 3,700, and that sum was applied in the following manner:—Rs. 2,500 was paid for the stamps required for the memorandum of appeal, Rs. 200 were paid for the translation fees, and Rs. 1,000 paid to the vakils employed on behalf of the defendant in this Court in his appeal, as their fees. Bibi Chunni Kuar was the wife of Lala Punni Lal, in whose favour the bond of the 10th December, 1878, was executed by the defendant. On the 18th December, 1878, the defendant's appeal to this Court was filed through Pandit Ajudhia Nath and the late Pandit Nand Lal, who for the purposes of that appeal were his vakils in this Court. The defendant's appeal was dismissed by this Court on the 7th May, 1880. Shortly before or after the dismissal by this Court of the defendant's appeal, Lala Punni Lal died. After the death of Lala Punni Lal and the dismissal of the defendant's appeal by this Court, Muhammad Mohsin on behalf of the defendant applied to the plaintiff, Chunni Kuar, to advance the money required for an appeal to the Privy Council on a bond being given in his favour. Chunni Kuar replied that she had no one to look after her business, and she was therefore not prepared to undertake the expenses of the appeal alone. The defendant urged Muhammad Mohsin to get an appeal to the Privy Council filed, and represented to him that he, the defendant, would not mind parting with a four annas or an eight annas share in the Raj Barah estate, or giving a lac of rupees for the necessary assistance. After several fruitless attempts to negotiate a loan, Muhammad Mohsin at last succeeded in getting several persons, Chunni Kuar being one of them, to agree to provide for security for the cost of the contemplated appeal to the Privy Council to the extent of Rs. 4,000 and for translation charges, pleader's fee, and other expenses of every kind to the extent of Rs. 8,500, on the terms, which are contained in the deed executed in their favour by the defendant on the 13th March, 1882. In the defendant's deed on the 13th March 1882, the defendant acknowledged his liability [64] to the plaintiff, Chunni Kuar, under his bond of the 10th December, 1878, which is now sued on. The plaintiff, Chunni Kuar, and the other parties, who had agreed as above mentioned, provided the necessary security and the moneys which were required. The defendant filed the appeal to the Privy Council on the 9th November, 1880. On the 14th April, 1884, the defendant obtained a decree in the Privy Council, which established his title to the Raj Barah estates and the accumulated income. The respondents in the appeal in the Privy Council applied for a review of judgment, which application was dismissed. It is admitted on the pleadings that the defendant on the 13th August, 1884, obtained possession of the Raj Barah estates. He has declined to discharge his bond of the 10th December, 1878, and has repudiated all liability under it, and also all liability under the deed of the 13th March, 1882. In addition to the facts which have been found by us as above, we find as a fact that the defendant perfectly understood his position and the effect of the bond of the 10th December, 1878, and the sale-deed of the 13th March, 1882; that there was no pressure brought to bear upon the defendant to execute the bond of the 10th December, 1878, and the sale-deed of the 13th March, 1882, other than the pressure of the position in which the defendant owing to his poverty found himself placed; that Muhammad Mohsin and Ganga Prasad acted throughout in the negotiations honestly and to the best of their ability in furtherance of the interests of the defendant, and that there is nothing to show that the defendant could have obtained the necessary assistance for the filing and prosecution of his appeal in this Court on better terms than those on which that assistance was actually obtained, which are the terms contained in his bond of the 10th December, 1878. Without that assistance the defendant could not have appealed to this Court. We also find that it was the defendant who applied to Lala Punni Lal for assistance. Mr. Roshan Lal, who with Mr. Malcomson appeared for the defendant before us, contended in the first place that the bond of the 10th December, 1878, was inadmissible in evidence as it had not been registered under the Indian Registration Act, and, secondly, that on the true [65] construction of the bond, the Rs. 25,000 was payable only in the event of the defendant succeeding in this Court in the appeal which he filed on the 18th December, 1878, and that having failed in that appeal the defendant was under no liability under the bond. As to Mr. Roshan Lal's first point it is sufficient to say that he cited no section of the Indian Registration Act and no authority in support of his contention, and that the Indian Registration Act does not prohibit bonds of this description being given in evidence if not registered. As to his second point, the bond does not, in our opinion, bear the narrow construction which he attempted to place upon it, a construction, moreover, which would defeat the intention of the parties at the time when Lala Punni Lal agreed to advance the money required for the appeal to this Court.

Mr. Malcomson, on behalf of the defendant, contended that the bargain was unconscionable and was against public policy, and that we should apply to the transaction the principles which the Courts of equity in England have applied to dealings with reversioners. It was also contended on behalf of the defendant that as the plaintiff had not in the event and alone undertaken all the expenses of the appeal to the Privy Council, she was not entitled to recover on the bond of the 10th December, 1878. It appears to us that the bond of the 10th December, 1878, and the sale-deed of the 13th March, 1882, are two separate contracts, and further that as the defendant in the latter document acknowledged his liability under the former, the point, even if it were otherwise a good one, is not now open to him. Mr. Banerji on behalf of the plaintiff contended that the agreement was under the circumstances of the case a fair and reasonable one, that it was not unconscionable or against public policy, and that the principles applicable to dealings with reversioners were not applicable to this case. In the course of the arguments of Mr. Malcolmson and Mr. Banerji, the following authorities amongst others were referred to, namely, Srimati Kamini Sundari Chaodhrani v. Kali Prossunno Ghose (1), Grose v. Amir-[66] tamayi Dasi (2), Tara Sundari Chaodhrani v. The Court of Wards (3), Boodhun Singh v. Luteefun (4), *Chedambara Chetty v. If the law of England as to maintenance applied in this country, it is clear to our minds that it would apply in this case, and that it would be our duty to hold that the bond of the 10th December, 1878, was void. As far back as 1862, it was in the case of Ganesh Prasad v. Sheo Ratan Lall and Fakeer Chand (18) held by the Sadar Diwani Adalat of these Provinces, following a previous decision of that Court and a Full Bench decision of the Court at Calcutta, that the laws and regulations in force in this country did not make it necessary to apply the English law of champerty to its full extent, and no doubt the same would have been held by that Court as to the English law of maintenance. It has now finally been decided by the Privy Council in Ram Coomar Coondoo v. Chunder Canto Mookerjee (8) that the specific English law of maintenance and champerty has not been introduced into India. At page 46 their Lordships are reported to have said, "But whilst their Lordships hold that the specific English law of maintenance and champerty has not been introduced into India, it seems clear to them upon the authorities that contracts of this kind or character ought under certain circumstances to be held to be invalid, as being against public policy. Some of the circumstances which would tend [67] to render them so have been adverted to in the two judgments of this tribunal already cited. Their Lordships think it may properly be inferred from the decisions above referred to, and especially those of this tribunal, that a fair agreement to supply funds to carry on a suit in consideration of having a share of the property, if recovered, ought not to be regarded as being, per se, opposed to public policy. Indeed, cases may be easily supposed in which it would be in furtherance of right and justice, and necessary to resist oppression, that a suitor who had a just title to property, and no means except the property itself, should be assisted in this manner. But agreements of this kind ought to be carefully watched and when found to be extortionate and unconscionable, so as to be inequitable against the party, or to be made not with the bona fide object of assisting a claim believed to be just, and of obtaining a reasonable recompense therefor, but for the purpose of gambling in litigation, or of injuring or oppressing others by abetting or encouraging unrighteous suits, so as to be contrary to public policy, effect ought not to be given to them."

In that judgment most of the decisions in the Privy Council and in India dealing with the subject were considered. The decision of the Privy Council in Srimati Kamini Sundari Chaodhrani v. Kali Prossunno Ghose (1) is of great importance, as it shows that in India the Courts may apply to cases in which the dealings sought to be impugned were not with expectant heirs, reversioners or remaindermen, the doctrines or principles which the Courts of Equity of England have applied to hard or unconscionable bargains with expectant heirs, reversioners or remaindermen. In that case their Lordships are reported to have said (pp. 225 and 226), "The finding of the lower Court against fraud and undue influence must now be accepted; a contrary finding would have avoided the whole transaction. But assuming the validity of the mortgage, a question arises whether under the circumstances the rate of interest exacted did not amount to a hard or unconscionable bargain such as a Court of equity will give relief against. The doctrine of equity on this subject was laid [68] down by the Master of the Rolls in Beynon v. Cook (2) and his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. Rhys Beynon was a reversioner or remainderman, Cook was a money-lender who took from him a promissory note for £100, for which he charged £15 discount for six months, and a mortgage of his reversionary interest, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per month. The Master of the Rolls made a decree for redemption on payment of the amount advanced, at simple interest at 5 per cent. per annum. He observed, 'The point to be considered is, was that a hard bargain? The doctrine has nothing to do with fraud. It has been laid down in case after case that the Court, wherever there is a dealing of this kind, looks at the reasonableness of the bargain, and, if it is what is called a hard bargain, sets it aside. It was obviously a very hard bargain indeed, and one which cannot be treated as being within the reasonableness which has been laid down by so many Judges.' This equitable doctrine appears to have a strong application to the facts of this case, where we have a borrower a pardanashin lady; the lender, her own mukhtar, under the cloak of a benamidar; the security an ample one, as abundantly appears; the interest on both mortgages, especially the compound interest on the latter, exorbitant and unconscionable; and a purchaser with full notice of these circumstances."

It is to be observed that, although their Lordships allude to the fact that the borrower was a pardanashin lady and the lender her own mukhtar under the cloak of a benamidar, they accepted the finding of the lower Court that there had been no fraud or undue influence.

The difficulty which we feel is as to what constitutes a hard and unconscionable bargain. In some of the English cases stress was apparently laid on the fact that the security had not been valued. Yet Sir George Jessel, M. R., in Beynon v. Cook (1) at page 392, after showing that in many instances in which the Courts of equity applied the doctrine under consideration, the value of the security could not be ascertained, expressly stated that "the value [69] of the security is not an element for consideration." He said at page 393, "The object of the rule is to prevent the distress of the reversioner being taken advantage of, and to protect him, according to Mr. Swanston (2 Sw. 150 n.) "against the designs of that calculating capacity which the law constantly discountenances, the distress frequently incident to the owners of profitable reversions, and the improvidence with which men are commonly disposed to sacrifice the future to the present."

Lord Selborne, L. C., in Aylesford v. Morris (2), having referred to the repeal of the usury laws and the effect of the 31 Vic. c. 4, said, "These changes of the law have in no degree whatever altered the onus probandi in these cases, which, according to the language of Lord Hardwick in Chesterfield v. Janssen (3), raises from the circumstances or conditions of the parties contracting, weakness on one side, usury on the other, or extortion, or advantage taken of that weakness,—a presumption of fraud. Fraud does not here mean deceit or circumvention; it means an unconscientious use of the power arising out of the circumstances or conditions; and when the relative position of the parties is such as prima facie to raise this presumption, the transaction cannot stand, unless the person claiming the benefit of it, is able to repel the presumption by contrary evidence, proving it to have been in point of fact fair, just and reasonable." After referring to some of the considerations which had prevailed in cases in which this doctrine of equity had been applied, he, at page 492, said, "But the real truth is, that the ordinary effect of all the circumstances by which these considerations are introduced, is to deliver over the prodigal helpless into the hands of those interested in taking advantage of his weakness; and we so arrive in every such case at the substance of the conditions which throw the burden of justifying the righteousness of the bargain upon the party who claims the benefit of it."

How the righteousness of the bargain could, if contested, be established we find it difficult to see, if the value of the security at the time when the bargain was made is to be excluded from [70] consideration. In the case of Chesterfield v. Janssen (3) and in Bowes v. Heaps (4) the borrower had offered the security to several persons who had rejected it as not sufficiently advantageous, before it was finally accepted by a party against whom relief was decreed. Sir William Grant, M. R., in Bowes v. Heaps (4), at p. 119 said, "It is not imputed to them (the defendants) that they used any endeavours to prevail upon the plaintiff to enter into the transaction. They merely acceded to the proposal that was made to them. It is not, however, every bargain which distress may induce one man to offer, that another is at liberty to accept. The mere absence of fraud does not necessarily decide upon the validity of the transaction; as is proved by many cases, from Banny v. Pitt down to Gwynne v. Heaton. In the latter, Lord Thurlow says, the defendant is not charged with misleading the plaintiff's judgment or tampering with his poverty. In that case, too, as in this, the bargain had been hawked about and offered to many persons. That, Lord Thurlow says, only shows the distress of the borrower," and at the same page Sir William Grant also said, "It would not,

I think, be endured that a money-lender should take from a distressed man dealing for his reversionary interest, an engagement to pay four to one upon the contingency of a person, of the age of twenty seven in perfect health, out-living another of the age of thirty-two, debilitated by disease and ruined in constitution by long continued habits of intemperance." After referring to the nature of the risk in that case, Sir William Grant, at page 120, said, "Allowing the risk to be still considerable, against that must be set the unusual amount of the stipulated return. Combining the two together, it seems to me that there is more inequality in this bargain than existed in some of the cases in which the contract has been set aside," and he granted relief.

The result of the English cases appears to be that in dealings with expectant heirs, reversioners or remaindermen, the fact that the bargain was declined by others as not being sufficiently advantageous, does not raise a presumption that it was a fair and reasonable [71] bargain; and that until the contrary is satisfactorily proved by the party trying to maintain the bargain, the Court may presume that a bargain which apparently provides in the opinion of the Court, for an unusually high return or for an exceptionally high rate of interest is a hard and unconscionable bargain, against which relief should be granted. The doctrine of equity to which we are referring is, so far as we are aware, applicable in England only to dealings with expectant heirs, reversioners or remaindermen. Sir George Jessel, M. R., in Beydon v. Cook (1), at p. 392, said, "It has never been said a man can be relieved because he happens to be a reversioner, and the money-lender does not know it, but lends him money upon his promissory note at usurious interest. In order to be relieved, he must have been trusted upon the credit of his expectation." Many of the considerations stated by the earlier equity Judges in England for the doctrine we are considering do not arise in cases such as that which we have to decide here. We do not gather from the judgments of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Srimati Kamini Sundari Chaodhrani v. Kali Prossunno Ghose (2) that the doctrine which the Courts of Equity in England have applied to cases of snatching bargains with expectant heirs, reversioners or remaindermen, is to be applied in India to cases except where it would have been applied in England or except where the case is in some way analogous to a case of snatching a bargain with an expectant heir, reversioner or remainderman, or except there is some fiduciary relationship between the lender and the borrower, although there may be no fraud or undue influence, or except there is incapacity, such as ignorance, on the part of the borrower to appreciate the true effect of his or her bargain. To apply it to all cases where the contracted return was exceptionally large or the rate of interest was high would be for the Judges to make contracts for the parties which they never intended to make for themselves.

In our opinion Sir George Jessel, M. R., in Wallis v. Smith (3) with sound common sense said, "I have always thought, and [72] still think, that it is of the utmost importance as regards contracts between adults, persons not under disability, and at arm's length, that the Courts of law should maintain the performance of the contracts according to the intention of the parties; that they should not overrule any clearly expressed intention on the ground that Judges know the business of the people better than the people know it themselves. I am perfectly well aware that there are exceptions, but they are exceptions of a legislative character."

We have arrived at the conclusion, but we confess after much doubt and difficulty, that we may hold that this is a case to which we may apply the ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Srimati Kamini Sundari Chaodhrani v. Kali Prassunno Ghose (1) to which we have referred, and which is to be found at pages 225 and 226 of the report of that case. There was in this case, so far as we see, no fraud on the part of Lala Punni Lal or the plaintiff or on the part of the agents of the defendant. The defendant entered into the contract with his eyes open and on the advice of his legal advisers, and we doubt if he could at that time, having regard to the risks of his litigation, have obtained an advance of money on terms more advantageous to himself; but that he could not have done so is not sufficiently established by the plaintiff, and it was for her to leave our minds without any reasonable doubt on the point. As we have pointed out, mere difficulties in negotiating a bargain, or the fact that the bargain was refused by others as not sufficiently advantageous, have not been held to prove that the bargain was a fair and reasonable one and not a hard and unconscionable bargain within the meaning of the rule. Under the circumstances we find that the bargain was a hard and unconscionable one, which we ought not to enforce.

On the ground also to which we shall now refer we are of opinion that we should not enforce this contract. Gambling in litigation and what are called in England maintenance and champerty are unfortunately only too common in this country. The abuses which in 1869, Phear, J., in his judgment in Grose v. [73] Amirtamayi Dasi (2) stated to exist in every Court of civil Justice throughout Bengal, unfortunately exist at the present day in these Provinces. Although fully recognising that in India, as was pointed out by the Lordships of the Privy Council in Ram Coomar Coondoo v. Chunder Canto Mookerjee (3), "a fair agreement to supply funds to carry on a suit in consideration of having a share in the property, if recovered, ought not to be regarded as being, per se, opposed to public policy," their Lordships were careful to add, "But agreements of this kind ought to be carefully watched, and when found to be extortionate and unconscionable, so as to be inequitable against the party, or to be made, not with the bona fide object of assisting a claim believed to be just, and of obtaining a reasonable recompense therefor, but for improper objects, as for the purpose of gambling in litigation or of injuring and oppressing others by abetting and encouraging unrighteous suits, so as to be contrary to public policy, effect ought not to be given to them." Now in this case it appears to us that if Lala Punni Lal or the plaintiff believed the defendant's claim to have been a just one or one in which there were not long odds against his chance of success, Rs. 25,000, in the event of success for an advance of Rs. 3,700 could not be and could not have been considered by them or either of them to be reasonable recompense. On the other hand, if Rs. 25,000 were or were considered to be a reasonable recompense in the event of success for an advance of Rs. 3,700, it could only be on the ground that the plaintiff's claim was of such a highly speculative character as to make the odds long against his chances of success and the transaction one of gambling in litigation. In either view we are of opinion that to enforce such a contract as that in this case would be against public policy, as it would be only to encourage parties not interested in a litigation to assist, for their own private purposes, a litigant to pursue a litigation in the success of which on the basis of a just claim they did not honestly believe, or for their assistance in which they required an unreasonably large recompense.

[74] Although we are of opinion that we should not enforce the contract in this case by decreeing the plaintiff's claim for Rs. 25,000, we are also of opinion that we should give, as we now do, the plaintiff a decree for the amount actually advanced with simple interest at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum from the date of the bond, that is to say, from the 10th December, 1878, to the date of this decree with proportionate costs of suit and of the plaintiff's appeal, and with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the amount of such advance, interest, and costs, from the date of this decree until payment. The defendant's appeal is dismissed with costs and the plaintiff's appeal is allowed to the extent above indicated with proportionate costs. We have allowed interest at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum as that is not an unusual rate in these Provinces where there is no security or but a doubtful security.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

JANGI NATH AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. PHUNDO AND ANOTHER
(Defendants). * [10th July, 1888.]

Civil Procedure Code, ss. 244, 283—Decree against mortgagor for mortgage money and directing sale of mortgaged property as against him and a third party—Attachment of other property in possession of third party as that of the mortgagor—Claim by third party to ownership of such property—Suit by decree-holder to establish mortgagor's right to property.

In a suit upon a hypothecation bond a third party was made defendant, as she claimed the hypothecated property. The mortgagee obtained a decree for recovery of the amount of the bond, and for enforcement of the mortgage. In execution of the decree the debt not being satisfied by sale of the mortgaged property, the decree-holder, caused certain other immoveable property in the possession of the third party to be attached. She objected to the attachment on the ground that this property was her own, and was not liable to sale in execution of the decree. The objection was allowed, and the decree-holder then sued for a declaration that the property belonged to the mortgagor judgment-debtor, and was liable to attachment and sale in execution of the decree.

[75] Held that as no claim in the former suit was made against the objector personally or in a representative character, but, as regards her, the only claim was virtually for a declaration that she was not entitled to the hypothecated property, the decree affected her only so far as it negatived her alleged interest in that property, and, so far as it was sought to be enforced against other property, she was a stranger to that suit, and her objection must be taken to have been decided under ss. 278 and 280 of the Civil Procedure Code, and the present suit was rightly brought under s. 283 and was not barred by s. 244. Kameshwar Pershad v. Run Bahadur Singh (1) referred to. Mulmantri v. Ashfak Ahmad (2) and Nimba Harishet v. Sitaram Paraji (3) distinguished.

The facts of this case were as follows:—On the 13th February, 1876, Bhika Mal, styling himself son of Dwarka Das and proprietor of the firm of Dwarka Das Bhika Mal, executed an instrument in favour of Babu Baijnath, whereby he promised to pay Rs. 15,000 to the latter, and mortgaged certain immoveable property as security for the payment of the money. In July, 1882, Baijnath brought a suit on this instrument against Bhika Mal, styling him the "adopted son" of Dwarka Das, and against Musammat Phundo, widow of Dwarka Das. In this suit Baijnath claimed to recover the money due under the instrument from Bhika Mal personally, and by the sale of the mortgaged property, "by enforcement of lien as against both defendants." He stated in the plaint in this suit, with reference to Musammat Phundo, as follows:—"As the defendant No. 2 now declares herself proprietor of the whole property, she has also been impleaded, although she has no right to the property, and defendant No. 1 (Bhika Mal) is the owner of the property and of the share of Dwarka Das, because he was his own brother and was adopted by him, and he is a proprietor by right of inheritance."

The plaintiff's contention in this suit was that Bhika Mal, step-brother of Dwarka Das, was his adopted son and sole heir, and had inherited the mortgaged property from Dwarka Das. Musammat Phundo contended that Bhika Mal was not the adopted son of Dwarka Das; that the mortgaged property was the separate property of her husband, to which she had succeeded, and that Bhika [76] Mal had no authority to mortgage the property, and it was not liable to the plaintiff Baijnath's claim. On the 17th January, 1883, Baijnath obtained a decree in this suit for the recovery of the money claimed from Bhika Mal, and for enforcement of the mortgage contained in the instrument of the 13th February, 1876.

The mortgaged property having been sold, and the mortgage-debt not being satisfied, Baijnath caused certain immoveable property in the possession of Musammat Phundo to be attached in the execution of the decree as the property of Bhika Mal. Musammat Phundo objected to the attachment, alleging that she had inherited the property from her deceased husband, Dwarka Das, and it was not liable to be attached and sold in execution of Baijnath's decree against Bhika Mal. This objection was allowed by the Court executing the decree on the 13th March, 1885. In May, 1885, Baijnath brought the present suit against Musammat Phundo and Bhika Mal, in which he claimed a declaration that the property belonged to Bhika Mal, and was liable to attachment and sale in execution of his decree.

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Agra) held that the suit was barred by the provisions of s. 244 of the Civil Procedure Code, and dismissed it.

The representatives of Baijnath, who had died, preferred this appeal. Mr. C. H. Hill and Pandit Sunder Lal, for the appellants.

Mr. Dwarka Nath Banerji and Babu Jogindra Nath Chaudhri, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—In this action the plaintiff claims a declaration that the property alleged by Musammat Phundo to be her own property is liable to attachment and sale under a decree obtained by the plaintiff in a previous action. In the previous action the plaintiff sued one Bhika Mal on a hypothecation bond, claiming, among other things, enforcement of lien by sale. Musammat Phundo was made a party to that action as a defendant because she [77] claimed the hypothecated property. The main issue in that action was whether the hypothecated property was Bhika Mal's. The decree in that action was against Bhika Mal personally and for sale of the property hypothecated. In that action a decree was given against Bhika Mal personally, and Musammat Phundo was interested simply and solely in respect of her claim to the hypothecated property, and she was made a defendant solely to prevent her disputing the plaintiff's right to sell the property. The hypothecated property was sold under the decree in that action, and thereupon the plaintiff proceeded to attach and sell the property involved in this action, alleging that the property was the property of Bhika Mal. The property in question formed no part of the hypothecated property affected by the first decree. Musammat Phundo objected in the execution department. Her objection was allowed, and the property was released from attachment. On that the present action was brought. The Court below dismissed the claim on the ground that s. 244, Civil Procedure Code, applied.

It is argued before us on behalf of the respondent that, as Musammat Phundo was a party to the previous suit, the question here was one which arose between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed, and related to the execution or satisfaction of the decree, within the meaning of s. 244, Civil Procedure Code. Now that decree, as I have said, affected Musammat Phundo or any interest of hers only so far as it negatived her alleged interest in the hypothecated property. In that action no claim was made against her personally or in a representative capacity. The only claim, so far as she was concerned, was what amounted to a claim for a declaration that she was not entitled to the hypothecated property.

I am consequently of opinion that so far as the decree was sought to be enforced against property other than the hypothecated property, Musammat Phundo was a stranger to the action, and her objection is to be looked at as having been decided under ss. 278 and 280, Civil Procedure Code. The present action was therefore rightly brought under s. 283, Civil Procedure Code.

[78] I think the decision in Kameshwar Pershad v. Run Bahadur Singh (1) is based on a correct view of the law and supports the view which I take. The case cited by the respondent, Mulmantri v. Ashfaq Ahmad (2), and the case of Nimba Harishet v. Sitaram Paraji (3) are clearly distinguishable.

The appeal will be allowed, and the case will come on at a latter date. All the records of which Mr. Chaudhri and Pandit Sunder Lal will give lists to the office will be sent for.

TYRRELL, J.—I concur with the view expressed by the learned Chief Justice. It appears to me that the Court below has taken an erroneous view of the import of the plaintiff's pleadings in the former case. It is true that in that case the plaintiff said, "As the defendant No. 2 now declares herself proprietor of the whole property, she has also been impleaded, although she has no right to the property, and defendant No. 1 is the owner of the property and of the share of Dwarka Das, because he was his own brother, and was also adopted by him, and he is a proprietor by right of inheritance." These words, no doubt, seem to refer to the whole of the property of the firm of Dwarka Das Bhika Mal, but it is obvious, on a closer inquiry, that the plaintiff's meaning was that Musammat Phundo's pretensions were such as to raise a question of right on her part in hypothecated property which was the sole subject of that suit, and therefore that she was interested in the issue to be raised in respect of that hypothecated property and it only.

When the appeal came on again for hearing, the Court (EDGE, C. J., and TYRRELL, J.) remanded the case for re-trial.

[79] APPELLATE CRIMINAL.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. GANGA CHARAN. [23rd November, 1888.]

Accomplice—Tender of pardon, effect of—Subsequent trial of accomplice for connected offences—Criminal Procedure Code, ss. 337, 339.

A prisoner charged before a Magistrate at Benares with offences punishable under ss. 471, 472 and 474 of the Penal Code, made a confession to the Magistrate in respect of those offences. He was then sent in custody to Calcutta, and was there, together with other persons, charged before a Magistrate with offences punishable under ss. 467, 473 and 475. The conduct to which these charges related was closely connected and mixed up with that to which the charges first-mentioned had reference. Under s. 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the Magistrate at Calcutta tendered a pardon to the prisoner upon the conditions specified in that section, and the prisoner accepted the pardon, and gave evidence for the prosecution. The Magistrate held that this evidence was not sufficiently corroborated, and accordingly discharged all the accused, but the pardon was not withdrawn, and there was nothing to show that the Magistrate was dissatisfied with the prisoner's statements or considered that he had not complied with the conditions on which the pardon was tendered. Subsequently the prisoner was committed by the Magistrate of Benares for trial before the Court of Sessions upon the charges under ss. 471, 472 and 474 of the Penal Code. He pleaded not guilty, but did not in terms plead the pardon as a bar to the trial, though he made some reference to the subject; and the Sessions Judge having made a brief inquiry as to the proceedings at Calcutta, came to the conclusion that there was no sufficient proof of any conditional pardon, and convicted and sentenced the accused.

Held that by the terms of the conditional pardon granted to the accused by the Calcutta Magistrate, the conditions of which were satisfied as was shown by its never having been withdrawn, the accused was protected from trial at Benares in respect of the offences under ss. 471, 472 and 474, and was not liable to be proceeded against in respect of them, and that the trial and conviction were therefore illegal.

Although s. 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code does not in terms cover a case where a Magistrate holding a preliminary inquiry for committal against several persons, tenders a conditional pardon to one of them, examines him as a witness, and subsequently discharges all the accused for want of a prima facie case against them, the words "every person accepting a tender under this section shall be examined as a witness in the case" mean that for all purposes (subject to failure to satisfy the conditions of the pardon as provided for by s. 339) such a person ceases to be triable for the offence or offences under inquiry or (with reference to s. 339) for "any other offence of which he appears to have been guilty in connection with the same matter," [80] while making "a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to the offences" directly under inquiry. The words last quoted refer to the importance, when a pardon is tendered, of encouraging the approver to give the fullest details, so that points may be found in his evidence which may be capable of corroboration. The question of how far the pardon protects him, and what portion of it should not protect him, ought not to be treated in a narrow spirit.

The facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Straight, J.

Mr. Dwarka Nath Banerji and Babu Jogindhro Nath Chaudhri for the appellant.

The Public Prosecutor (Mr. G. E. A. Ross) for the crown.

JUDGMENT.

STRAIGHT, J.—The facts material to the determination of the main question raised by this appeal are as follows :—On the night of the 29th January last the appellant was arrested at Benares for uttering some forged five-rupee currency notes to a tradesman in the chauk at Benares, and immediately after, the house at which he was stopping in Bengali Tolah in that city was searched, and two tin boxes were found, in one of which were seven hundred unnumbered counterfeit currency notes of Rs. 5 each, and one separate numbered note for a like amount, as also six dies marked with numbers for stamping. On the same day the appellant was taken before Mr. Adams, the District Magistrate, to whom he made the following statement:—“ These notes (Rs. 5—R. 74-80909, March, 1884, and the others without numbers), were found in my possession in my box, which was in my house, which I rented in Bengali Tolah. This note for Rs. 5 (M. R. 74-80915) was given by me last night to a Bazaz in the Dalka Mandavi. These three notes (80302, 80926, 80929) were given by me to Fazlu, shopkeeper of Char Mihman, yesterday night in payment for a time-piece, a pair of socks, a bottle of scent, and two pocket-knives. I got Rs. 2 or Rs. 2-8 (I forget which) cash in change. The six types produced were found with the notes in the box in my house. I and others made the plates for these notes and printed them. I engraved the plates, being a seal engraver by trade. I made the several plates at my home in [81] Andul. The notes were printed by Mahandar Nath Bhattacharji of Andul. They were printed in his house by him and by his son Suresh Chandar, and Kali Kumar Pal, and myself. Suresh Chandar and his Bahnoi, also named Suresh Chandar, got the Press from Calcutta from Tantania, Cornwallis Street, Calcutta. They paid Rs. 125 I think for it. Suresh Chandar, son of Mahandar Nath, and I bought the copper plates in Calcutta in the Bara Bazaar. Mahandar Nath paid me Rs. 20 a month to do the work with the condition that he and I were each to have half the notes made. Kali Kumar Pal gave some money to Mahandar Nath for the expenses of the Press. We printed 1,300 or 1,400 notes for Rs. 5 each. Mahandar Nath's son-in-law, Suresh Chandar, without letting us know, passed some of the notes in Andul; passed some twenty or thirty or so, and the matter was blown upon and the police came from Howrah or Calcutta. Then Mahandar Nath said we would print no more there but would do so in Calcutta. He took possession of the notes and the plates, and would give me nothing. I said I would inform if he gave me nothing. Then he gave me a thousand notes, or it may have been less. He gave me notes without number like these produced. I made the types produced myself, they are not good ones. The good ones were kept by Mahandar Nath. It is a year since we began this work. I have not made any others. I and Suresh Chandar (son of Mahandar Nath) bought the paper at a shop in China Bazaar, which I can point out. I heard that two men were convicted in the High Court at Calcutta of forging ten rupee notes, and sentenced to ten or twelve years' imprisonment. We made five-rupee notes because Mahandar Nath said it was easy to pass them. He gave me the notes last Katik, and I left Andul only last Wednesday.

I was afraid to pass them before. I did not pass any of the notes except at Benares. I have passed some twenty or thirty of the notes since I arrived here on Friday. I did not go to Magh Mela at Allahabad. This note produced (R. 74-80505) sent from Allahabad by the police, looks like one of our printing, but I cannot say for certain. Mahandar Nath Bhattacharji is of fairish complexion (wheat colour), about forty [82] or forty-five years of age, of average height and middling figure, with moustache but not a beard. Suresh Chandar, his son, is above twenty or twenty-two years of age, of the same complexion, about my height, five feet five inches or five feet six inches, middling figure, wears a small beard, but he may have shaved it. Suresh Chander, his son-in-law, is fair (gore rung), age about twenty-nine or thirty, without a beard, and of average height and thin figure, wears a moustache. Kali Kumar Pal is of the complexion of Mahandar Nath, age about forty years, shorter than I am, middling figure, with a moustache only. When I left Andul I had not seen Mahandar Nath and the others for about ten or twelve days. The engraving tools were thrown into the Ganges. The engraving of the plates was delayed by my illness, which made Mahandar Nath angry. The silver anklets produced are mine. I bought them in Benares in the Chauk yesterday or the day before. I paid for them with some of my notes and Rs. 25 cash. The cash produced Rs. 74-12, I brought part from Calcutta and part is change received here for notes. I learnt the trade of seal engraving ten or twelve years ago, but never before forged notes. Mahandar Nath's son, Suresh Chandar, came to me and said:—"You are poor, if you do this we shall all get rich."

This confession was certified according to law by Mr. Adams, and on the same date he passed the following order:—"The accused, Ganga Charan Chatterji, is charged with an offence under ss. 465, 467 and 468, Indian Penal Code, and also 417, Indian Penal Code. He is also liable under s. 472, Indian Penal Code. Information will be given to the Calcutta Police, but in the meantime he may be put on his trial here for cheating, s. 417, Indian Penal Code. Case made over to Mr. McLean, Joint Magistrate." Information was, as directed, sent to the Calcutta Police, and on the 3rd of February, Mahandar Nath Bhattacharji and Surendro Nath Bhattacharji, and on a subsequent date, Suresh Chandar Mukerji and Kali Kumar Pal, were arrested by them. On the 12th of February, the appellant was sent to Calcutta in charge of the Police Sub-Inspector, arriving there on the 13th. On the 17th of February, the four persons I have mentioned above, along with the [83] appellant, were brought before a Calcutta Magistrate upon charges under ss. 467, 473 and 475, Indian Penal Code, and upon the same date the Inspector of Police conducting the prosecution filed the following application:—

"To the Magistrate of Howrah—Empress versus Mahandar Nath Bhattacharji and others; charge under ss. 467, 473 and 475, Indian Penal Code. As there is no sufficient evidence obtained in the case to warrant the conviction of the four accused persons named, I, under instructions on behalf of Government, pray that accused Ganga Charan Chatterji be offered a pardon and made Queen's evidence, I have, &c., Signed Ram Krishto Rai, Inspector of Police." Thereupon the Magistrate made the following order:—"Whereas it has been brought to my notice that in this case there is no sufficient evidence to proceed with the case of Empress versus Mahandar Nath Bhattacharji, Surendra Nath Bhattacharji, Suresh Chandra Mukerji, and Kali Kumar Pal, under ss. 467, 473 and 475, unless the evidence of Ganga Charan Chatterji, an accused in dock, is recorded. As the offences under all these sections are triable exclusively by the Court of Session, I direct, under the power vested in me by s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code, a pardon to the said Ganga Charan Chatterji, on condition of his making a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to the offences committed under ss. 467, 473 and 475, Indian Penal Code, and to every other person concerned, whether as principal or abettor in the commission thereof. Signed C. N. Banerji, First-Class Magistrate.—The 17th February, 1888.

“Read and explained to Ganga Charan Chatterji, who accepts the pardon on the condition stated in the above order. It has been further explained to him that, unless he makes a full and true disclosure, the pardon is liable to be withdrawn and will be withdrawn.”

This was also signed by the Magistrate and by the appellant. Upon the same day the appellant, having been removed from the dock, was placed in the witness-box as a witness for the prosecution, and he made a long and detailed deposition, fully disclosing the parts he and the four accused had played in purchasing the implements and materials with which to forge the notes; in forging them and in disposing of them, and in the latter connection he said:—“A portion of these forged notes I took to Benares, but they were without numbers. I put on the numbers on those notes at Benares the very night I reached there. I put the numbers with my own hands. I passed four notes the day following, buying a silver necklet. This was in part payment. After passing sixteen notes I was arrested through the instrumentality of a shopkeeper where I had gone to purchase four gold mohurs. I did the engraving during the day. The notes would be printed at times in the day and at dead of night, and at times about 2 A. M. The notes were given by Mahandar Nath accused. I had threatened to disclose the matter if I were not paid my share for labour.” There is nothing whatever to show that the Magistrate was dissatisfied with the statements made by the appellant, or considered that he had not complied “with the conditions on which the tender was made;” on the contrary I must take it, in the absence of any withdrawal of the pardon, that it remained, and remains, in full force and effect for what it is worth. On the 9th March the Calcutta Magistrate, holding there was no sufficient corroboration of the evidence given by the appellant, discharged the four accused before him. Meanwhile proceedings had been carried on, commencing on the 21st February, against the appellant in the Court of the Joint Magistrate at Benares for offences under s. 420, 474, 472 and 471, Indian Penal Code, and on the 10th March he was committed to take his trial before the Court of Session. He was then put on his trial on the 4th April and pleaded not guilty, being defended by a pleader, and in passing it must be noted that at the outset of the proceedings no plea in bar of the trial was raised on the ground of the pardon given by the Calcutta Magistrate. At the close of the evidence for the prosecution, however, the appellant did say: “I was examined at Howrah. There was a Bengali Magistrate. He read over something from a paper. He said as a witness for the Queen. I don’t remember any more.”

[85] “Q.—Did the Magistrate make any promise to you?

“A.—The police said they would get me off. The Magistrate did not.”

The learned Judge then recalled the Police Sub-Inspector, Ganesh Prasad, and he stated: “I took the prisoner to Howrah. He was produced before the Deputy Magistrate there and I heard that he was given the oath, and that his deposition was taken. I was not in the Court when his examination was begun, but was towards its close. The Magistrate, when his examination was closed, simply told me to take him away. I first took him before the Superintendent of Police of Howrah. The Superintendent took him before the Deputy Magistrate. The case was not finished. I took the prisoner away from Howrah and I do not know what has been the result." Upon this matter the learned Judge remarks: "From what was mentioned orally in Court I thought it better to make a brief enquiry as to what happened when the prisoner was taken in police charge to Howrah. I see no sufficient reason for holding or reasonably suspecting that he was given a conditional pardon there." In the result the appellant was convicted under ss. 474, 472 and 471 Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment under s. 474; one year under s. 472, and five years under s. 471.

He now appeals to this Court, and the main, and indeed the only, ground seriously urged on his behalf is that "as he had previously received a full and complete pardon as an approver, the present trial and the sentence passed are illegal." When the case came before me on the 4th of August, I directed the Registrar to apply to the Calcutta High Court to sanction the record of the Howrah Magistrate being sent to this Court, and such sanction was at once granted, and I have had an opportunity of perusing the whole of his proceedings. It is true that the charges on which the appellant with the four accused was brought before the Magistrate were for forgery of valuable securities under s. 467; under s. 473 for making, counterfeiting, and having in possession plates and instruments intending to use the same for purposes of a for-[86] gery which would be punishable under s. 467, and for counterfeiting a device or mark within the meaning of s. 475; and that that there were no charges preferred under ss. 474, 472, 471 and 420 for which offences the appellant was subsequently tried at Benares. It is equally true that the evidence on which the appellant was convicted related to distinct individual possession by him of implements of forgery and of forged notes with knowledge and intent, and of specific utterings with knowledge and intent, at Benares. But it is impossible not to say that his conduct there was more or less mixed up and concerned with the conspiracy at Calcutta of which he made disclosure as a witness, and the passage from his evidence I have already quoted, as to what he had done at Benares, was a material portion of a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to the offences then under enquiry. Though approvers may be infamous persons, they are nevertheless entitled to have faith kept with them by the Courts, and in dealing with the question as to what a pardon is to cover, and how far it is to extend, I should not be inclined to apply too technical tests, and should rather look to substance than mere matters of form. I have no hesitation whatever in holding that the pardon granted by the Calcutta Magistrate on the 17th February to the appellant, on condition of his making "a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to the offences under ss. 467, 473 and 475, Indian Penal Code," was accepted by the appellant on such condition as his signature at its foot shows, that he subsequently gave his evidence in consequence of such pardon, and that whatever its force of operation may be it has never been withdrawn. Looking to the special facts of this case, it does not appear to me that the circumstance that the appellant had made a complaint to

Mr. Adams on the 29th January, or that the pardon was tendered him by another Court in another Province with a different territorial jurisdiction, should affect the decision of the point before me. As to this latter matter, I think the case must be looked at in exactly the same light as it would have had to be regarded had the appellant and the four other persons been before the Joint Magistrate at [87] Benares charged with offences within his jurisdiction under ss. 467, 473 and 475, and there being a charge against the appellant alone of uttering under s. 471. Could it be seriously pretended for a moment that if the Joint Magistrate of Benares had tendered a pardon in the same terms as those contained in the Calcutta Magistrate's order of the 17th February, and the appellant had given the same evidence before him as he did at Calcutta, such pardon would not have protected him? I hold that it would, and I am fortified in this view by what appears in s. 339, Criminal Procedure Code, as to the consequences that follow on a non-compliance by an approver with the conditions of his pardon and its withdrawal. He may be tried for the offence in respect of which the pardon was tendered, or for any other offence of which he appears to have been guilty in connection with the same matter. So that while on the one hand the condition is "a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to such offence", on the other a non-compliance with it leaves him open to trial for the offence in respect of which the pardon was tendered, or any other offence in connection with the same matter. It must be borne in mind that in countenancing these pardons to accomplices the law does not invite a cramped and constrained statement by the approver, on the contrary it requires a thorough and complete disclosure of all the facts within his knowledge bearing upon the offence, or offences, as to which he gives evidence, and when he has given his evidence, I do not think that the question of how far it is to protect him, and what portion of it should not protect him, ought to be treated in a narrow spirit. In a note by Mr. Greaves to the 4th edition of Russell on Crimes, vol. III, p. 597, it is said: "If however, the prisoner, having been admitted as an accomplice to one felony, be thereby induced to suppose that he has freed himself from the consequences of another felony, the Judge will recommend the indictment for such other felony to be abandoned. Where an accomplice made a disclosure of property which was the subject-matter of a different robbery by the same parties, under the impression that by the information he had given previously as to the robbery of other property he had delivered himself from the consequences of having the property he so disclosed in his possession, Coleridge, J., recommended the counsel for the prosecution not to proceed against the accomplice for feloniously receiving such property." Garside's case, 2 Lew, 18. I quote this passage as illustrative only of the principles upon which a learned Judge has acted in such a matter in England. The first question which it appears to me I have to ask myself is, looking to the offences under inquiry before the Calcutta Magistrate, should the pardon granted to the appellant be held to extend beyond these special offences, and to exempt him from punishment for the offences charged against him at Benares? I have read the evidence given by the appellant at Calcutta, and as the Magistrate nowhere upon this record indicates that he withdrew the pardon, I think I am bound to assume, as I have already said, that he believed the appellant had made a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to the offences under inquiry, and so satisfied the conditions of the tender. It was suggested by the learned Public Prosecutor that the fact that the appellant had already made a confession to the Magistrate of Benares destroys the effect of his subsequent evidence at Calcutta. I do not think so, any more than I should have thought so had he simply made his statement to a police officer and the information contained therein had been forwarded to Calcutta and had led, as his confession to the Magistrate did, to the arrest of the persons implicated and to his being examined as a witness. Upon what appears to me a reasonable construction of the terms of the pardon tendered by the Calcutta Magistrate, I think that, looking to the particular facts of this particular case, and in no way laying down any rule to govern other cases, it ought to protect the appellant from punishment for the offences under ss. 471, 472 and 474. It is obvious to my mind that almost from the moment of his arrest it was contemplated by the police, and most properly, to make him the instrument of bringing the other conspirators to justice. The application of the Calcutta Inspector of the 17th February shows this, and I have no doubt that when the appellant gave his evidence at Calcutta as to his own proceedings at Benares, he did so in the belief that as to his whole con- [89] nection with the conspiracy he would be exempted. Then arises the question as to in what way the pardon granted by the Calcutta Magistrate should have been given effect to, so far as the trial in the Benares Sessions Court was concerned. Could it be pleaded as a legal plea in bar like "auterfois convict" or "auterfois acquit"? I confess I am placed in somewhat of a difficulty to answer that question from the absence from the Criminal Procedure Code of any specific directions on the subject. Primarily the power of pardon rests in the Sovereign, and the provisions of s. 417, Criminal Procedure Code, authorising the Governor-General in Council or a local Government to suspend the execution, or remit the whole or part of any sentence passed upon any person sentenced to punishment, in no way interfere with the prerogative of the Crown in that respect. The special authority therein conferred, however, relates to persons sentenced to punishment and does not touch cases under s. 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code, in which a person charged along with others with a crime has, under a conditionally tendered pardon, given evidence against such persons and satisfied the conditions precedent upon which it was tendered. I must, therefore, look to that section, and, as far as it throws light on the matter, to s. 339, to see what effect a pardon so tendered is to have. Taking s. 337, it is clear that it does not in terms cover a case in which a Magistrate holding a preliminary inquiry for committal against several persons, tenders a conditional pardon to one of them, examines him as a witness, and subsequently discharges all the accused for want of a prima facie case to justify committal. But it appears to me that the words "every person accepting a tender under this section shall be examined as a witness in the case," mean that for all purposes, subject of course to his failure to satisfy the conditions of his pardon as provided for by s. 339, he ceases to be triable for the offence or offences under inquiry, or, looking again to s. 339, for "any other offence of which he appears to have been guilty in connection with the same matter while making a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to the offences," directly under inquiry. It is clear to my mind, therefore, [90] fore, that, at least, as to the charges under ss. 467, 473 and 475, Indian Penal Code, upon which the appellant was brought up with the other four persons before the Calcutta Magistrate, he ceased to be an accused.

and became a witness, and that such pardon never having been withdrawn, it could have been pleaded in bar to further proceedings against him had they been subsequently instituted under those sections before the Calcutta Magistrate. It remains then to see whether the pardon stood good for the same purposes as to the offences under ss. 474, 472 and 471, that is to say, (1) for being in possession of the forged notes, knowing them to be forged, and with intent that they should be used as genuine; (2) being in possession of instruments of forging notes with intention to use them, punishable under s. 467, only a more aggravated form of the offence with which he was charged at Calcutta under s. 473; and (3) uttering forged notes to the various persons at Benares. I have already said that in dealing with this point the terms of the pardon must be looked at in connection with the special facts of the particular case. The condition precedent imposed by the Calcutta Magistrate and accepted by the appellant was that he should make "a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to the offences under ss. 467, 473 and 475;" in other words, that he should make a clean breast of his whole connection with the conspiracy to forge currency notes, in which he alleged the other four persons to have been concerned with him. I need not point out the importance, when a pardon is tendered, of encouraging the approver to give the fullest details, so that points may be found in his evidence, which may be capable of corroboration, and this is what I understand the Criminal Procedure Code to mean, when it speaks of a "full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge." It is true that the appellant did not in terms plead this pardon in the Court of Sessions as a bar to his trial there, but contented himself with a plea of not guilty to the charges, though he did say something about it towards the end of the proceedings. The case, however, is before me in appeal, and I think, seeing that there are no specific directions in the Code of Criminal Procedure as to how such matters are to be [91] pleaded and what are to be the consequences of not specifically pleading them, that if I hold the appellant protected by the pardon given him, I ought to give him the benefit of it, as no doubt the learned Judge would have done had he had the materials before him that I have, just as much as if I were now satisfied that the appellant had been formerly acquitted or convicted of the offences of which he has now been convicted, I should feel bound to give effect to such a plea in appeal. To sum up the matter, having before me the additional evidence contained in the Calcutta record, I am of opinion that, by the terms of the conditional pardon granted to the appellant, on the 17th February, the conditions of which were satisfied by him, as is shown by its never having been withdrawn, he was protected from trial at Benares in respect of the offences under ss. 474, 472 and 471 of the Penal Code, and was not liable to be proceeded against in respect of them. I therefore hold such trial to have been illegal, and accordingly I reverse the findings and sentences of the learned Judge, and quashing all the proceedings of the Sessions Court, discharge the appellant and direct that he be released.

Dismissal of suit for insufficient court-fee on plaint—Decree—Appeal—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 2, 54, 158—Act VII of 1870 (Court Fees Act,) s. 12.

The Court of first instance being of opinion that the plaint bore an insufficient court-fee, and the plaintiff not making good the deficiency, dismissed the suit after recording evidence, but without entering into the merits. On appeal the lower appellate Court held that the court-fee was sufficient, and remanded the case for trial on the merits.

Held that s. 158 of the Civil Procedure Code was not applicable to the case; that the first Court's disposal of the suit must be treated as being under s. 54, and was therefore a decree within the meaning of s. 2, and appealable as such, and that such [92] appeal was not prohibited by s. 12 of the Court Fees Act.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., STRAIGHT and TYRRELL, J.J.—This was a suit for redemption of mortgage. The mortgagor had assigned. The mortgagee and the assignee were the defendants. The Munsif decided that the fee payable on the plaint was insufficient, being of opinion that the relief sought by the plaintiff must include a further relief against the assignee by a declaration that the assignment was bad. The Munsif consequently held that the relief sought in the plaint was under-valued. He dismissed the suit without entering into the merits, on the ground that the plaintiff did not then and there make good the fee which he, the Munsif, had determined to be payable. The plaintiff appealed, and on appeal the Subordinate Judge, holding that the fee paid by the plaintiff was more than sufficient and that no cancelment of the deed of assignment was sought, allowed the appeal and remanded the case for trial on the merits.
From that order this appeal has been brought. If the relief sought was, in fact, under-valued, it was the duty of the Munsif to reject the plaint.
He, in fact, recorded evidence, and having recorded evidence he dismissed the suit without expressing any opinion on that evidence. It is obvious that if he was right as to the fee, the only proceeding open to him was to reject the plaint under s. 54 of the Code of Civil Procedure on failure of the plaintiff within a reasonable time to make good the deficiency.
We are not prepared to hold that s. 158 was applicable to a case of this kind, when there is a plain direction in s. 54 as to the course a Court must adopt. We must regard the Munsif's disposal of the suit as being under s. 54. If that be a correct view, his order rejecting the plaint

[93] was a decree under s. 2 of the Code. An order rejecting a plaint is in terms included in the definition in s. 2, and being a decree was appealable when there is no statutory prohibition to the contrary. The next question is, is there such statutory prohibition? On behalf of the appellants, s. 12 of the Court-fees Act is said to be a direct prohibition against an appeal in this matter. If that argument is to be accepted there would be no appeal when a Judge of first instance wrongly decided that a suit was under-valued, and on that decision rejected the plaint. In our opinion the intention of the framers of the Code of Civil Procedure was that there should be an appeal in every case falling within s. 54; otherwise we should have found in the definition of decrees in s. 2, words limiting those orders under s. 54 which might for the purpose of the Code be considered decrees. A similar view was taken in the case of Ajoodhya Pershad v. Gunga Pershad (1). We are of opinion that the decree of the Munsif should be regarded as passed in rejection of the plaint and was appealable. Several cases have been referred to. In Annamalai Chetty v. Cloete (2) the learned Judges endeavoured to reconcile s. 54 of the Code of Civil Procedure with s. 12 of the Court-fees Act. We do not think it necessary to consider whether those sections can or cannot be reconciled, as we are of opinion that an appeal lies under the Code of Civil Procedure of 1882. If we had to consider whether those sections could be reconciled or not on the lines on which those Judges proceeded, we should have a great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that a Court could determine the amount without deciding the question as to the relief sought, and yet that the relief sought was not a question relating to the valuation for the determination of the fee chargeable. The Subordinate Judge may have been wrong in remanding the case under s. 562, as the evidence had been recorded. The Subordinate Judge ought to have treated the decree of the Munsif as an order rejecting the plaint. The Munsif should have been told to accept the plaint as properly stamped and to proceed to dispose of the case on the merits. To that extent we allow the appeal and direct the Munsif to restore the suit to its place in the list of pending cases on the basis of its being [94] a suit in which a proper court-fee has been paid, and dispose of it according to law. Costs here and hitherto to abide the result.

JUDGMENTS.

EDGE, C. J.—In this case the respondent in the appeal before us obtained a money-decree against the appellant. The decree was transferred to the Collector for execution under the rules framed by the local Government under s. 320 of the Code of Civil Procedure. After the sale by the Collector, the judgment-debtor (appellant) applied to the Munsif to set aside the sale, on the ground of there having been irregularity in the conduct of the sale. The Munsif dismissed the application on the ground that he had no jurisdiction. [95] I assume for the purposes of this judgment, but not otherwise, that the irregularity complained of was an irregularity within the meaning of s. 311 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The judgment-debtor from the order of the Munsif brought this appeal. I have not the slightest doubt that the case is governed by the decision of the Full Bench of this Court in Madho Prasad v. Hansa Kuar (1). The case has come up from the Division Bench to the Full Bench, it having been contended that the judgment delivered by me and concurred in by Mr. Justice Oldfield in Nathu Mal v. Lachmi Narain (2) decided in contravention of the decision of the Full Bench that an application of this kind lay to the Civil Court. The case of Nathu Mal v. Lachmi Narain (2) was a case in which the Collector in executing a decree transferred to him, had sold the property, and the purchaser had come to the Civil Court to set aside the sale under s. 313, on the ground that there was no saleable interest of the judgment-debtor in the property sold. In that case, for the reasons which I therein gave, I came to the conclusion that the application was properly made in the Civil Court and was entertainable by the Civil Court. I do not see that that decision, in any way, contravenes the judgment of the Full Bench to which I have referred. In the Full Bench case the question before the Court was whether an application to set aside a sale on the ground of irregularity, when the sale had been conducted by the Collector, would, under ss. 311 and 312, lie to the Civil Court or would lie to the Collector. When I say so, I thoroughly agree with the view of the Full Bench that the object of transferring the execution of that class of decrees which fall within s. 320 of the Code to the Collector is to give him, speaking generally, a free hand to deal with the property in the best interests of the parties concerned. In the Full Bench case the point in Nathu Mal v. Lachmi Narain (2) was not before the

(1) 5 A. 314.

Court, and the question did not arise in the case that there might be a distinction between the power of the Collector in the carrying out of a decree transferred to him subject to the limits imposed upon him by the Code itself, and a power to decide upon a question of title or a question as to whether the decree should be executed at all. As I [96] take it, the Collector, when a decree is transferred to him, is bound to carry out the decree subject to the discretion given to him by s. 321 and the following sections and subject to the provisions contained in ss. 322B, 322C and 322D. But I find in those sections no power given to the Collector and nothing which would suggest the giving of a power to the Collector to decide that the property which was directed by the decree to be sold was not the property of the judgment-debtor mentioned in the decree. When such a question arises before a sale, s. 322B shows that it is for the Civil Court and not for the Collector to decide it. The Civil Court under s. 313, which passed its own decree, it appears to me, would be the tribunal to say what shall take place when property directed by it to be sold has been sold, and it subsequently appears that it was not the property of the judgment-debtor. If the Collector exercised the powers undoubtedly given to the Civil Court under s. 313 in cases of sales conducted by the Civil Court, the Collector would, if he set the sale aside, on the ground that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property which he was directed to sell, have, in fact, declined to carry out the decree of the Civil Court and would have decided on a question of title which, if it had arisen before the sale, he was bound to refer to the Civil Court. Then what is he to do? If he set aside the sale on the ground that the judgment-debtor had no interest in the property which was directed by the decree of the Civil Court to be sold, is the Collector to re-sell the property to some one else when no better title can be made, or is he to decline to give any effect to the decree? In the latter event he would be absolutely interfering with the decree of the Civil Court. Now the sections of the Civil Procedure Code from 321 onwards undoubtedly give the Collector, subject to ss. 322B, 322C and 322D, a discretion as to what he may do where a decree is transferred to him for execution, but there is nothing in those sections to suggest that the Collector need do nothing to give effect to the decree. So far as I am aware, there have been no regulations framed by the local Government which would give the Collector power to set aside a sale on the ground that there was no title. I do not think that what was the intention of the Legislature when a statute was passed can be [97] gathered from subsequent legislation, unless by the subsequent legislation that intention is specifically declared. Nevertheless I may observe that s. 30 of the Civil Procedure Code Amendment Act (VII of 1888), although it authorises expressly rules to be made under s. 320 giving the Collector power to exercise the powers of a Civil Court under s. 312, makes no suggestion that any rules may be framed giving him power to decide questions arising under s. 313, namely, to decide whether the judgment-debtor had or had not title in the property sold. It appears to me that the two classes of cases are totally distinct; that it was not the intention of the Legislature to allow any delegation to the Collector of a power to adjudicate upon title; but that it was the intention of the Legislature in other matters to hand over all the proceedings, to the Collector and to withdraw those matters so handed over from the purview of the Civil Court to that extent, but not questions of title or the other questions, if in dispute, referred to in ss. 322B, 322C, 322D, if they arose. I have expressed these opinions, because I wish to be understood that I do not question in any way and did not intend, in the case of Nathu Mal v. Lachmi Narain (1), to question the authority or propriety of the decision of the Full Bench in the case of Madho Prasad v. Hansa Kuar (2). Agreeing as I do with the decision of the Full Bench in that case, I must still say that in my opinion the two cases are totally dissimilar and different principles must be applied to them. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Full Bench governs this case, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

STRAIGHT, J.—This is an appeal from an order of the Munsif, dated the 23rd July, 1887, by which order he rejected an application made to him by a judgment-debtor to set aside a sale which had been held by a Collector in execution of a Civil Court decree transferred to him under the provisions of s. 320 of the Civil Procedure Code. The ground upon which avoidance of the sale was sought was that there had been an irregularity of the kind mentioned in s. 311 of the Civil Procedure Code. The Munsif held that the decree in execution of which the sale had taken place having been [98] transferred by him under s. 320, he had no jurisdiction to entertain the application. It is this decision of his which was the subject-matter of the appeal before my brothers Brodhurst and Mahmood, which by their order has been referred to the Full Bench for disposal. The ground of the reference mainly was that according to the opinion of those two learned Judges it was difficult to reconcile the Full Bench ruling of this Court, which is to be found at page 314 of I. L. R., 5, All., and a decision of the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Oldfield which is to be found at page 43 of I. L. R., 9, All. The course that the discussion has taken and the suggestions that have been thrown out during the argument render it, in my opinion, unnecessary for us to consider whether the view expressed by the learned Chief Justice in the ruling referred to was a correct one or not, or in other words, whether the learned Chief Justice was correct in the view that he took with regard to s. 313 of the Civil Procedure Code. It is enough for the purposes of this case to say that we have not s. 313 before us; if we had, I am not at all prepared to say that there is not great force in the view expressed by the learned Chief Justice in the ruling referred to, and what has been said by him to-day, as to the distinction that is to be drawn between the exceptional class of cases falling under s. 313 and those more directly concerned with proceedings in direct execution of a decree. In passing I may, however, say that under the rules which have been framed by the local Government in accordance with the provisions of s. 320, dated the 20th November, 1880, there is no re-production of the provisions of s. 313, although in all other particulars they have re-produced, for the purpose of guiding the Collector in execution of decrees transferred to him, the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code. It is also noticeable that, in clause 12 of s. 17 of those rules, where reference is made to the setting aside of a sale, the Rules say that in the event of the sale being set aside, the Collector may order the refund of the "fee," and this seems to be all the Collector has power to refund. Under the Civil Procedure Code, however, upon the setting aside of a sale, the Civil Court has power to order the refund of the purchase-money if it has been paid. The omission in the Rules to which I have pointed is possibly due to the [99] circumstance that it is into the Civil Court that the proceeds realized by the sale are to be paid. However, it is not necessary for me to determine whether, in cases under

s. 313 of the Civil Procedure Code, I should follow the decision of the learned Chief Justice or should hold a different view. I think it right to say, having been a party to the Full Bench ruling in Madho Prasad v. Hansa Kuar (1), that what was intended to be laid down there and what was laid down is that where a decree has been transferred to a Collector for execution, his proceedings in execution were not to be governed by the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, but they were to be governed and were governed by the rules which were made in that behalf by the local Government; and that considering the objects of those rules and the procedure of the Collector under those rules, s. 244 of the Civil Procedure Code did not apply, and there was no such appeal as there would be from the ordinary decision of the Civil Court in executing decrees, under that section. This is what the Full Bench ruling laid down and that is all it laid down. I agree with the learned Chief Justice that it is a distinct authority for the proposition that when, in the execution of a decree transferred to a Collector for that purpose, an application has to be made to set aside a sale which the Collector has held, the application must be made to him and cannot be made to the Civil Court. This being so, I agree with the learned Chief Justice's order that the appeal must be and it is dismissed with costs.

MAHMOOD, J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, and being one of the Judges who referred the case to the Full Bench, all I need say is that the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Madho Prasad v. Hansa Kuar (1) governs this case, and that I accept the distinction which the learned Chief Justice has drawn between the Full Bench ruling and his Lordship's own ruling in Nathu Mal v. Lachmi Narain (2). The exact point raised and decided in that case does not arise in this case. It can scarcely be doubted, and I say this advisedly after having had to deal with the transfer of decrees to the Collector under the provisions of s. 320 and the following sections, that the state of the law, even as represented in the statute, [100] is full of complications and difficulties, and that any attempts that have been made to amend it have scarcely done enough to remove those doubts and difficulties. Instead of having proved a benefit to the judgment-debtor in whose interests those various sections were introduced in the Code of Civil Procedure, they have tended to increase litigation on the one hand, and to prevent the decree-holder from obtaining the fruits of his decree, on the other.

8 A.W.N.
(1888) 288.Act XXI of 1850—Suit by person born a Muhammadan as reversioner in a Hindu family.

Act XXI of 1850, does not apply only to a person who has himself or herself renounced his or her religion or been excluded from caste. The latter part of s. 1, protects any person from having any right of inheritance affected by reason of any person having renounced his religion or having been excluded from caste. This applies to a case where a person born a Muhammadan, his father having renounced the Hindu religion, claims by right of inheritance under the Hindu law a share in his father's family.

THIS was a suit brought by one Kallu Khan for possession of certain property which had been sold to the defendants by one Musammat Banno, since deceased. The grandfather of the plaintiff, Hari Singh, had three sons, Mohan Singh, Bacha Singh, and Mahipat Khan. Mahipat Khan, who was father of the plaintiff, was converted to Muhammadanism. The property in suit had belonged to Bacha Singh, second son of Hari Singh, and Banno, whose alienation of it was impugned, was Bacha Singh's widow. The plaintiff, who, as well as his father, was a Muhammadan, claimed the property by right of inheritance, under the Hindu law, to Bacha Singh. The [101] defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the plaintiff being a Muhammadan, was not entitled to claim by inheritance any property belonging to Hindu members of the family; and that Act XXI of 1850 was not applicable to the case, inasmuch as it protected only those persons who had actually changed their religion, and not the children of such persons.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Tilhar) decreed the claim.

On appeal by the defendants, the Subordinate Judge of Shahjahanpur affirmed the Munsif's decree. In the course of his judgment he said:—

"It is contended that Mahipat Khan died before Musammat Banno, widow of Bacha Singh, and consequently the provisions of Act XXI of 1850 do not apply to Mahipat Khan, inasmuch as the plaintiff has not changed his religion, but was born a Mussalman. The Court cannot, however, allow that contention. The provisions of Act XXI of 1850 clearly mean that nobody will be prejudiced in his right of inheritance by a change in his religion. It is not necessary that he himself should have been a convert; it is all the same whether he or his ancestor (father or grandfather) changed their religion.....The result is that inheritance follows descent without reference to religion. As the plaintiff is a descendant of Hari Singh and a relative of Bacha Singh, he cannot be prejudiced by belonging to a different religion, and has the same right as if he and his father were Hindus. Under the Hindu Law, the right of the plaintiff's father to inherit from his father or brother was not confined to himself only, but he could transmit it to his children at their birth. Under these circumstances, the children of Mahipat Khan acquired a right on their birth of which they cannot be deprived by a difference in religion. Now there is no male member in the family except Mahipat Khan's sons, and it is therefore clear that they alone can inherit the property as they would have done if there had been no difference of religion. If the transfer were not made by the widow, these persons alone would have inherited the property."

* Second Appeal No. 205 of 1887 from a decree of Maulvi Mirza Abid Ali Khan, Subordinate Judge of Shahjahanpur, dated the 10th November, 1886, confirming a decree of Maulvi Muhammad Abdul Ghafur, Munsif of Tilhar, dated the 2nd September, 1886.

The defendants appealed to the High Court, upon the ground that the lower Courts had "erred in their interpretation of Act [102] XXI of 1850," and that "the plaintiff, being a born Mussalman, cannot claim inheritance of a deceased Hindu."

EDGE, C. J.—A Hindu named Hari Singh, had three sons, Mohan Singh, Bacha Singh, and Mahipat Singh. Mahipat became a Muhammadan, and the plaintiff in this case is his son. Bacha died childless, leaving two widows surviving him, Kosila and Banno. Kosila and Banno were recorded proprietors of Bacha Singh's share. On the death of Kosila, Banno was recorded as sole proprietrix of the share. Banno sold the property in question to the defendant. Banno has died. The plaintiff claimed the property which was left by Bacha Singh by right of inheritance. The sole question we have to consider in this second appeal is whether the plaintiff, having been born a Muhammadan, can claim as a reversioner to the share of the Hindu family. This in my judgment depends on the construction of Act XXI of 1850. Mr. Bajpai for the purchaser, who is appellant here, very ably argued that that Act applies only to a person who has himself or herself renounced his or her religion or been excluded from caste, and that it does not apply to a case like this in which the person claiming by right of inheritance a share in a Hindu family is the son of the person who renounced his religion, and was born a Muhammadan. I was very much struck with the force of Mr. Bajpai's argument. It may be, no doubt inconvenient that a Muhammadan should be introduced into a Hindu family or a Hindu into a Muhammadan family, but this is a matter for which, if it is a grievance, we, who have merely to interpret the law, are not responsible. We can only interpret the law as we find it, without any consideration for the opinions of those persons whom the law may affect. Prior to the passing of Act XXI of 1850 there was in force in the Presidency of the Fort William, Bengal, a Regulation known as Regulation VII of 1832. Speaking broadly, s. 9 of that Regulation was passed to relieve Hindus or Muhammadans in that Presidency from any disability with regard to the rights of property under Hindu or Muhammadan law, which might have arisen by [103] reason of a Hindu or Muhammadan having changed his religion, or by reason of a Hindu being out of caste. Act XXI is a very short Act, and I propose to read the whole of it:—

"Whereas it is enacted by s. 9 of Regulation VII, 1832, of the Bengal Code, that whenever in any civil suit the parties to such suit may be of different persuasions, when one party shall be of the Hindu and the other of the Muhammadan persuasion, or where one or more of the parties to the suit shall not be either of the Muhammadan or Hindu persuasion; the laws of those religions shall not be permitted to operate to deprive such party or parties of any property to which, but for the operation of such laws, they would have been entitled, and whereas it will be beneficial to extend the principle of that enactment throughout the territories subject to the Government of the East India Company, it is enacted as follows:—

“So much of any law or usage now in force within the territories subject to the Government of the East India Company, as inflicts on any person forfeiture of rights or property, or may be held in any way to impair or affect any right of inheritance by reason of his or her renouncing, or having been excluded from the communion of any religion, or being deprived of caste, shall cease to be enforced as law in the Courts of the East India Company and in the Courts established by Royal Charter within the said territories.”

The first thing to be observed is that the Legislature in the preamble expresses the intention of the Act to be to extend the principle of s. 9 of Regulation VII of 1832 which was then in operation in the provinces subject to the Presidency of Fort William throughout the territories of the East India Company. That being so, one would expect that in the operative part of the Act the principle of s. 9 of Regulation VII of 1832 would not be cut down or curtailed. We have got to see whether Mr. Bajpai's argument is correct that the Act, did, in fact, cut down and curtail the principle of s. 9. His argument was that notwithstanding the intention of the Legislature shown in the preamble, the relief extended to the rest of the Company's provinces was by the operative [104] part of the Act limited by the wording of that part to the actual person who might change his religion or be excluded from caste. No one can read s. 9 of Regulation VII without seeing that if Mr. Bajpai's argument is correct the operative portion of the Act instead of extending the principle to the rest of the Company's provinces, would have limited the relief it was intended to extend. As I read the operative portion of the Act, it relates to different classes of persons. In the earlier portion it protects any person from forfeiture of right of property by reason of his or her renouncing their religion or being excluded from caste. In the case before us those words would have protected the father of the plaintiff, who was the person who renounced his religion, and they protected him from losing any right which he had. The latter portion of the section, in my opinion, protects any person from having any right of inheritance affected by reason of any person having renounced his religion or having been excluded from caste. If the latter part of the section was restricted to the protection of the right of inheritance of the persons renouncing their religion or being excluded from caste, their case was covered by the words of the early part of the section.

Reading the section as I do, and I think it is the natural reading of the section, I give effect to the intention of the Legislature in passing the Act, which we find expressed in the preamble, and to the principle of s. 9, of Regulation VII.

The effect of this construction of the Act is that the appeal is dismissed with costs.

STRAIGHT, J.—I concur.

A suit for defamation of his daughter cannot be maintained by a Hindu father suing in his own right and not as general attorney or on behalf of the daughter.

A [105] suit for defamation can only be brought by the person actually defamed, if the person is sui juris, and if not sui juris, then under the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, by his guardian or next friend. Dawan Singh v. Mahip Singh (1) and Parvathi v. Mannar (2) distinguished. Subbaiyar v.

THIS was a suit for damages for defamatory words spoken by one of the defendants in reference to the plaintiff's daughter; and the plaintiff also claimed damages for expenses incurred by him in connection with his daughter's gauna ceremony, in reliance upon an agreement between himself and the defendants, and which expenses he alleged had been thrown away in consequence of the defendant's conduct. One of the two defendants was son of the other, and he had been, some years prior to the institution of the suit, married to the plaintiff's daughter. A date was fixed for the celebration of the gauna ceremony, and the plaintiff made the necessary preparations for such celebration; but the defendants did not attend. Shortly afterwards the plaintiff went to the defendants to ask for an explanation, and the father then said that the plaintiff's daughter was a person of bad character, and he and his son would take no part in the gauna, and would not dine at the plaintiff's house. This statement was alleged to have been made in the presence of several caste-fellows of the plaintiff. The defence to the suit was, inter alia, that it could not be maintained by the plaintiff, or any one other than the person defamed.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Kanauj) dismissed the suit on this ground, referring to Oodai v. Bhawanee Pershad (5) and Subbaiyar v. Kristnaiyar (3).

On appeal by the plaintiff, the District Judge of Farakhabad reversed the first Court's decree and allowed the claim. The Judge observed:—

"I think that the appellant's third and fourth pleas must be admitted. There can be no doubt that the plaintiff suffered defamation of character from the words used by the defendants, and that he is entitled to compensation for it. The case quoted by the lower [106] Court does not apply for the position of the parties in the two cases is different. That was a case of a possibly not very closely allied relative suing on behalf of a female presumed to be capable of suing for herself; this is a case of a father suing for injury done to himself by words spoken against his daughter of tender age and under his protection. The rulings also quoted by the appellant's pleader from the reports of the Madras and Bombay High Courts are not applicable to the circumstances of the present case. The injury done to the daughter's reputation in the present instance is undoubtedly a personal injury to the plaintiff himself. In the second place, it does not affect the plaintiff's claim on account of pecuniary loss that no compact is proved to having been made for fixing the date of the gauna. It is sufficient that the plaintiff was authorized to presume that the ceremony would be performed at some approaching date, and that he made preparations in anticipation of such performance. The plaintiff's witnesses have given a list of items of expense which verify the plaintiff's estimate of Rs. 200 for cost of entertainment; and his pleader is willing to reduce his claim for damages on other grounds to an equal sum. I therefore reverse the judgment of the lower Court, and give the plaintiff-appellant a decree for Rs. 400 with all costs."

The defendant Daya appealed to the High Court on the ground, inter alia, that the plaintiff had shown no cause of action.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—The plaintiff brought this suit to recover damages for defamatory words spoken by the appellant in reference to the plaintiff's daughter. He also claimed as damages certain expenses being thrown away by reason of the appellants declining to allow his son to take the plaintiff's daughter to his house and refusing to take part in her gauna. The lower appellate Court has awarded Rs. 200 in respect of the defamatory words, and Rs. 200 in respect of the expenses claimed. The appellant did not plead that the words were true; he merely said he had only repeated what he heard. That does not amount to justification. It is contended on behalf [107] of the appellant that this suit should be dismissed. On behalf of the plaintiff-respondent it was contended that a Hindu father could in his own right and not suing as general attorney or on behalf of his daughter maintain an action for defamation of his daughter. For that purpose my brother Mahmood's judgment in the case of Dawan Singh v. Mahip Singh (1) and the case of Parvathi v. Mannar (2) were cited. The judgment of my brother Mahmood does not, in my opinion, support that contention. That judgment was directed to show that in India an action for defamatory words spoken could be maintained not by any person other than the defamed person, but by the person who was defamed, without the allegation or proof of special damages and under circumstances in which a similar action could not be maintained in England. I have mentioned to my brother Mahmood this contention as to his judgment, and he has told me that he did not intend to lay down a proposition that any person other than the person defamed could maintain the action for defamation. The case in I. L. R., 8, Mad., to which I have referred, was a suit brought by the person who was actually defamed: consequently it has no bearing on this particular point. In my opinion an action for defamation can only be brought by the person actually defamed if the person is sui juris, and if the person is not sui juris, then under the provision of the Code of Civil Procedure by the guardian or next friend. If any relative who suffered pain of mind by reason of defamatory language uttered as to another relative could maintain an action for defamation, the defamer might be liable to as many actions as there were members of the family of the person defamed. It was held by the Madras High Court in the case of Subbaiyar v. Kristnaiyar (1), that a brother could not maintain an action for the defamation of his sister. I think that is a right decision. It was held by the Bombay High Court in Luckumsy v. Hurbun Nursey (2), that the heir and the nearest relative of a deceased person could not maintain a suit for defamatory words spoken of such deceased person, although they were alleged to have caused damage to the plaintiff as a member of the same family. [108] Those two cases show, as I have always understood the law to be, that an action for damages is a purely personal action which can only be maintained by or on behalf of the person defamed. The same principle was applied, although not in an action for defamation, by this Court in Oodai v. Bhowanee Pershad (3). I am of opinion that so far as this suit is one to recover damages for the defamation of the defendant's daughter, it cannot be maintained. It is not necessary to consider whether the words are actionably defamatory, as we hold that the father has no cause of action in respect of them. So far, I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed. As to the part of the suit for expenses incurred by the father thrown away by reason of the acts of the defendants, I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. As I understand the finding of the District Judge, the expenses he has allowed have been reasonably incurred by the plaintiff in reliance on the agreement of the defendant-appellant that the gauna should be carried out. The appeal as to Rs. 200 for gauna will be dismissed with proportionate costs, and the appeal as to Rs. 200 awarded in respect of the alleged defamation will be decreed with proportionate costs.

(1) 10 A. 425.

(2) 8 M. 175.

TYRRELL, J.—I fully agree with the view expressed by the learned Chief Justice and in his order disposing of the appeal (4).

aware of the sale shortly after it took place, and many months prior to July, 1885. He did not allege that he had given notice that he claimed to exercise his right of pre-emption before July, 1885. It was found as a fact that no such notice was given.

Held that even if such notice was given, it was too late, and was not a prompt demand in accordance with the Muhammadan law.

The principle of the rule that a pre-emptor must claim the whole of the property included in the sale-transaction, and for which one price was paid, if he is entitled to claim it, and cannot obtain a decree for part only of such property, applies to the case of a pre-emptor who claims the whole, but who is at the time disentitled by his own act or laches to maintain the claim as to a part. Such a disqualification prevents the pre-emptor from maintaining his suit for any portion of the property included in the sale.

Where therefore a pre-emptor was disqualified from claiming a portion of the property sold, by not having made a prompt demand in accordance with the Muhammadan law in respect of such portion,—held that he was thereby prevented from maintaining his suit for another portion claimed under the provisions of the wajib-ul-arz of village, though he was willing to pay the full purchase-money and to leave in the vendee's hands the portion as to which he was disqualified.

THIS was a suit for pre-emption in respect of a sale, dated the 12th October, 1884, of a share in the village Muhra in the Moradabad district, and a piece of land in the city of Moradabad. The claim in regard to the share in the village Muhra was based on the wajib-ul-arz, the pre-emption clause in which was as follows:—

“A sharer wishing to sell or mortgage his share, or a mortgagee to sub-mortgage his mortgagee's rights, shall first communicate his intentions to the nearer sharer, and in the event of his refusal to the one next to him, to sell or mortgage the share for a proper price, and if he also refuses to buy it or pay a proper price, then he shall be competent to transfer it to whomsoever he chooses. If a sharer, the transferor, through enmity or in collusion with the transferee, alleges or causes to be entered in the deed an excessive price, then the question shall be referred to and decided by the arbitrators chosen by the parties. If the parties do not come to a settlement as to price amongst themselves or by appointing an arbitrator, then the Court [110] shall settle it on its own authority according to the quality of the share or the average price paid before for shares transferred in this or other surrounding villages. If the co-sharers fail to pay the price determined by the arbitrators, then the transferor shall be competent to transfer his share to a stranger, and then no claim as to right of pre-emption shall be admissible. If a sharer, the transferor, makes a transfer in favour of his children or near relations, then no sharer shall have a claim for right of pre-emption, and the nearer relations possess a pre-emptive right as opposed to those more remote.”

The claim in regard to the property in Moradabad was based on the Muhammadan law.

The Court of first instance (District Judge of Moradabad) dismissed the claim, and the plaintiff appealed to the High Court. The facts are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and TYRRELL, J.—This was a suit for pre-emption. The defendants were Muhammad Abdul Rab, the vendee, and Wahab Ali, the vendor. The plaintiff and the vendor were half-brothers. They were share-holders in the village Muhra. The property which was sold consists of the shares in the village Muhra, and of a small piece of land in Moradabad itself. The purchaser was a stranger. The sale-deed was executed on the 12th October 1884, and the price was Rs. 4,760. It was one sale transaction for the two properties, and one fixed price. There is no doubt that if the plaintiff had chosen to exercise his rights of pre-emption at the time, he is the person who is entitled to maintain an action for pre-emption in respect of each of these properties. The sale of the share in the village Muhra was governed by the wajib-ul-arz, and the sale of the Moradabad land was governed by the principles of the Muhammadan law applicable to pre-emption.

[111] In the Court below it was contended by the plaintiff that the true price was Rs. 4,375, and not Rs. 4,760. That contention has been abandoned here, and there is ample evidence to show that the true price was, as alleged in the sale-deed, Rs. 4,760. It is proved from the evidence that the vendor was in embarrassed circumstances, that some of his property, particularly that in this village, was attached under a decree, and that he was making applications early in 1884 for postponement of the sale. It is also proved, in our opinion, that negotiations for the sale of this property in suit were being carried on certainly in July, 1884, and most probably previously. In the Court below the parties appeared to have agreed that the Muhammadan law was the law governing this case. We do not consider that they are bound by any such agreement as that. It is true, that in one view of this case the principal of Muhammadan law, which we shall refer to later on, may be a bar to the plaintiff's maintaining the action. The plaintiff's case below was, as it has been here, that he first became aware of the sale in July, 1885; and that thereupon he gave a notice required by Muhammadan law declaring himself a pre-emptor. The defendants' case is that the plaintiff knew, if not before the sale, at any rate soon afterwards, of the fact of the sale in question. The plaintiff was the lambardar of the village, and the defendants say that his agent in the village, a man called Budh Sen, knew perfectly well about the sale, and that the plaintiff must have been informed by his agent of what was taking place in the village, in which he was interested, not only as a shareholder, but also as a lambardar. Another part of the case is this. It is said on behalf of the defendant that the vendor in February, 1884, gave the plaintiff notice in writing by a registered letter that he was going to sell the property in question to Abdul Rab, the present purchaser, and the plaintiff had not the means or the desire to become a purchaser at that time. There is a contention as to what was the nature of that notice, and as to whether any reply was given in fact.

It will be convenient to consider first of all what is the true construction of the wajib-ul-arz in this case. It appears to us that the wajib-ul-arz in this case made it incumbent on a sharer, who was going [112] to sell, or was desirous of selling, a share in the village, to give notice to his co-sharers. And it was provided by the wajib-ul-arz as we read it, that that notice should be given first to the nearer co-sharer, and if he desired to purchase he was entitled to purchase at what is called a "proper" or fair price; and if he did not desire to purchase, then the more distant co-sharer might purchase at a fair price; and if the more distant co-sharer did not purchase, then the shareholder desiring to sell might sell the share to whomsoever he pleased. It provides also the means by which a "proper" or fair price was to be ascertained in case of dispute. It must be ascertained by arbitration or by a suit in Court. That is to say, the co-sharer who had notice had the right to say—"I will purchase the property at a proper price;" and he had the right also, if he did say that, to have it determined, by arbitration, or by suit, what the proper price was. It was also competent to him, under this wajib-ul-arz, to say: "I decline to purchase at all." Now that being the construction which we place upon this wajib-ul-arz, we have got to see what was the nature of the notice given to the plaintiff in February, 1884. As we have said, that notice was in writing. It was sent to the plaintiff under a registered cover; the plaintiff received it and gave a receipt for it. But when the plaintiff is called upon to produce the notice, he does not produce it; but he produces a book in which he says he copied the notice in question. He accounts for copying the notice in the book by saying that he was in the habit of copying important notices into the book to provide for the event of their being lost. The Judge below came to the conclusion that that portion of the book which contains what is said to be a copy of the notice in question was an interpolation. We are not disposed to disagree with him on that point. Assuming, for the purposes of argument, that it is a genuine copy, it is wide enough in our opinion, and sufficiently informed the plaintiff that Wahab Ali was proposing to sell his shares in the villages in the district of Moradabad. The copy shows that Wahab Ali asked the plaintiff to inform him if he wished to purchase the share in any of those villages. We think, therefore, that so far as the giving of a notice was concerned, the vendor complied with the requirements of this wajib-ul-arz. The question then arises:—Was any [113] and what reply sent to that notice? The plaintiff says that he did send a written reply to the effect:—"If you sell, I will purchase." He was asked how he sent the reply, and he gave no satisfactory account of it. He was asked whether he wrote it himself. He said it was written by some one else, but was unable to say who was the person who wrote it. He kept no copy of it, although he had in his hands the present vendor's notice to him, and says that he took the precaution of copying that into his book. As he says, he kept no copy of the reply which he alleges he sent, written by a person whom he does not know. Now unfortunately in this case Wahab Ali has not given evidence. The defendant-vendee is not to be blamed for that; he took all the necessary steps to procure his attendance in Court. So that we have here no direct contradiction to the statement of the plaintiff that he did send that reply. We have, however, evidence which we believe, which is absolutely inconsistent with the plaintiff ever having sent such a reply at all. We know that at that time he was a man involved in debt. We have the evidence of the defendant-purchaser, who tells us that Budh Sen, the plaintiff's particular agent for this village, had told him plainly that he, Budh Sen, as well as his master, the plaintiff, agreed to the sale; and that Budh Sen had told him that he had advised his master to purchase the village, as it was a large one, but his master would not agree to take it. We have also got the evidence of Bulaki Das on this point. He says that Budh Sen told him of his own accord that he and his master were delighted at Abdul Rab becoming a purchaser. We have also got the answer to interrogatories of Hakim Ashgar Ali, in which he tells us that he knew that the plaintiff was not willing to purchase the property at the time ; and further, with regard to the property which was sold by Zohra Begam, on the 22nd March, 1885, that the plaintiff, when asked whether he would purchase, said that he had not got the money.

Now we have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has failed to prove that he did, in fact, reply that he would become the purchaser in the event of the property being sold. If, as we are assuming, he simply took no action within a reasonable time, on the notice [114] of February, 1884, that in our judgment was equivalent to an intimation that he declined to become a purchaser. If failing to take action within a reasonable time is not to be held equivalent to a declining to purchase, the result would be that a sharer wishing to sell property to which a wajib-ul-arz such as this applies, would practically be unable to dispose of the property at all without the risk of a pre-emption suit. Now on that ground alone we think that the plaintiff would fail in this suit, so far as the share in the village is concerned, to which the wajib-ul-arz applies. What we mean is that he had notice that he could purchase, and he acted in such a way as to lead the vendor to conclude that he would not interfere and would not become the purchaser. Of course in all these cases the particular wording of the wajib-ul-arz is to be looked at to see what was the custom or contract between the shareholders of the village. The next point to be considered is, when did the plaintiff or his agent know that the sale to the defendant had actually taken place? The patwari of the village knew in July, 1884, that the sale was being negotiated, and in that month he called upon Abdul Rab, the purchaser, to give him information as to the area and rent of the village. He tells us that Budh Sen informed him that two years before the time he was giving his evidence, he called upon the purchaser to make a salaam to him as a new shareholder in the village. He gave his evidence on the 15th September, 1886, so that although two years had not expired from the actual date of the sale, it is pretty evident that the patwari called upon the defendant to make his salaam shortly after the sale, and it is also proved by him that the person who told him that the sale had taken place was Budh Sen. The evidence of the defendant and of Bulaki Das shows not only that Budh Sen knew of this sale about the time, but also that the plaintiff must have known of it too ; and that at that time the plaintiff was acquiescing in the sale. Then again there is a letter from Budh Sen to the defendant-purchaser, of the 4th February, 1885, which accompanied a present of some sugar-cane juice. That letter and that present of the sugar-cane juice to our mind evidence corroborative of that given by Bulaki Das as to Budh Sen's knowledge. There was no possible reason why that letter should have been written or [115] that present sent if Budh Sen did not know that he was writing the letter and sending the present to a new share-holder in the village. Consequently we come to the conclusion that not only Budh Sen but the plaintiff knew shortly after the sale of the fact that a sale had taken place, but that they had known that fact many months prior to July, 1885. That has an important bearing on one view of the law, which we think is applicable to the case. The property in Moradabad was property not affected by the wajib-ul-arz in this case. It was a property which was subject to the ordinary Muhammadan law of pre-emption. It was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that on his obtaining knowledge that the sale had taken place, he gave without delay notice that he claimed to exercise his right of pre-emption. He does not claim to have given such notice until the 17th July, 1885, and he has attempted to prove that it was not until that date that he became aware of the sale. He has called some witnesses to show how it was that he became aware of the sale in July, and gave the alleged notice. Those witnesses say that the vendor Wahab Ali told them that the price was Rs. 4,275 ; in fact, if that is true, he had gone out of his way to give the information. As a fact the price was Rs. 4,700 odd. But it was part of the plaintiff's case, here, and in the Court below, that the price alleged in the sale-deed was an untrue one, and that the true price was Rs. 4,275. We do not see why Wahab Ali should have given false information of that kind, or what interest he could have had in giving it; particularly when he was on unfriendly terms with the plaintiff, his half-brother. We believe that the story of those witnesses, as to the statement with regard to price, was a false story, brought in for the purpose of supporting the plaintiff's case that Rs. 4,700 was not the real price. Now the whole of the evidence relating to what we may call the July incident, appears to us to be too well prepared. It appears to us to be evidence that has been prepared for the purposes of this suit. The plaintiff says that he sent a written notice in July. It is curious that although he gave two notices to the defendants to produce documents in this case, the written notice is not included in either of them. We believe that this evidence as to the July incident was concocted, partly with the intention of disputing the true [116] price of the property, and partly to get the plaintiff over the difficulty in which he was with regard to the rules of the Muhammadan law as to making a prompt demand to purchase as a pre-emptor. On that point it has been pointed out by Mr. Ross that when there were negotiations in October and November, 1885, for the settlement of this case between the plaintiff and the purchaser, there is not a single thing to suggest in the correspondence, so far as we have seen, that any such notice had been given in the previous July. That was hardly to be overlooked. We have said we have come to the conclusion that no such notice was given, and if it was given, then we still think it was too late, and was not a prompt demand.

This raises another question in this case. It is a question on which although we have formed an opinion, we express that opinion with some hesitation. There can be no doubt that a plaintiff coming into Court in a pre-emption suit, if he is a person having a right to claim the whole property sold, must in his suit make that claim. That is he cannot come into Court and claim a portion only when he is entitled to the whole. That is we think settled law. That question has been considered in the cases of Kashi Nath v. Mukhta Prasad (1), Arjun Singh v. Sarfaraz Singh (2), as well as in many other cases decided in this Court. According to the judgment of Mr. Justice Mahmood in one of those cases, the plaintiff must claim the whole of the property included in the sale-deed, if he is a person entitled to claim it, and his action must stand dismissed if he fails to claim the whole of that property. Mr. Justice Mahmood has expressed his reason for that view of the law, and it appears to us that that is a rule of law which is consistent with common sense. The pre-emptive plaintiff should not be allowed to take, for instance, the best portion of the property brought, and leave the worst on the hands of the purchaser, or on the hands of the vendor. It is said here that the plaintiff is willing to pay the full purchase-money, and leave in the hands of the purchaser the property in Moradabad. Possibly in this particular case the purchaser would not be a sufferer if that was accepted. But we can understand cases in which the purchaser was induced to take property, which otherwise he [117] would not have taken, in order to obtain the sale to him of other property which he desired. In such a case as that it might well be that although the whole of the purchase-money was refunded to him, it would be to his disadvantage to be left with the incumbrance of a portion of the property. The question then arises, can there be any difference between the case of a plaintiff coming into Court and claiming a portion of the property sold, and the case of a plaintiff coming into Court and claiming the whole, he being at the time disentitled by his own act or laches to maintain a claim as to a part? It appears to us there can be no difference in principle; and that exactly the same result must follow in this case as would have followed if the plaintiff had come into Court and had abstained from claiming the property in Moradabad. A person who claims to be a pre-emptor and has disqualified himself from claiming the whole, cannot be in a better position than a person who has come into Court, and has claimed a part only, when he was entitled to claim the whole. In the view which we take, the plaintiff was disqualified from claiming the property in Moradabad, and we think that disqualification would prevent him from maintaining his suit for any portion of this property which was included in one common sale, and for which one price was paid. There is one word more to be said, and that has reference to the point raised by Pandit Ajudhia Nath with regard to a receipt given by the vendor in November, 1884. The Judge below has explained that circumstance on the hypothesis as to family arrangement which had existed between the vendor, the plaintiff, and the other members of the family. We are not satisfied with that explanation, and do not think that it is a correct one. But we are also not satisfied that the money acknowledged to be received then was money which became due out of the sale to the defendant-purchaser. There are certain other receipts which were tendered in evidence before us. They are not on the record, and we have not looked at them, being of opinion that they were not proved and were not admitted by the defendants in the suit.

(1) 6 A. 370.

Shortly, in the result, we are of opinion that the plaintiff's claim must fail so far as the share in the village Muhra is concerned, [118] because we find that the defendant-vendor did all that was required of him by the wajib-ul-arz and the plaintiff did not avail himself of the right of purchase given by that wajib-ul-arz. We find also that the suit must fail as to the Moradabad property, because the plaintiff did not make a prompt demand as pre-emptor; and also for the reason we have just now explained, the suit must fail not only with regard to the Moradabad property, but also with regard to the share in the village; the plaintiff, having disentitled himself to obtain pre-emption in the Moradabad property, cannot obtain the share in the village. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

LOKE INDAR SINGH AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. RUP SINGH

11 A. 118=9 A.W.N. (1889) 72. Unconscionable bargain—Gambling in litigation—Agreement opposed to public policy—Act IX of 1872 (Contract Act), s. 23.

For the purpose of meeting the expenses of an appeal to the Privy Council from concurrent decrees of the Subordinate Judge and the High Court, the plaintiff-appellant executed a deed of sale of certain property worth over Rs. 50,000 in consideration of the vendees providing the necessary security and moneys. The plaintiff experienced considerable difficulty in procuring the means to appeal. The vendees were not professional money lenders, they did not put pressure on the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, he and his agent put pressure on them to agree to the terms of the deed. It appeared that, apart from the moneys borrowed by him from time to time, he was without even the means of subsistence; that he fully understood the nature of the deed; that his agents negotiated the transaction bona fide and, to the best of their powers, in his interest; that there was no fraud or deception on the part of the vendees; and that they performed all that they undertook as regards meeting the expenses of the appeal. Under the deed the plaintiffs were liable to furnish security to the extent of Rs. 4,000 and to advance Rs. 8,500 for other necessary expenses, and they did in fact furnish such security, and advanced sums aggregating Rs. 7,542. The appeal was successful. The appellant having failed to put the vendees in possession of the property conveyed by the deed, and recovered by him under the Privy Council's decree, the vendees sued him for possession of the property and mesne profits, afterwards agreeing that the Court should, in lieu thereof, award them compensation in money equivalent thereto.

[119] Held that, although the case was very different from cases in which persons interfered for their own benefit in litigation not their own, or in which mukhtars, vakils or persons of that class or professional money lenders, taking advantage of the borrower's position, sued to enforce a contract obtained by them from him, and although the defendant was not entitled to sympathy, yet, judging by the disproportion between the liability incurred by the plaintiffs under the contract and the reward which they were to obtain in the event of the defendant's success, it must be concluded either that they did not believe his claim to be well founded, and consequently entered, though unwillingly, into a gambling transaction, or, if they believed the claim to be well founded, that the reward contracted for was excessive and unconscionable; and in either case the contract could not be enforced in its terms.

Held also that, if the doctrine of equity applicable to such cases were applied in favour of the borrower, it should also be applied in favour of the lender; that as there was no reason to suspect the plaintiff's motives, it would be inequitable to relieve the defendant from all liability; that it was only fair that he should compensate the plaintiffs for the use of their security bonds from the date when they were deposited in the High Court to the earliest date after the judgment of the Privy Council when the plaintiffs could have obtained them back; that simple interest at 12 per cent. per annum on the amounts of the bonds for that period would be reasonable compensation for such use; that the defendant should also repay the amounts advanced by the plaintiffs for the expenses of the litigation with interest on each advance at 20 per cent. from the date on which it was made to the date of the decree in the present case; and that he should pay interest on the whole amount thus decreed at 6 per cent. from the date of the decree till payment.

THE facts of this case are stated in the report of Chunni Kuar v. Rup Singh (1) and in the judgments of the Court.

The suit was based on a deed of sale executed in favour of the plaintiffs by the defendant on the 13th March, 1882, in the following terms:—

"I, Raja Rup Singh, son of Raja Mukat Singh, caste Thakur Sengar rais of Bhara, pargana Uraiya, zila Etawah, do hereby declare as follows:—Whereas I instituted a suit against Rani Baisni, widow of Raja Mohendra Singh, deceased, caste Thakur, masnad-nashin (occupying the throne) of the Bhara Raj, and the Collector of Etawah as the manager of the Court of Wards, for recovery of possession of the Bhara estate, containing of moveable and immovable property, specified in the plaint, at a valuation of Rs. 3,10,265—8 in the District Court of Mainpuri, where it was dismissed. As I was [120] possessed of no means, it was difficult for me to file an appeal in the High Court, and I appealed by giving a bond to Musammatt Chunni Kuar, widow of Sah Panni Lal, rais of Marebra, zila Etah, but unfortunately for me the appeal was dismissed. Thus arose the necessity for filing an appeal to the Privy Council. It is clear I have not a pice, and my only hope for justice lies in an appeal to the Privy Council. I have therefore with entreaties got Raja Loke Indar Singh, Shaikh Narsat Hussain, Lala Bhikari Das, Munshi Har Narain, Bibi Chunni Kuar and Kuar Dharam Singh, persons belonging to the first class given below, to consent that they should meet the costs of the Privy Council, including security, by way of a help to me, and should in lieu thereof be the proprietors of an eighth share of the property involved in the case, with the exception of those articles. They have accepted the proposal and deposited the security and the translation fees, and have undertaken to pay the other expenses of the Privy Council appeal. Dewan Ganga Prasad has, from the very beginning, tried in the case, and I owe to him his pay and compensation for his labour. I have got him to agree to take Rs. 5,000 out of the second class of the claim, i.e., that for debts when the case is decreed. I do therefore willingly and voluntarily and while in a sound state of my body and mind execute this deed in favour of the following persons:—

"My suit consists of four claims:—

"1. For mauza Bhara the Raj Mahal, together with other villages appertaining to it, bearing a jama of Rs. 34,463—8, five times of which, viz., Rs. 1,72,317—8, is given in the plaint as the valuation.

"2. Outstanding debts of the estate amounting to Rs. 64,155.

"3. Notes worth Rs. 21,090.

"4. Cash and the gadhi, &c., valued at Rs. 52,703.

"Of these four claims, the last two have been exempted from this contract; and I hereby sell the first two claims, amounting to Rs. 29,559—1, to the first class of the following persons, and Rs. 5,000, out of Rs. 56,135—4, the balance left after deducting Rs. 8,019—12, the eighth share referred to above, from the said sum of Rs. 64,155, the second sort of claim, to Dewan Ganga Prasad. The consideration of this sale as against the first class of vendees is Rs. 12,500, the estimated cost of the Privy Council appeal, consisting of Rs. 4,000 for the security of the Privy Council costs, and Rs. 8,500 for the translation of papers, the pleader's fee and other expenses, of every sort in the said department, and as against the second class of vendees, Rs. 2,500, which has been agreed to be his pay from the beginning of July, 1877, i.e., the institution of the suit. Thus the whole amount of the sale consideration is Rs. 15,000, with reference to which the court-fee has been paid. I or my heirs, successors and representatives shall not question the genuineness of this sale-deed. The sale-deed shall be acted upon on the following conditions:—

"1. The names of the purchasers and the details of the shares are given at the foot of the sale deed, and according to them they shall be the sharers in the property sold, and in proportion to their respective shares, they shall be liable to pay the sale-consideration, viz., security and other expenses of the appeal to the Privy Council.

[121] "2. After the passing of a decree by the Privy Council, the purchasers shall have the power to join me in the execution of the decree, to the extent of their share under this sale-deed, and obtain possession of the property sold, and I shall make them co-sharers under this sale-deed. Should there be any remissness on my part in the conduct of the case, or should I come to terms with the opposite party, or there be any apprehension of a failure of the case by any reason, accident or unforeseen event, and even in the absence of any such cause, if the purchasers have any desire to join in the case, they shall have the power, under, this document, to join with me to the extent of the property sold, and get their names recorded as the appellants.

"3. In connection with the powers mentioned above, it has been agreed upon that after the passing of the decree, the purchasers of the first class shall have an eighth share in all the villages concerned. Should I offer to give in lieu of the above entire villages, excepting villages, 1 Bhara, 2 Haroli, 3 Sikranri, 4 Agana, 5 Barera, 6 Gauhani Kalan, 7 Mahewa, 8 Sijanpur, 9 Athesa and 10 Malgawana, yielding profits equal to an eighth share, they (purchasers) shall accept the same without an objection after seeing that the profits amounted to an eighth share.

"4. The purchasers have no concern whatever with the costs already incurred in the lower Courts, and they are not liable or responsible for the same, for they had no concern with the case so long as it pended in the lower Courts. They are only liable for costs that may be incurred in the Privy Council, in respect of which a security has been deposited. They have accordingly deposited the security-money. The remaining expenses are those which may be made on behalf of the appellant.

"5. I am liable to satisfy the old bond executed as between myself and Chunni Kuar, and the demand of the pleaders in the District Court, according to the terms of the deed in their favour. The purchasers, their property or the property sold shall have no concern with the same. The purchasers will get the property free from all liability.

"6. In lieu of the pay of Dewan Ganga Prasad, who has, ever since the institution of the suit, taken great pains to help the conduct of the case, I have sold to the said Dewan Rs. 5,000, out of Rs. 56,135—4, the balance of the debts due to me, forming the second class of claim. After the decree, he and his representatives and heirs shall have the right and power to recover it under this sale-deed, from the debtors, from myself or from the property claimed in this case. I, my heirs and representatives shall have no objection. I have therefore executed these few words by way of a sale-deed, that they may serve as evidence and be used when needed."

In pursuance of this agreement, the plaintiff deposited in the High Court a bond for Rs. 4,000 as security for the appeal, and advanced sums aggregating Rs. 7,542 for translation and other expenses. The defendant, on the 24th April, 1884, obtained a decree in the Privy Council, reversing the decision of the High Court and awarding him possession of the estate claimed by him in that [122] suit, and an application for review of judgment was rejected by the Privy Council on the 29th November, 1884. The plaintiffs, on the 31st January, 1888, brought this suit against the defendant for possession of the property conveyed by the deed.

The Court of first instance dismissed the claim, on the ground that the agreement contained in the deed of the 13th March, 1882, was unconscionable, extortionate, and opposed to public policy. The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

Upon the case coming on for hearing before Edge, C. J., and Tyrrell, J., the appellants, through their counsel, informed the Court that in the event of the Court's decree being in their favour they were willing to take, in lieu of the one-eighth share included in the deed, compensation in money equivalent to the share. The Court directed that a commission should issue to the Collector of Etawah requesting him to make an investigation into the market-value, on the 1st December, 1884, of the villages in which the one-eighth share was claimed, and to report thereon to the Court. The Collector reported the market-value of the villages in question on the 1st December, 1884, to have been 4 lakhs of rupees. It thus appeared that the value of the one-eighth share conveyed by the deed of the 13th March, 1882, was Rs. 50,000. The case again came on for hearing before Edge, C. J., and Tyrrell, J.

The Hon. T. Conlan, the Hon. Pandit Ajudhia Nath, Pandit Sundar Lal and Pandit Moti Lal Nehru, for the appellants.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and TYRRELL, J.—The suit was brought in the Court of the Subordinate of Judge of Mainpuri on a sale-deed executed by the defendant on the 13th March, 1882. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit with costs. From that decree this appeal has been brought. We have in our judgment in Chunni Kuar v. Rup Sing (1) stated nearly all the material facts which were antecedent to the execution by the defendant of the sale-deed of the 13th March, 1882, and also the result of the litigation in the previous [123] suit, in which the now defendant obtained possession of the Raj Bhara estate and the accumulated income of that estate. So far as the facts concerning the execution of the deed in this case are concerned, there is but little to add. Those facts are given in detail in the evidence of Muhammad Mohsin, which we believe.

We have no doubt, in fact we find, that the defendant perfectly well understood the nature and effect of the deed of the 13th March, 1882; we also find that his agents who negotiated that transaction acted bona fide and to the best of their powers in the interest of the defendant, placed as he was in a position of great difficulty at the time. Of anything like actual fraud or of any deception on the part of the plaintiffs or the defendant's agents we find there was none. It has been contended on the part of the defendant, that, having regard to the judgments of their Lordships of the Privy Council in case of Raja Sahib Prahlad Sen v. Babu Budhu Singh (2) we cannot give any relief whatsoever to the plaintiffs here. That case was one essentially different from the case before us. In that case the assignee or vendee was not the person seeking to enforce the contract. The person there who was seeking to enforce the contract was a person who had purchased the contract from the original vendee for a comparatively small sum. It was plain in that case that if the plaintiff failed to enforce the contract he had purchased, he was not in a position to fall back on and ask for the consideration his assignor had given. That was not the right which he had purchased. There is the other distinction between that case and this, that here the plaintiffs performed all that they undertook to perform, whereas in the case of Raja Sahib Prahlad Sen v. Babu Budhu Singh (2) the original vendee had not nor had the assignee performed the vendor's part of the contract. There were two other cases referred to which in the view we take of the case we need not consider. On behalf of the defendant it was also contended that it was a gambling transaction, that the bargain was unconscionable, and that to enforce the contract would be against public policy. In Chunni Kuar v. Rup Singh (1) we have given expression [124] to what we have conceived to be the law bearing on cases of this kind. In this case undoubtedly the defendant was in a position of very great distress, his suit had been dismissed in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, his appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge had been dismissed by this Court, he was without any means, and unless he obtained assistance on such security as he could offer, he could not have filed or prosecuted his appeal to the Privy Council. So far as we have been able to ascertain, he had not even the means of subsistence. That he had a good case was proved by his success in the appeal to the Privy Council. That people generally considered that his case was a bad one may be inferred from the difficulty he met with in procuring the means to appeal to the Privy Council. At that time he had the decrees of the two Courts against him. The plaintiffs in this case did not seek the defendant. They did not press the defendant to accept the terms contained in the deed of the 13th March, 1882. It was the defendant and his agent who put pressure on the plaintiffs to advance the money on the terms contained in that deed. Some of the plaintiffs are not money-lenders by profession. Two of them are independent gentlemen who were residing on their own estates. That the defendant, even after he had obtained his decree in the Privy Council, never thought there was anything unconscionable in the transaction may be inferred from the fact it was he who proposed that the plaintiffs, instead of taking the shares in the village assigned by the deed of the 13th March, 1882, should take a sum of Rs. 50,000. At that time apparently this defendant Raja, thankful for the assistance which had been rendered to him, an assistance which placed him in the position of a wealthy man and relieved him from the position of being a man without the means of subsistence, honestly intended to perform his contract and discharge the debt which he had incurred. It was not until after that time that this gentleman thought it advisable, having obtained all the benefit which he needed from the use of the plaintiffs' money, to invoke the assistance of the law to enable him to avoid the performance of a contract which the plaintiffs believing in his honour had treated as a valid contract, and on which they had advanced their money and incurred liability. There [125] is in our judgment a very wide difference between this case and many other cases in which persons interfere in litigations not their own for their own benefit. If the plaintiffs here had been professional mukhtars, vakils or persons of that class, or if they had been professional money lenders who had taken advantage of the position of the defendant to obtain from him a contract of this kind, we should without hesitation have given them no relief whatever. But they are not persons of that class, they had not volunteered their assistance to promote the litigation; they had given reluctantly this assistance to help a neighbour in a case which was apparently almost hopeless at the time. They trusted in the honour of the Raja as a native gentleman. He had no security to offer except what then appeared to be the chance of his succeeding in a case in which he had been twice defeated. We confess that in this case our sympathies are entirely with the plaintiffs; and we do not refuse to decree their claim for possession of the share out of any sympathy for the defendant. As we have pointed out in the judgment we have already referred to, the fact that the borrower had fruitlessly sought assistance from other persons who refused the bargain on the ground that it was not advantageous, has been held by the Courts in England to be merely proof of the distress of the borrower and not evidence that the bargain was a fair one and not an unconscionable one. In this case, judging by the disproportion between the liability which the plaintiffs incurred under the contract and the amount of the reward which they were to obtain in the event of the defendant succeeding in the Privy Council, we are compelled to conclude either that the plaintiffs did not believe that the defendant's claim in the action was well founded, and consequently entered although unwillingly into a gambling transaction, or that if they did believe that his claim was well founded, then the reward which under their contract they were to obtain was excessive and unconscionable. In either event we could not enforce this contract in its terms. As was said by Sir William Grant in the case of Bowes v. Heaps (1), "It is not, however, every bargain which distress may induce one man to offer that another is at liberty to accept." It is true that Sir William [126] Grant was dealing in that case with a reversioner or a remainder-man, but we are told by their Lordships of the Privy Council that the doctrine of equity which applies in those cases is to be applied in India and apparently in cases which it would not be applicable in England. If we are to apply that doctrine of equity in favour of the borrower, we should also apply the doctrine of equity in such case in favour of the lender. It is contended in this case on behalf of the defendant that we should not even give a pice to the plaintiffs who advanced their money and deposited their security-bond in this Court. As we have said, if this was a case in which we had reason to suspect the motive of the lenders, we would without hesitation leave them without any remedy so far as we are concerned. But this is a totally different case, and we think it would be inequitable on our part if we were to relieve the defendant from all liability to the plaintiffs. On the 31st January, 1881, the plaintiffs deposited in this Court their security-bond for Rs. 4,000 as security for costs to be incurred in the Privy Council. Their Lordships of the Privy Council gave judgment in the appeal in March or April, 1884, in favour of the defendant. On the 21st April, 1884, the Registrar of the Privy Council gave notice of the decree under the seal of the Council. Allowing for the course of the post, the plaintiffs at the earliest could not have obtained their bonds from this Court before the 21st May, 1884. We think that it is only fair between these parties that the defendant should be obliged to compensate the plaintiffs for the use of their bonds during that time, that is to say, from the 31st January, 1881, until the 21st May, 1884. We think that a most reasonable compensation to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs for the use of their bonds for that time is simple interest at 12 per cent. per annum on the amount of those bonds for that period. The plaintiffs advanced Rs. 783 for expenses of translation and printing of the documents in this Court; of that sum Rs. 691 was actually paid into this Court by the 10th May, 1881, and from that date we allow interest on that sum until the date of our decree at 20 per cent. per annum. Rs. 92 of the Rs. 783 were paid by 22nd September, 1882; the precise date we cannot ascertain, but this is the date on which the papers were forwarded [127] to the Privy Council, and similar interest is allowed on the Rs. 92 from the 22nd September, 1882, until the date of our decree. Then comes the item of Rs. 4,759; that money was advanced, a great portion of it in the early months of 1883, and the whole of it by the 1st August, 1883. We take that as a lump sum and we take the date of the 1st August, 1883, a date rather in favour of the defendant, as a starting point for interest, and we allow on that sum of Rs. 4,759 similar interest to the date of our decree from the 1st August, 1883. There only remains a sum of Rs. 2,000. This was a sum which was advanced by those parties for the purpose of the review. Unfortunately Pandit Nand Lal, a well-known pleader of this Court, who might have given us precise information on that point, is not now alive, but we know from the evidence that a sum of Rs. 2,000 was advanced for the purpose of the review which was applied for in the Privy Council, and we conclude that it must have been advanced before the 29th November, 1884, as on that date their Lordships of the Privy Council rejected the application for review. We allow similar interest on that Rs. 2,000 from the 29th November, 1884, to the date of our decree, and we decree that the defendant do pay to the plaintiffs the several sums mentioned by us together with interest from the date which we have mentioned. We do not include in the amount decreed the amounts for which the bond was given. We also decree the costs of this litigation to

For the purpose of meeting the expenses of a suit for possession of immoveable property, the plaintiff, who was in straitened circumstances, agreed with the defendant that the latter, in consideration of paying such expenses from the Court of first instance up to the High Court, should have half the property and half the mesne profits, with all his costs, in the event of success. The suit was brought and was conducted by the plaintiff and the defendant jointly, and was decreed by the High Court on appeal, and the defendant obtained possession of half the property. The plaintiff sued to recover possession of the half, on the ground that the agreement was illegal and void. It appeared that the amount actually spent by the defendant in the former litigation was Rs. 368, and that, if that suit had failed, he would have lost about Rs. 600. It was found that the value of the half share of the property was about Rs. 1,000.

Held that the agreement was unfair, unreasonable, extortionate and contrary to public policy, within the meaning of s. 23 of the Contract Act (IX of 1872), and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession of the land in suit on payment of compensation for the advances made by the defendant in the former litigation, with interest at 12 per cent. per annum. Chunni Kaur v. Rup Singh (2) and Loke Indar Singh v. Rup Singh (3) referred to.

THE facts of this case were as follows. The plaintiffs, Husain Bakhsh and Nabi Bakhsh, brought a suit against one Ram Sarup to recover possession of 51 bighas 11 biswas 4 dhurs of land, of which he had dispossessed them. At the time when they brought the suit they were in pecuniary difficulties, and apparently the period of limitation within which the suit had to be instituted was about to expire. For the purpose of meeting the expenses of the litigation, they, on the 20th January, 1881, executed, jointly with the defendants, Rahmat Husain and Amanat Ali, an agreement whereby it was provided, inter alia, that the defendants should pay all the plaintiffs' expenses of the suit from the Court of first instance to the High Court, and that, in consideration of such payment, and in the event of the plaintiffs being successful, the defendants should be [129] entitled to half the land recovered with half mesne profits and all costs incurred by them in the suit. The suit was then brought, both the plaintiffs and the defendants in the present suit being plaintiffs, on the 1st February, 1881, and on the 11th April, 1882, was decreed by the High Court on appeal. In execution of the decree, the decree-holders obtained possession of the land and realized the profits and costs in suit. On the 17th May, 1884, the defendants were recorded in the revenue registers as proprietors of 25 bighas 15 biswas and 12 dhurs, half the land so recovered, notwithstanding objections raised by the plaintiffs.

(1) See Fry v. Lane (L. R., 40 Ch. D., 312). (2) 11 A. 57. (3) 11 A. 118.

The plaintiffs thereupon instituted the present suit for recovery of possession of the 25 bighas 15 biswas 12 dhurs and mesne profits, on the ground that the agreement of the 20th January, 1881, so far as regarded the stipulation for giving half the land originally sued for to the defendants, was illegal and void. In defence the defendants contended that the agreement was freely and voluntarily executed by the plaintiffs for good consideration, and that they were entitled to retain possession.

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Allahabad) decreed the claim. Upon the material issue in the case the Court's judgment was as follows :—

"It appears that on the 19th September, 1882, the plaintiff, Nabi Bakhsh, mortgaged his one-fourth share in the land to Ghazi for Rs. 1,000. The plaintiff contends, therefore, that the whole land, or 51 bighas 11 biswas 4 dhurs is worth more than Rs. 4,000, and so the half of it in the defendants' possession is worth Rs. 2,000; and the defendants have not questioned this allegation in their written statement. In the agreement itself half of the land, or 25 bighas 15 biswas 12 dhurs, is valued at Rs. 830, and in the former suit the 51 bighas 11 biswas 12 dhurs were valued at Rs. 1,660. It is not shown how that former valuation was made. The fact that one-fourth of the land has been actually mortgaged for Rs. 1,000 cannot be ignored.....The witness Mannu, whose evidence has not been rebutted, swears that the 12 or [130] 13 bighas mortgaged to him yield him a profit of Rs. 30 a year. At that rate also, the plaintiffs' present valuation of the land does not appear to be excessive.

"Then, as to the risk run by the defendants, I sent for the records of the former suit, and they showed that the amount actually spent by them in the three Courts was Rs. 368-10-0 and the amount spent by Ram Sarup was Rs. 222-1-0. If the suit had failed, the defendants would have had to pay Ram Sarup costs. The defendants underwent a risk, therefore, of losing Rs. 590-11-0.

"For this risk the agreement gave the defendants not only all their costs, but also as a reward half the mesne profits, or half Rs. 347-4-6 (the amount which Ram Sarup paid on account of mesne profits on the 4th September, 1883), and also half the land, which I now find to be worth about Rs. 2,000, and to yield a profit of Rs. 100 a year.

"Now, the question which I have to determine in this case is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to avoid this agreement, that is, whether they are equitably entitled to be relieved from its effects by paying some reasonable money compensation to the defendants for their trouble and expense in the former suit, for it is on such terms that the plaintiffs themselves wish to be relieved from the effects of the agreement.

"There is no specific law against maintenance and champerty in this agreement, but champertous agreements of this kind have always been looked upon with disfavour by the Courts on the ground that they are against public policy. The matter has been fully and elaborately discussed in the well-known case of Ram Coomar Coondoo v. Chunder Canto Mookerjee (1) by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. After an exhaustive examination of the numerous rulings and authorities on the point, their Lordships lay down the following propositions, which we are bound to accept for our guidance. [The learned Subordinate Judge read the passage reported [131] at p. 46 of the fourth volume of the Law Reports, Indian Appeals, and quoted in the case of Chunni Kuor v. Rup Singh (1), and continued :—]

"Applying these rules to the present case, I am of opinion that the agreement in dispute is 'extortionate and unconscionable, so as to be inequitable against' the plaintiffs, and that the recompense provided for by it is not 'reasonable.' The purport of the agreement was that, for an outlay of about Rs. 350, the defendants were not only to get that money but also half the mesne profits and half the property. The pecuniary value of that recompense I find to be nearly Rs. 2,200, or about seven times the outlay. In the result, the defendants not only got their outlay, but make a clear profit of nearly Rs. 200 in cash, and of about Rs. 2,000 in valuable immoveable property.

"The case which I find to be most similar to this case is that of Grose v. Amirtamayi Dasi (2). [The learned Subordinate Judge, after stating the facts of that case, continued :—] I think that the reasons for which Bamasundari's agreement was set aside are quite applicable to this case, and that, so far as the plaintiffs' agreement gives a moiety of the land in suit to the defendants, it ought to be set aside, and the plaintiffs ought to be relieved from its effects. He who seeks equity, however, ought to do it himself. Acting on this principle, the plaintiffs have rightly agreed to give the defendants a fair and reasonable compensation for the advances made by them in the former litigation, and they have agreed that the amount that may be found due to the defendants may be made a charge on the moiety of the land that is now in their (the defendants') possession."

The Court decreed the claim, directing that the plaintiffs should pay the defendants, as compensation for the advances made by them, Rs. 330, with interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, and that each side should bear its own costs.

[132] The defendants appealed from this decree to the District Judge of Allahabad. The principal portion of the judgment on the appeal was as follows :—

"On the main issue as to whether the plaintiffs-respondents are entitled to escape from the fulfilment of an agreement deliberately entered into, I do not agree with the conclusions arrived at by the lower Court. The circumstances of the case do not correspond with those of the case quoted by the lower Court, Grose v. Amirtamayi Dasi (2). That was a case in which an extortionate bargain had been driven with a widow, under which the person supplying the funds for litigation was to get a clear moiety for himself, and to have a charge on the other moiety for recovery of all moneys expended with interest. The claim was resisted not by the widow herself, but by her heirs. Here the plaintiffs are grown up men of fifty and thirty-five respectively, and presumably able to take care of themselves. There is no evidence to show, or reason to believe, that they were taken undue advantage of, and it is they themselves (and not others whose rights they have given away) who seek to evade the fulfilment of what appears to have been a fair bargain. The bad faith of the plaintiffs-respondents is apparent in their attempt to shuffle out of their agreement on the pretence that the defendants-appellants had not done their part,—a pretence clearly exposed by the lower Court.

"The remuneration secured to the defendants-appellants was, no doubt, considerable; but there is nothing to show that the transaction had anything in it of a gambling or speculative character, or was otherwise opposed to public policy. It was one involving some risk: the defendants stood to lose Rs. 590, say Rs. 600, on it in costs of the Courts. The suit was dismissed by the Court of first instance and by the lower appellate Court, whose decision was carried in appeal before, and confirmed by, the High Court. It was thus a case of some difficulty, and it was no doubt known that it would be fought out to the end. The lower Court has made no allowance for the defendants-appellants' labour and trouble. The [133] remuneration, though large, was not in my opinion extortionate, and it has perhaps been over-estimated by the lower Court at Rs. 2,000 besides half mesne profits and recovery of outlay with interest. The plaintiffs-respondents themselves valued the whole land in this suit at Rs. 1,660, and its half is valued in the agreement at Rs. 830. To this amount at least the defendants are fairly entitled. But if the land is worth more, they are still entitled to claim it under the express agreement entered into.

"The effect of the lower Court's order, if maintained, would be to create a precedent and make it impossible for any intending litigant unprovided with the necessary funds to obtain them on ordinary terms from persons who would not be willing to advance the money on such terms in view of the risk and want of security, but might be deceived into advancing it on the faith of an agreement securing special terms, which the borrower would repudiate with the sanction of the Court."

The Court accordingly decreed the appeal and dismissed the suit with costs. The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

Munshi Ram Prasad, for the appellants.

Mr. Amir-ud-din, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

TYRRELL and BRODHURST, JJ.—In this case the defendants-respondents helped the plaintiffs-appellants to recover from one Ram Sarup a nankar holding of 51 bighas, 11 biswas, 4 dhurs, the plaintiffs promising the defendants that they should have half the property and half the mesne profits with all their costs in the event of success in the suit. The plaintiffs did succeed in that suit and recovered their 51 bighas, 11 biswas, 4 dhurs with profits. The defendants, who were co-plaintiffs in that suit, and who consequently were entitled to execute the decree obtained in that suit jointly with the plaintiffs in this suit, took half the profits awarded under that decree and their costs, and got possession of half the land amounting to 25 bighas, 15 biswas, 12 dhurs. The present action has been brought to eject them from the land. The Subordinate Judge of Allahabad decreed the claim, holding that the defendants had received sufficient compensation for the advance they made to the plaintiffs by getting [134] the sum of Rs. 330 with interest, which the plaintiffs were to pay to them at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. The learned Subordinate Judge found that the bargain between the plaintiffs in the former suit was unconscionable and extortionate, and, as such, was inequitable against the plaintiffs in the present suit. He found the recompense secured to the present defendants was grossly unreasonable, inasmuch as the expense they had to incur was small, the risks they ran were inconsiderable, the labour they had to undergo was little or nothing, while the land which they had taken possession of was worth fully one thousand rupees. The Subordinate Judge accordingly decreed the plaintiffs the recovery of the land on condition of their paying to the defendants Rs. 330 with interest at 12 per cent. per annum, from the 10th February, 1885, to the date of payment. The learned District Judge of Allahabad reversed the decree, and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit upon the following grounds. He found that the bargain was fair, because although the entire land is probably worth Rs. 2,000, the plaintiffs knew their own business and it was undesirable that the Court should make contracts for parties. The District Judge also thought that the Subordinate Judge had forgotten to take into account the labour and trouble which fell upon the defendants in their character of co-plaintiffs in the former suit. And lastly he held that there was nothing gambling or speculative about the bargain.

In second appeal Mr. Ram Prasad, on behalf of the plaintiffs-appellants, contended that there was no labour and trouble incurred by the defendants in the former action; that the action was necessarily fought by the present plaintiffs, who possessed all the information necessary for the successful conduct of the case, and who only were the persons who did all that was to be done in the way of employing and instructing counsel, bringing witnesses forward and the like. Mr. Ram Prasad also pointed out the inconsistency in the learned Judge's finding that the transaction was not of a gambling or speculative character, with the learned Judge's remark, which was perfectly true, that the defendants stood to lose six hundred rupees at least in costs. Mr. Ram Prasad urged several forcible arguments in support of the finding that the bargain by [135] which the plaintiffs were to yield a thousand rupees' worth of land to the defendants as a recompense for the defendants' assistance in the suit, so far from being fair, was unconscionable, extortionate and unreasonable, as it has been held by the Court of first instance.

We think that this appeal must prevail. Mr. Amir-ud-din, the learned counsel for respondents, argued that it should be remembered that his clients were not common money-lenders nor professional usurers, that they were related to, or connected with, the plaintiffs, and were consequently induced to run the heavy risk they incurred in helping the plaintiffs with their suit, the plaintiffs being unable to get help from any other quarter. The learned counsel also quoted certain rulings of the Calcutta Court in support of his argument. Those rulings are to be found in Punchann Muzoomdar v. Doorga Nath Roy (1), Nobeen Chunder Ghose v. Ramgogenath Gope (2), Ramrav Khunderav v. Govind Pandshet (3), and Woodman's Digest, page 699.

The learned Subordinate Judge in his judgment cited certain recent rulings of the Indian High Courts strongly in favour of his view of the case. Indeed, all the current of rulings upon cases of this character is against the respondent. Two cases have lately been before this Court, Chunni Kuar v. Rup Singh (4) and Loke Indar Singh v. Rup Singh (5), in which this question has been very fully and carefully considered, and all the case-law upon the subject was under the consideration of the Court. The circumstances of those two cases are very analogous to the circumstances of the case before us. In those cases, as here, the lender of the money for the purposes of maintaining the action was not a common money-lender or a professional usurer. There also the receiver of the assistance was in extremely great need of help, having found it impossible to get assistance from any one but the person who lent him the money. In those cases also it was common ground that the persons who advanced the funds ran a very serious risk of losing their money. In those cases this Court decided that the contract [136] by which a large portion of the estate was conveyed to the person who advanced the money necessary to bring the action to recover the estate, was a contract which the Civil Court ought not to enforce. It was held, and we must hold here, that whether the contract be regarded as having been made under very risky circumstances, or whether it was made under circumstances of ordinary or inconsiderable risk, it would still be a contract open to objection, under one or other of the conditions mentioned in s. 23 of the Contract Act. For if it was a very risky contract, then obviously its enforcement would be against public policy on the ground of its being of a speculative character. If it was not of extraordinary risk, then it would be inequitable to enforce the contract, as the recompense secured was out of all proportion to the risk incurred. Approving of the rulings in those cases, we adopt and follow them in this case, and finding that the learned District Judge dissented from the Court of first instance for reasons which are not sustainable, we find that the contract, under which the defendants were to get half the plaintiffs' land in addition to other advantages in return for the pecuniary assistance afforded by them, was unfair, unreasonable and extortionate, and we think that the Court of first instance made a proper decision and decree in the case. We set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, restore that of the first Court, and decree this appeal with costs.

The question here was whether a mortgage deed, dated 20th May, 1873, had been sufficiently registered, with reference to the requirements of s. 28 of Act VIII of 1871, having been presented for registration, and registered, at the office of a Sub-Registrar in a sub-district, within which part of the property mortgaged was situate, that part having borne a very small proportion to the rest of the property.

That section (1) directs presentment for registration in the office of a Sub-Registrar within whose sub-district the whole, or some portion of the property, to which such document relates, is situate.

By the mortgage-deed of 20th May, 1873, Mr. R. P. Brooke, after recitals that he owed to Hari Ram and Raja Ram (the present plaintiffs) Rs. 2,59,594, and that it had been agreed that he should draw upon them down to October, 1873, to the further amount of Rs. 90,000, mortgaged to them his indigo factories and villages in the Gorakhpur district, also agricultural land in Champaran, and a plot of land, 500 yards square, in one of the mohallas in the town of Patna. This instrument was registered in the Sub-Registrar's office at Patna. Transactions continued between Brooke and the mortgagees, who were bankers in Patna, and who supplied him with funds, and the balance due was reduced. But in January, 1875, Brooke sold his interest in the already mortgaged estate to Sheodial Mal and Hardial Mal.

This suit was brought on the 1st June, 1878, by Hari Ram and Raja Ram to recover from Brooke Rs. 79,655, alleged to be due on balance of accounts, and to realize that sum by sale of the property mortgaged by him to the plaintiffs; also, to have declared invalid as [138] being fraudulent and collusive, the sale of the property made by Brooke to Sheodial Mal and Hardial Mal, who were made the second and third defendants.

The latter, filing their written statements in 1879, set up limitation, and relied upon the sale to them. The first defendant Brooke who was absent from India when the suit commenced, returning in 1881, admitted settlement of account, claiming certain deductions, and denied his personal liability.

Unless the instrument of 20th May, 1873, having been effectively registered, could be taken as admissible in evidence, the debt on the account stated would have been barred by lapse of time. The District Judge, however, found that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the balance due to them under the mortgage-deed, and decreed to the plaintiff the amount claimed, less Rs. 15,104. He found that Brooke was the owner of the plot of land in Patna, and that therefore, the mortgage had been properly registered in the Sub-Registrar's Office at Patna.

The defendants, Sheodial Mal and Hardial Mal, appealed from this decree to the High Court, which, on the 9th January, 1885, reversed it on the ground that the existence of property worth about Rs. 500 in Patna did not within the true meaning of section 28 of Act VIII of 1871 entitle the plaintiffs to have the mortgage-deed which had been registered in the Sub-Registrar's Office at Patna, considered to have been effectively registered as a document relating to estate of a different nature and far more valuable, in fact, constituting the mortgaged estate, in Gorakhpur and Champaran. The decree of the High Court dismissed the suit.

The judgment is given in the report of the hearing on appeal to the High Court, at page 592 of the 7th vol. of the Indian Law Reports.

(1) Not differing in this respect from s. 28 of Act III of 1877, the Indian Registration Act, 1877.

The plaintiffs appealed to Her Majesty in Council.

On this appeal,

Mr. J. Graham, Q. C., and Mr. J. H. A. Branson, for the appellants argued that the High Court had erred in holding that the [139] mortgage-deed of 20th May, 1873, had not been duly registered as required by s. 28 of Act VIII of 1871, both that Court and the Court below having found that some portion of the property, to which the deed related, viz., Brooke's property in Patna, was situate within the Patna Sub-Registrar's sub-district. They referred to ss. 64, 65 and 66, and the provision made for the forwarding of copies of the document, endorsement, and certificate to the Registrar of every district, and the Sub-Registrar of every sub-district, in which any part of the property might be situated, as securing the publicity which was one of the main objects of the Act, as observed in the judgment of the High Court.

Mr. T. H. Cowie, Q. C., and Mr. R. V. Doyne, for the respondents, without relying on the proposition expressed in the judgment of the High Court that "portion" meant substantial portion, as that word was used in s. 28, contended that the registration was defective with reference to the entire disconnection between such property, on the one hand, as the indigo factory in Gorakhpur, constituting, with the other agricultural land in Champaran, the actual security given, and, on the other, the few yards of land in the town of Patna.

In regard to the merits of the suit, they also contended that the decree should be upheld on the evidence of satisfaction of the mortgage debt, examining the accounts for that purpose.

Counsel for the appellants were not called upon, either to reply as to the question of registration or to argue the subsequent matter of the accounts.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by SIR R. COUCH.

JUDGMENT.

SIR R. COUCH.—The suit which is the subject of this appeal was brought by the plaintiffs, who are bankers, against the present respondents, who are also bankers, and against a Mr. Brooke. The plaintiffs the appellants sought to recover a sum of Rs. 79,655 as principal and interest, which they alleged to be due to them in respect of a mortgage executed by Brooke on the 20th May, 1873, the plaintiffs alleging that at that date Brooke adjusted his account and executed [140] a mortgage for securing Rs. 3,49,504-4. There is no question that this mortgage was executed by Brooke. The mortgage stated that there had been an adjustment of accounts between Brooke and the plaintiffs, and it was given to secure the money which was then due on the account, together with a sum of Rs. 90,000 to be advanced by the plaintiffs to Brooke for defraying necessary expenses of an indigo concern from May, 1873, to October of the said year. The defence of the present respondents, with whom alone their Lordships have now to deal, was twofold. Having become the purchasers of part of the mortgaged property, another part of it having been previously sold, they objected that this mortgage of May, 1873, was not duly registered; and they have also objected that the whole of the sum of Rs. 90,000 was not advanced before the 1st October, 1873, but a portion only was advanced, leaving a sum of about Rs. 30,000, which they say was subsequently advanced and is therefore not covered by the mortgage.

With reference to the objection as to the non-registration of the mortgage-deed, it appears from the schedule to the deed that it was a mortgage of a considerable property, only a portion of which, stated to be 500 yards of land built upon, was situate in the district of Patna; the other part, and of course much the largest part of the property, was situate in other districts. Act VIII of 1871, with regard to registration, contains this provision in s. 28:—"Save as in this part otherwise provided, every document mentioned in s. 17, clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4, and s. 18, clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4, shall be presented for registration in the office of a Sub-Registrar, within whose sub-district the whole or some portion of the property to which such document relates is situate." And this was an instrument which came within the provisions of this section. The registration was made in the district of Patna, where the 500 yards of land were situate. The Subordinate Judge held that this was a sufficient registration. On appeal to the High Court, the learned Judges of that Court, the Chief Justice and another Judge, held that it was not; and the ground upon which they came to that decision is stated by the Chief Justice to be this:—"In a case [141] like the present, in which there is a large and valuable property in one sub-district, and another small piece of land situate at a distance, it seems to me that to allow registration of a document affecting both properties in the place where the smaller and less valuable is situate would be inconsistent with the implied intention of the Legislature that registration should be made with reference to the locality of the property,"—that a literal interpretation of the terms of the section ought not to be adopted; and that it was the intention of the Legislature that the registration should take place where some substantial portion of the property was situate.

It appears to their Lordships that this judgment puts a construction upon s. 28 which cannot be supported, and in fact imputes to the Legislature an intention which does not appear from the provisions of the Registration Act to have been their intention. The words, if we take them in their ordinary sense, "within whose district the whole or some portion of the property to which such document relates is situate," certainly do not show an intention that there should be any inquiry as to whether the place where the document was registered was the place where what may be called some substantial portion of the property is situate; and an inquiry of that kind might very frequently lead to considerable difficulty. But the intention of the Act is apparent from the subsequent provisions. In s. 64 it is provided that "every Sub-Registrar on registering a document relating to immoveable property not wholly situate in his own sub-district shall make a memorandum thereof, and of the endorsement and certificate thereon, and send the same to every other Sub-Registrar subordinate to the same Registrar as himself in whose sub-district any part of such property is situate," and then, "such Sub-Registrar shall file the memorandum in his book No. 1." S. 65 and s. 66 contain similar provisions where the property is situate in more districts than one. Thus the information is conveyed to the Registrars or Sub-Registrars of every place where the document ought to be registered, and thus all the information which it is the object of a register to afford is to be [142] found in those different places. It appears to have been the intention of the Legislature in making those provisions that it should be sufficient that the registration be made by the parties, as is stated in s. 28, in the place where some portion of the property—not a substantial portion, but where any portion of the property is situate, leaving it to the office to do the rest. These provisions are calculated to effect that, and are in accordance with what might reasonably be supposed to be the intention of the Legislature.

Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion that the decision of the High Court with regard to the want of registration of this mortgage cannot be supported. The consequence ordinarily would be that the decree of the High Court reversing the decree of the Judge of Gorakhpur, which was given in favour of the plaintiffs, would be reversed, and the decision of the Judge of Gorakhpur would stand. But their Lordships allowed the learned counsel for the respondents to submit to them, and argue, that the decision of the Judge of Gorakhpur was wrong, and consequently that, although the High Court had reversed it on a ground which cannot be supported, still, it ought to be reversed, and the decree reversing it ought to stand.

Now, it is to be observed that the Judge of Gorakhpur had very carefully considered the whole of the case, and had come to the conclusion that the balance which he found due to the plaintiffs, and which they were entitled to recover as mortgagees, was really due to them. The objection taken to his finding appears to be of a twofold character. It is said that only monies which had actually been advanced by the plaintiffs before the 1st of October, 1873, can be recovered by the mortgagees, and that the advances out of the Rs. 90,000 subsequent to that day did not become the subject of the mortgage. That depends upon the construction of the mortgage-deed. Their Lordships think that the mortgage was intended to cover the whole advance of the Rs. 90,000; and whether it was advanced before the 1st of October, 1873, or not, if the parties, that is Mr. Brooke and the mortgagees, thought fit between themselves to allow a portion [143] of that Rs. 90,000 not to be immediately advanced, but to remain in the hands of the plaintiffs in a deposit account in such a way that he could draw upon them and obtain the money at any time, that it was really covered by the mortgage, and it is not an answer to the claim of the mortgagees in respect of the Rs. 90,000, that the whole of it was not advanced before the 1st October, 1873. The way in which the defendants seek to avail themselves of this objection is that they say that if they are right in that contention, and the mortgage only covered what was actually advanced before the 1st of October, 1873, the accounts show that the whole of the mortgage was satisfied, and consequently that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover upon it as they claim. Their Lordships think that this cannot be allowed.

Then it is also contended that this money was not advanced. Mr. Mayne has argued that there is no evidence of it, but one of the defendants when examined said he did not deny that the money was advanced; and there cannot be any doubt the money was actually advanced.

Another answer to this contention on the part of the defendants appears to be this: On the 17th of September, 1874, Mr. Brooke, the mortgagor, settled an account with the plaintiffs, and the whole of the matters between them was gone into, and a balance was then agreed upon as due from him to the plaintiffs, including all these different items which would be the subject of the mortgage. The defendants acquired no interests in the estate till January, 1875, when they took a conveyance from Brooke. Their Lordships are of opinion that the defendants are bound by the account which Mr. Brooke so settled, and that what he, when he settled that account, agreed to be due in respect of the mortgage, and the way in which the different payments appear to be appropriated, cannot be now disputed. They do not think it necessary to go into the evidence which Mr. Cowie, and Mr. Mayne, more especially, have referred to on this subject; but they think that if that evidence was gone into it would support the contention of the plaintiffs that the amount which the Judge of Gorakhpur has found to be due is really due to the [144] plaintiffs, and is the subject of the mortgage, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover it as mortgagees in the way in which they claim.

The case appears to have been very carefully investigated by the Subordinate Judge, and unless their Lordships could see that he was wrong in the way he has dealt with the accounts, and the various facts in the case, they would not come to the conclusion that his decree ought to have been reversed by the High Court. The result is that their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the decree of the High Court should be reversed, and the appeal thereto dismissed with costs, and the decree of the Judge of Gorakhpur varied by omitting that part of it which directs the deed of sale to be cancelled. The costs of this appeal will be paid by the respondents. Appeal allowed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

MURLIDHAR AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. KANCHAN SINGH AND OTHERS (Defendants). * [7th November, 1888.]

Mortgage—Conditional sale—Foreclosure—Suit for possession—Regulation XVII of 1806, s. 8—Cause of action—Limitation—Act XIV of 1859, s. 1 (12).

A suit for foreclosure was brought in 1886 upon a mortgage by conditional sale executed in 1846, the condition being for payment within five years from that date. The deed provided that, in default of payment within the prescribed period, the property mortgaged "will be foreclosed (baibat), and this mortgage-deed will be considered as an absolute sale-deed." Between 1846 and 1886 no foreclosure proceedings or other steps were taken by the mortgagee, and no admission of liability was made by the mortgagor.

Held that, by reason of Act XIV of 1859 (Limitation Act), the plaintiff's remedy was barred during the currency of that Act, and that the time within which [145] he was entitled to maintain an action for foreclosure, if he had taken the proper proceedings, expired in 1863.

Held also that, even if foreclosure proceedings under Regulation XVII of 1806 had been taken, the cause of action was the original non-payment of the money on the due date, and the provisions of the Regulation could not create a fresh cause of action. Denonath Gangooly v. Nursingh Proshad Doss (1) referred to.

[R., 26 A. 4 (8,9) ; 10 A.L.J. 538 (545) = 15 Ind. Cas. 240 ]

THIS was a suit for foreclosure of a deed of mortgage by conditional sale executed on the 4th February, 1846, by the predecessor in title of the defendants in favour of the ancestor of the plaintiffs. The deed was as follows:—

"Musammat Kishen Kuar, widow of Shankar Baksh, deceased zamindar of mauza Kakadeo, &c., pargana Jajmau, having presented herself in the Cawnpore Registration Office, solemnly and truly declared that she is in possession and enjoyment of a 4 pies 11 krants share in each of the villages Kakadeo and Benaikpur, pargana Jajmau, and that there was not and is not any other sharer, partner or claimant in the said share belonging to her at the time of the execution of the present deed. Now she has voluntarily and willingly mortgaged the said share in its entirety together with all the boundaries and rights, barren and waste lands, jhil and jhabar, jalkar and bankar lands, ponds and groves and trees both bearing and not bearing fruit, sair and saltpit and other zamindari dues appertaining thereto, bounded as below, for Rs. 200 of the kuldar coin, the half of which amounts to Rs. 100 of the same coin, to Shitab Rai, son of Punjab Rai, caste Kayasth, for a term of five years as a conditional sale, and does hereby promise to re-pay the said sum with interest at Re. 1 per cent. per mensem within the said term without any objection or excuse, and that during the said term of mortgage she the mortgagor will remain in possession and will make the collections and will bear the profit and loss and be responsible in civil and criminal cases, and the mortgagee shall have nothing to do with them. But if she fail to pay the principal with interest, then after the expiration of the period specified herein, the aforesaid share will be foreclosed (baibat) in lieu thereof, and this mortgage-deed will be considered as an absolute sale-deed. I have [146] therefore written these few lines by way of mortgage as a conditional sale to serve as an authority."

* Second Appeal, No. 653 of 1887, from a decree of W. Blennerhassett, Esq., District Judge of Cawnpore, dated the 6th January, 1887, confirming a decree of Munshi Kalwant Prasad, Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore, dated the 6th May, 1886.

No foreclosure proceedings were taken in respect of this deed under Regulation XVII of 1886. The present suit was instituted on the 7th October, 1886, in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore, and the plaintiffs claimed foreclosure in default of payment of Rs. 1,151, the amount which they alleged to be due, as principal and interest, under the deed.

The only plea of the defendants in answer to the suit which it is necessary to notice, was that the suit was barred by limitation. Upon this the Subordinate Judge observed:—

"Although there was a time fixed in the deed of mortgage for payment of the loan, which time has long elapsed, yet at the time of the execution of the mortgage, or while Act XIV of 1859 or Act IX of 1871 was in force, no period was fixed for the presentation of an application for foreclosure, for which proceedings then used to be taken under Regulation XVII of 1806—see Buldeen v. Golab Koonwer (1). The ruling referred to by the pleaders for the defendants, Ram Chunder Ghosaul v. Juggut Monmohiny Dabee (2) does not seem to be applicable. Besides this, the Court must follow the rulings of the Allahabad High Court, and hold that the plea of limitation does not affect the claim."

On the merits, however, the Subordinate Judge was of opinion that there was no consideration for the deed of the 4th February, 1846, and accordingly dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs appealed to the District Judge of Cawnpore, whose judgment on the appeal was as follows:—

"The claim is for foreclosure on a conditional deed of sale alleged to be executed on the 4th February, 1846, the term for payment being five years, and it is clear that for forty years the plaintiff has made no claim, and the defendant has not in any way admitted the correctness of the mortgage. It appears to me that previous to Act XIV of 1859, the plaintiff would have been bound [147] to take foreclosure proceedings within twelve years from his cause of action. See Regulation III of 1793, and Prannath Roy Chowdry v. Rookea Begum (1).

"I can find nothing in Act XIV of 1859 operating to change this period of limitation, and the ruling quoted by the lower Court in the appellant's favour insists on the necessity of such admissions in order to extend the period of limitation. Accordingly I find the suit barred by limitation. It is unnecessary to determine the remaining grounds of appeal. Appeal dismissed with costs."

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and TYRRELL, J.—This was a suit for foreclosure of a mortgage by way of conditional sale executed on the 4th February, 1846, the condition being for payment within five years of that date. The suit was brought in October, 1886, and the Judge below has found that no claim was made by the mortgagees for forty years and that there was no admission of liability by the mortgagor during that period. The Judge, we think, rightly held that by reason of Act XIV of 1859 the plaintiff's remedy was barred during the currency of that Act. In that view we agree with him. In our opinion the time within which the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action for foreclosure, if he had taken the proper proceedings, expired in 1863. A great deal of the argument before us was directed to show that the cause of action in a case like this arose not on the non-payment at due date but on the expiration of the year of grace provided for by Regulation XVII of 1806. It now appears that no proceedings were taken under that Regulation at all. But even if they had been taken, we should be prepared to hold that the cause of action was the original non-payment of the money on the due date, and that the provisions in Regulation XVII of 1806, which was passed for the protection of mortgagors, could not create a fresh cause of action. To hold as was contended before us would [148] involve this absurdity, that the non-compliance by an alleged mortgagor with the parwana obtained ex parte by an alleged mortgagee would create a cause of action whether there had been a mortgage or not. As far back as 1874, Mr. Justice Markby in an elaborate judgment decided that foreclosure proceedings under the Regulation in question did not create a cause of action: Denonath Gangooli v. Nursingh Proshad Doss (2). The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Pending suits—Malikana—Recurring liability—Different reliefs claimed—Res judicata—Different subject-matters claimed—Judgment in first suit going to root of plaintiff's title—“Final” judgment—Judgment liable to appeal or under appeal—Effect of final decree in first suit pronounced subsequent to decision in second suit of lower appellate Court, but before hearing of second appeal in second suit—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 12, 13, 582, 587, 647.

The pendency of litigation regarding rent, malikana, or other demand for one year does not, under s. 12 of the Civil Procedure Code, bar a suit between the same parties in which the same demand is made for a subsequent year, inasmuch as the reliefs claimed in the two cases are different. Ss. 12 and 13 of the Code compared.

For the purposes of the rule of res judicata, it is not essential that the subject-matters of the present and the former litigations should be identical. Where a recurring liability is the subject of claim, a previous judgment dismissing a suit between the same parties upon findings which do not go to the root of the title on which the claim rests, but relate merely to a particular item or instalment, cannot operate as res judicata. But if such previous judgment negatives the title and main obligation itself, the plaintiff cannot re-agitate the same question of title by claiming a subsequent item or instalment. The Rajah of Pittapur v. Sri Rajah Rau Buchi Sittaya Garu (1) referred to.

[149] A judgment liable to appeal or under appeal is only a provisional and not a definite or final adjudication, and cannot operate as res judicata during the interval preceding the appeal or the interval preceding the decision of the appeal. Explanation IV of s. 13 of the Civil Procedure Code, commented on. Sri Raja Kakarlapudi Suriyanarayanarazu v. Chellamkuri Chellamma (2) and Nilvaru v. Nilvaru (3) referred to.

The rule of res judicata contained in s. 13 of the Code applies equally to appeals and miscellaneous proceedings as to original suits. Having regard to its main object, so far as it relates to the re-trial of an issue, it refers not to the date of the commencement of the litigation, but to the date when the Judge is called upon to decide the issue. Where, after the commencement of the trial of an issue, a final judgment upon the same issue in another case is pronounced by a competent Court (the identity of parties and other conditions of s. 13 being fulfilled), such judgment operates as res judicata upon the decision, original or appellate, of the issue in the later litigation.

On the 17th August, 1885, a suit was instituted for recovery of an annual malikana allowance for the years 1290, 1291 and 1292 fasli. On the 5th October, 1885, the Munsif dismissed the suit. On the 10th March, 1886, the Subordinate Judge on appeal reversed the Munsif's decree, and decreed the suit. On the 21st June, 1886, the defendant appealed to the High Court, which, on the 4th July, 1887, reversed the Subordinate Judge's decree and restored that of the Munsif, on the ground that the plaintiff had never received and was not entitled to malikana. Meanwhile, on the 8th June, 1886, the plaintiff brought another suit against the defendant for recovery of malikana for the year 1293 fasli, which accrued after the institution of the former suit. By judgments dated respectively the 21st August and 27th November, 1886 the lower Courts decreed this suit, holding that the Subordinate Judge's decree of the 10th March, 1886, in the former suit, operated as res judicata and was conclusive in favour of the plaintiff's title to the malikana. On the 17th May, 1887, the defendant appealed to the High Court, and on the 16th May, 1888, (the High Court having, in the interval, dismissed the former suit by its judgment of the 4th July, 1887) the appeal came on for hearing.

Held (i) that the trial of the present suit by either of the lower Courts was not barred by s. 12 of the Civil Procedure Code by reason of the fact that, at the time of such trial in August and November, 1886, the previous litigation between the parties was pending in second appeal before the High Court.

(ii) that the lower Courts were wrong in holding that the Subordinate Judge's decree of the 10th March, 1886, in the former suit, which, at the date of the institution of the present suit on the 8th June, 1886, was liable to appeal, and, at the dates of the decisions of those Courts in August and November, 1886, was the subject of a second appeal pending in the High Court, could operate as res judicata in favour of the plaintiff's title to malikana.

[150] (iii) That the High Court's judgment dismissing the former suit on the 4th July, 1887, though passed after the decisions of the lower Courts in the present suit and after the institution of the second appeal in the present suit, was nevertheless binding on the High Court in deciding such second appeal, and being final, was conclusive as res judicata against the plaintiff's title to malikana.

(iv) That the effect of the High Court's judgment dismissing the former suit on the 4th July, 1887, was not affected by the circumstance that the second suit was brought for recovery of malikana for a different year, inasmuch as that judgment went to the root of the plaintiff's title to malikana, and its scope was not limited to the particular item then claimed.

THIS was a second appeal which came for hearing originally before Straight and Mahmood, JJ., who directed that it should be laid before the Chief Justice with a view to ultimate disposal by a Bench of three Judges. The facts are stated in the following order of reference:—

MAHMOOD, J.—In order to render the questions of law which arise in this case intelligible it is necessary to state the following facts:—

The plaintiff Pandit Kishan Lal is the purchaser of the rights and interests of one Bhagwanta who is alleged by him to have possessed zamindari rights in the village.

The defendants-appellants are muafidars of the village and, as such, in possession thereof. The plaintiff's contention is that the aforesaid Bhagwanta whom he now represents was entitled to a malikana allowance of Rs. 12 per annum recoverable from the defendants in their capacity of muafidars.

Upon these allegations the plaintiff instituted a suit against the defendants on the 17th August, 1885, for recovery of a sum of Rs. 30 as malikana allowance due in respect of 1290 F., 1291 F., 1292, F., but the suit was dismissed by the Munsif of Mathura on the 5th October, 1885. Upon appeal preferred on the 7th February, 1886, the Subordinate Judge of Agra (Babu Promoda Charan Banerji) reversed the Munsif's decree and decreed the claim on the 10th March, 1886. The Subordinate Judge's decree was, however, appealed to this Court, the appeal having been preferred on the 21st June, [151] 1886, and was numbered as second appeal No. 973 of 1886, and it came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Oldfield, who by his order of the 14th February, 1887, remanded the case under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure for trial of certain issues enunciated in that order.

In pursuance of that order findings were recorded by the new Subordinate Judge (Babu Kashi Nath Biswas) on the 25th April, 1887, and those findings came on before me along with the case for final disposal, and by my order of the 4th July, 1887, I reversed Babu Promoda Charan's decree of the 10th March, 1886, and restored the Munsif's decree of the 5th October, 1885, whereby the plaintiff's suit had been dismissed.

Thus ended the plaintiff's suit for the recovery of malikana in respect of the years 1290, 1291, and 1292 F., the effect of the adjudication (speaking generally) being that the plaintiff had never received the malikana allowance and was not entitled thereto.

Meanwhile the plaintiff, relying probably upon Babu Promoda Charan's appellate decree of the 10th March, 1886, instituted this suit on the 8th June, 1886, upon allegations similar to those on which the former suit proceeded, this suit being for recovery of Rs. 12 malikana allowance for the year 1293 F. The suit was resisted, so far as the merits are concerned, upon allegations similar to those on which the defence in the former suit proceeded. But in addition it was pleaded by the defendants that an appeal from Babu Promoda Charan's decree of 10th March, 1886, was, at the time when such defence was made, pending in this Court, and that therefore the trial of the present suit was barred by s. 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

On the other hand, the plaintiff contended that the judgment of Babu Promoda Charan, dated the 10th March, 1886, furnished a basis for holding that the plaintiff's right to recover the malikana allowance was res judicata, entitling the plaintiff to the benefit of conclusiveness and to a decree for the amount which he claimed in the present suit.

[152] The Court of first instance disallowed the defendants' contention in respect of s. 12 of the Civil Procedure Code upon the ground that the plaintiff's present claim was not barred by that section, because it related to a year (1293 fasli) later than the years to which the former litigation related. But that Court, accepting the contention of the plaintiff as to the conclusive effect of Babu Promoda Charan's appellate decree of the 10th March, 1886, passed in the former litigation, held that the judgment furnished conclusive proofs of the plaintiff's right to the malikana allowance and barred the re-trial of that issue for the purposes of this suit, and upon this ground alone that Court decreed the suit on the 21st August, 1886. The view of the law upon which that judgment proceeded was affirmed by the lower appellate Court, which also declined to enter into the merits of the case, feeling itself bound by Babu Promoda Charan's decree of the 10th March, 1886, i.e., the decree which I have already stated was reversed by this Court on the 4th July, 1887.

The decree of the lower appellate Court in this case relates to an appeal which had been preferred to that Court on the 13th September, 1886, and that appeal was dismissed by that Court on the 27th November, 1886.

It is from this last mentioned decree that this second appeal was preferred to this Court on the 17th May, 1887, and, being valued at less than Rs. 100, it came on for hearing before me sitting as a single Judge for disposal of such cases under the Court's rules of the 11th June, 1887, and it was under those rules that by my order of the 28th April, 1888, I referred the case to a Division Bench consisting of two Judges, and the case has accordingly been heard by my brother Straight and myself under the learned Chief Justice's order of the 1st May, 1888.

In my opinion the case raises grave questions of law with reference to s. 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as also to the rule of res judicata as defined in s. 13 of that Code, and it is with the approval of my brother Straight that I think that the case is a fit one to be referred for disposal to a Bench consisting of three Judges, [153] and with this recommendation I direct that the case be laid before the learned Chief Justice for such orders as he may deem fit to pass thereon as to the constitution of the Bench which is to dispose of the case.

I may, however, add that somewhat cognate questions were considered by the learned Chief Justice and myself in the case of Musammatt Shakina Bibi v. Sheikh Amiran and others (1) and by my brother Straight and myself in Musammatt Amman Bibi v. Rai Morari Das (2), and that in my opinion the exact effect of these cases should be considered when this case comes on for hearing before a Bench of three Judges as proposed.

STRAIGHT, J.—I agree.

By an order passed by the Chief Justice on the 18th May, 1888, the case was laid before a Bench consisting of Edge, C. J., and Straight and Mahmood, J.J.

Mr. Amir-ud-din, for the appellants.

Pandit Bishambhar Nath, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MAHMOOD, J.—The facts of this case, so far as they are necessary to indicate the points of law which arise therein, were set forth by me in my referring order of the 16th May last and I need not repeat them now.

In the case of Sita Ram v. Amir Begam (3) I dwelt at some length upon the question whether the plea of res judicata was an estoppel properly so called, and as such a rule of evidence, or simply a rule of procedure. I adopted the latter view, and the distinction has been duly recognised by the Indian Legislature, for we find res judicata enunciated, not in the Evidence Act but in the Code of Civil Procedure. S. 13 of that Code aims at enunciating the whole rule, and the aim has been substantially achieved, though my judgment in the case cited and the judgment of West, J., in Bholabhai v. Adesang (4) and the judgment of Melvill, J., in Nilvaru v. Nilvaru (5) [154] indicate illustrations of the difficulties which the wording of the section still leave open to doubt.

The present case furnishes another of these illustrations, and in dealing with it the most convenient course is to formulate the exact questions which have been raised in the course of the argument at the Bar. These questions seem to be the following:—

1. Was the trial of this "suit" either by the Court of first instance or by the lower appellate Court, barred by s. 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in consequence of the circumstance that the previous litigation between the parties was then pending in this Court as second appeal No. 973 of 1886, decided on the 4th July, 1887?

2. Does this Court's judgment of the 4th July, 1887, operate as res judicata, barring either the trial of this "suit" or of the "issue" as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to the malikana allowance which he failed to recover for the previous years in the litigation which ended in this Court's judgment of the 4th July, 1887?

So far as the first of these questions is concerned, it is scarcely necessary to say that the rule contained in s. 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure forms no part of the rule of res judicata, though the reason upon which it is based is in some respects similar in principle to the doctrine of res judicata. The distinction between the two rules, however, is vast. The rule in s. 12 relates to matters sub judice, whilst the rule in s. 13 relates to matters which have passed into rem judicatam. The one bars only a "suit" the other bars both the trial of a "suit," and of an "issue" subject to their respective conditions. Those conditions are not all the same in s. 12 as they are in s. 13, and the wording of the two sections as to the distinction is so clear that it is not easy to confound the two rules. Now, in s. 12 before the plea can operate as a bar, the second suit must not only raise the same issue as that in the former suit still pending, but it must be for "the same relief."

The former litigation sought recovery of the malikana allowance for the years 1290, 1291 and 1292 fasli. In the present case the relief prayed for is the recovery of malikana for the year 1293 fasli. [155] The "issue" as to the right of malikana is no doubt the same as that in the former litigation; but the relief is not the same, for the cause of action is different and the subject-matter is the malikana for the year 1293 fasli which accrued after the institution of the former suit. The object of the rule contained in s. 12 of the Code is to prevent Courts of concurrent jurisdiction from simultaneously entertaining and adjudicating upon two parallel litigations in respect of the same cause of action, the same subject-matter and the same relief. The policy of the law is to confine the plaintiff to one litigation, thus obviating the possibility of contradictory verdicts by two or more Courts in respect of "the same relief." For instance, if, in the present case, the earlier litigation had related to the malikana for 1293 fasli, the present "suit" would have been barred by s. 12 of the Code on account of the pendency of the earlier litigation. I use the word pendency as distinguished from that state of things when matters in controversy have passed the stage of lis pendens and have become res judicata by final adjudication.

Under this view of the law it is clear that the present "suit," which was instituted on the 8th June, 1886, for recovery of the malikana for 1293 fasli, was not barred under s. 12 of the Code, in consequence of the previous suit which related to the malikana for the earlier three years, the relief prayed for not being the same. This view seems to me to be somewhat similar to the conclusions, if not also the principles of the ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Bissessur Singh v. Gunput Singh (1). And I may add that it would be a most unsatisfactory rule of law to hold that the pendency of a litigation connected with the rent, malikana or any other demand for one year should bar a suit for a subsequent year; for if such were the rule, the prolongation of the earlier litigation might result in barring the later suit by lapse of the limitation period.

The distinction which I have explained between the rule contained in s. 12 and the rule of res judicata as enunciated in s. 13 of the Code leads me to the second question as formulated by me, namely, whether the trial of the issue as to the plaintiff's right of malikana [156] is barred as res judicata in consequence of this Court's judgment of 4th July, 1887, which terminated the earlier litigation (S. A. No. 973 of 1886).

It was not disputed at the Bar that that judgment has become "final" within the meaning of s. 13 of the Code. The effect of that judgment was to reverse the lower appellate Court's decree of the 10th March, 1886, and to dismiss the plaintiff's suit for the malikana of the previous years, to which that litigation related, upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove his title to recover any malikana allowance.

Now, there can be no doubt that for purposes of res judicata it is not essential that the subject-matter of the litigation should be identical with the subject-matter of the previous suit of which the adjudication is made the foundation of the plea, which plea, as I have already said, is extensive enough to bar a suit as well as the re-trial of an issue. The distinction between the two aspects of the plea must not be lost sight of, for it is of special significance in cases of recurring liabilities such as the present. The general rule of law may be briefly stated to be that where a recurring liability is the subject of a claim, a previous judgment dismissing the suit upon findings which fall short of going to the very root of the title upon which the claim rests, cannot operate as res judicata, but if such previous judgment does negative the title itself, the plaintiff cannot re-agitate the same question of title by suing to obtain relief for a subsequent item of the obligation. The rule is recognised both in England and in America, and is well illustrated by the American writers. Mr. Bigelow, in his well-known work on the law of estoppels (p. 45) referring to cases in which there has been no supervenient change in the relative position of the parties, goes on to say:—"Judgment based solely upon the validity of the demand and not upon facts in avoidance, such as payment or compromise, would doubtless operate as a bar. In the case of an action on a debt due by instalments, as for example on a promissory note, judgment against the validity of the main obligation itself would preclude the obligee from suing upon any of the instalments; but an adverse judgment [157] based upon grounds relating merely to a particular instalment sued upon could not in principle bar an action on another of them."

The same is the rule approved in Indian cases by the highest tribunals when such questions usually arise as to the amount of rent payable by the tenant, rent being of course a recurring liability. Perhaps the most important case enunciating the principle that identity of the subject matter of a suit is not an essential condition precedent to the applicability of the rule of res judicata, is the case of The Rajah of Pittapur v. Sri Rajah Rau Buchi Sittaya Garu (1), where their Lordships of the Privy Council, held, that, although the subsequent suit related to different property, a previous adjudication as to adoption, such adoption being a necessary element of the plaintiff's title, operated as res judicata barring the re-agitation and re-trial of the same issue in the subsequent litigation.

The principle seems to me to be fully applicable to the point argued in the present case, and I hold that if in the previous litigation any final adjudication as to the plaintiff's absence of title to receive malikana has been arrived at, the mere circumstance that that adjudication related to a claim of malikana for the earlier years will not prevent the application of the rule of res judicata.

This then is the first step leading to the real difficulty in the case. What has been argued for the plaintiff-respondent in this case is that on the 8th June, 1886, when the present suit was instituted, there did not exist any such final adjudication as would bar the trial of the suit or the issue, for the lower appellate Court's decree of the 10th March, 1886, in the former litigation was then still liable to second appeal, which appeal was indeed preferred on the 21st June, 1886, that is, about a fortnight after the institution of the suits. It has been contended on the basis of this circumstance that the last sentence of Explanation IV of s. 13 of the Civil Procedure Code requires us to hold that the rule of res judicata is wholly inapplicable to this litigation, because the previous adjudication at the date of the action was not final for the purpose of the plea. At the same time it has been contended on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent, as [158] an alternative argument, that if at the date of the institution of this suit the rule of res judicata was applicable thereto, the lower appellate Court's judgment in the previous litigation, namely the judgment of the 10th March, 1886, which decreed the plaintiff's suit, stood unreversed and was therefore final for the purpose of res judicata; and that therefore both the Courts below acted rightly in dealing with that adjudication as final in favour of the plaintiff's right to malikana and in decreeing this suit irrespective of this Court's judgment of the 4th July, 1887, which at the time of the institution of the present suit, or at the time when the Courts below were dealing with this case, had not come into existence.

(1) 12 I. A. 16.

Upon these alternative arguments it has been contended that one of two courses is open to us, either to uphold the lower Court's decrees decreeing this suit or to set aside those decrees and remand the case for trial de novo on the merits under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure, since both the Courts below having dealt with the judgment of the 10th March, 1886, as conclusive, have declined to try this suit upon the merits.

This argument raises two points for determination as matters of legal principle.

The first is, whether a judgment liable to appeal and which has not yet been appealed from, or an appeal from which is actually pending, can operate as res judicata during the interval preceding the appeal and the period during which the appeal is pending in a higher tribunal. This question distinctly arises in this case, because on the 8th June, 1886, when this suit was instituted, Babu Promoda Charan's decree of the 10th March, 1886, was liable to appeal, and was actually appealed on the 21st June, 1886.

I am of opinion that under such circumstances the decision of the 10th March, 1886, on which both the Courts below have relied for applying the rule of res judicata as barring the trial of the issue as to the plaintiff's right of malikana, cannot be regarded as "final" within the meaning of s. 13 of the Code of Civil Pro-[159]cedure. The latter part of the Explanation IV of that section has been framed in somewhat unspecific language, and runs as follows:—

"A decision liable to appeal may be final within the meaning of this section until the appeal is made."

The language of the section is silent as to what happens when an appeal has been preferred; and no doubt much depends upon the interpretation of two vague words "may" and "until" as they occur in the sentence which I have just quoted. I may perhaps say that more has been aimed at by that sentence than the few words of which that sentence consists could convey. What has been left unsettled by that sentence is the difficulty pointed out by a juristic Judge of such eminence as Mr. Justice Holloway of Madras in Sri Raja Kakarlapudi Suriyanarayanarazu Garu v. Chellamkuri Chellamma (1) when that learned Judge said:—

"In the lower Court it seems to have been taken for granted that the former judgment could not be conclusive because an appeal was pending. This is not in accordance with English law, as the judgment on the rejoinder in Doe v. Wright (1) shows. It would, however, be perfectly sound doctrine in the view of other jurists (Unger Oct. Priv. Recht, II, 603, Sav. Syst., 297, Seq. Waihier, II, 549). As an Englishman I should be sorry to invite a comparison between the reasons given by these great jurists for their and those embodied in the English cases for the contrary doctrine."

Not happening to be an Englishman myself, I may, though a member of the English Bar, respectfully regret that the learned Judge in delivering his judgment refrained from stating the comparison which he indicated. Such a comparison might have been useful in obviating the vagueness of the latter part of Explanation IV of s. 13 of the Civil Procedure Code, which vagueness has given rise to one of the difficulties in this case. And it is because of that difficulty that I feel myself free to put the best interpretation I can upon that sentence, so as to bring it in accord with what I regard as proper juristic reasons.

[160] I hold, so far as my knowledge of English law is concerned, that the point now under consideration is not settled by any long course of decision in England or India. Nor, as I have already indicated, has the Legislature in framing Explanation IV of s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure removed the doubt. As Mr. Justice Holloway has pointed out, the view of continental jurists is that judgments still liable to appeal and those that have actually been appealed from, the appeal being still pending, cannot operate as furnishing basis for the rule of res judicata. Pothier has devoted a whole chapter to the discussion of the subject (Law of Obligations, translated by Mr. D. Evans, vol. I, p. 534), and he points out that "a judgment to have the authority, or even the name of res judicata, must be a definitive judgment of condemnation or dismissal. A provisional condemnation then cannot have either the name or the authority of res judicata, for, although it gives the party obtaining it a right to compel the opposite party to pay or deliver provisionally the money or things demanded, it does not put an end to the cause, or form a presumption juris et de jure that what is ordered to be paid or delivered is due, since the party condemned, after satisfying the sentence, may be admitted in the principal cause to prove that what he was ordered to pay is not due," and consequently to obtain a revocation of the judgment. He then points out that judgments still liable to appeal stand, for the purpose of res judicata, on the same footing as provisional judgments, and that the effects of such judgments "are only momentary and cease as soon as an appeal is made. This is the case even where the sentence ought to be executed provisionally, notwithstanding the appeal, for such execution only gives the sentence the effect of provisional judgments, which, as we have already mentioned, have not the authority of res judicata."

I hold that the views thus expressed by Pothier and, as Mr. Justice Holloway has indicated, adopted by other continental jurists as to the doctrine of res judicata, are consistent with the interpretation which I place upon Explanation IV of s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure in relation to the authority of judgments still liable [161] to appeal. Such judgments are not definitive adjudications. They are only provisional, and not being final cannot operate as res judicata. Such indeed seems to be the view adopted by the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court when they said, in Nilvaru v. Nilvaru (2), "We consider that when the judgment of a Court of first instance upon a particular issue is appealed against, that judgment ceases to be res judicata and becomes res sub judice."

(1) 10 A. & E. 763.

(2) 6 B. 110.

In this case therefore, both the Courts below were wrong in law in holding that the previous judgment of the 10th March, 1886, which at the date of the institution of this suit was still liable to appeal, and which at the date of the decision of this suit by the first Court, as also at the date of the decision by the lower appellate Court, was the subject of a second appeal pending in this Court (S. A. No. 973 of 1886) could operate as res judicata in favour of the plaintiff in regard to his title as to the malikana.

If the difficulty of the case rested here, the proper decision of this appeal would, of course, be to decree this appeal and, setting aside the decrees of both the Courts below, to remand the case to the Court of first instance for trial upon the merits. But the matter requires consideration of the effect of my judgment in the former litigation, dated the 4th July, 1887. That judgment, as I have already said, did not exist when this suit was filed (8th June, 1886); it did not exist when first the Court decreed the plaintiff's claim (21st August, 1886); it did not exist when the appeal was preferred to the lower appellate Court (13th September, 1886); it did not exist when the appeal was dismissed by the lower appellate Court (27th November, 1886), on the ground of Babu Promoda Charan's decree of 10th March, 1886, which was reversed by my judgment. Nor did my judgment exist when this second appeal was preferred (17th May, 1887), the result being that both the appeal (S. A. No. 973 of 1886) in the former litigation and this appeal were pending at the same time in this Court till my judgment in the former case was passed on the 4th July, 1887.

[162] The question then is, what are we to do now in this case? Are we to accept my final judgment of the 4th July, 1887, (which terminated the former litigation) as res judicata, for purposes of dismissing this suit?

The question relates to the scope of the maxim pendente lite nihil innovetur. That the maxim governs alienations pendente lite cannot be doubted. Does it also relate to adjudications which have taken place during the pendency of one litigation in another litigation which, though commenced before, had not terminated when the present litigation was begun?

So far as I am aware, this exact question has not been settled by any definitely authoritative decision in England or in India. I am therefore not hampered by any case law on the subject, and feel myself free to adopt such views as I consider most consonant with legal principles.

It seems to me that the main object of the doctrine of res judicata is to prevent multiplicity of suits and interminable disputes between litigants, ne autem lites immortales essent, dum litigantes mortales sunt. This saying of Voet is in accord with the maxims nemo debet bis vexari pro una et eadem causa, and the broader maxim interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium. This being so, the doctrine, so far as it relates to prohibiting the re-trial of an issue, must refer not to the date of the commencement of the litigation, but to the time when the Judge is called upon to decide the issue. For even in cases where the Judge has commenced the trial of an issue which is also an issue in a pending litigation, a final judgment pronounced meanwhile in such previous litigation by a competent Court (the identity of parties and other conditions being satisfied) should operate as res judicata preventing the Judge dealing with the later litigation from adjudicating differently. If this is not done, it seems to me that the evil against which

1888. res judicata aims would not be removed and the doctrine itself would be Nov. 10. defeated. So far as the justification of this view from the provisions of the — Civil Procedure Code is concerned, I may say that the rule contained in APPEL- s. 13 is not [163] limited to the Courts of first instance, that it applies LATE equally to the procedure of the first and second appellate Courts by reason CIVIL. of ss. 582 and 587 respectively, and, indeed even to miscellaneous pro— ceedings by reason of the general provisions of s. 647 of the Code.

11 A. 148= Applying these views to the present case, the argument for the 9 A.W.N. plaintiff-respondent, whilst conceding that my judgment of the 4th July, (1889) 42= 1887, has become final, requires us either to hold, in spite of that judg-13 Ind. Jur. ment, that the plaintiff is entitled to the malikana right which that 309. judgment negatived, or to remand the case for trial of an issue which in a litigation between the same parties has already been settled against the plaintiff by a final adjudication.

I do not think that either of the alternatives suggested on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent can be adopted. We cannot to-day, when we are called upon to decide the issue as to the plaintiff's right of malikana, ignore my final judgment of the 4th July, 1887, which negatived that right in a previous litigation between the parties. Under the exigencies of the case, what the two lower Courts might have done is of no consequence, so far as the disposal of this appeal is concerned. They have acted irregularly in accepting Babu Promoda Charan's decree of 10th March, 1886, as a final adjudication, which has already been shown to be wanting in the requisites of a final adjudication within the meaning of Explanation IV of s. 13 of the Code. But so far as we are concerned in this case, we cannot ignore my judgment of the 4th July, 1887, nor can we remand the case for re-trial of the very issue which that judgment finally decided against the plaintiff's right of malikana.

I do not think that the law contemplates any such results. And after full consideration of the matter, I am glad to agree in the view which I understood the learned Chief Justice and my brother Straight to be inclined to adopt at the hearing, that for the purposes of disposing of this appeal we must regard my judgment of the 4th July, 1887, as conclusive against the plaintiff's right of malikana claimed in this suit, and that we should decree this appeal, [164] and setting aside the decrees of both the Courts below, dismiss the suit with costs in all the Courts.

I would order accordingly.

EDGE, C.J.—I concur.

STRAIGHT, J.—So do I.

Pre-emption—Mortgage by conditional sale—Foreclosure—Regulation XVII of 1806—Suit by mortgagee for possession—Compromise and decree thereon—Mortgagee accepting part of the property in suit—Suit for pre-emption—Pre-emptor not asserting or proving validity of foreclosure proceedings—Pre-emptor's title referred to date of compromise and decree—Purchase-money—Acquiescence of pre-emptor in transfer.

11 A. 164 =
9 A. W. N.
(1889) 48.

The mortgagee under a deed of conditional sale executed in 1878 took foreclosure proceedings under Regulation XVII of 1806, and, the year of grace having expired, a foreclosure proceeding was recorded on the 18th September, 1882, declaring the mortgage to have been foreclosed. In August, 1885, the mortgagee instituted a suit for possession of the mortgaged property. On the 19th September, 1885, the suit was compromised, the mortgagee accepting a part of the mortgaged property and relinquishing the remainder. A decree was passed in the terms of the compromise. Subsequently, a suit for pre-emption was brought against the mortgagor and mortgagee to enforce pre-emption in respect of the alienation. The plaintiff claimed to pre-empt the whole of the property to which the deed of 1878 related, including the portion relinquished by the conditional vendee under the compromise and decree of the 19th September, 1885.

Held that although, upon the expiration of the year of grace, the ownership of mortgaged property vested in a conditional vendee even though he might not have obtained a decree establishing or declaring his right, and the right of pre-emption accrued on the date when the conditional sale thus became absolute, yet foreclosure proceedings under the Regulation, being of a purely ministerial character, were not conclusive or even prima facie evidence in a subsequent litigation against the conditional vendor that a valid foreclosure had been duly effected; that strict observance of the requirements of the Regulation were conditions precedent to the right of foreclosure; and that, in the present case, as the plaintiff had not asserted or attempted to prove that all those requirements had been fulfilled so as to result in an actual [165] foreclosure and consequent accrual of pre-emption at the end of the year of grace, no foreclosure was shown to have taken place prior to the compromise of the 19th September, 1885, and the plaintiff's right of pre-emption accrued on and must be referred to that date, and consequently extended only to the property to which the compromise related, and the price payable by the plaintiff was the amount specified in the compromise. Bhādu Mahomed v. Radha Churn Bolia (1), Sheodeen v. Sookit (2), and Towakkul Rai v. Lachman Rai (3) distinguished. Norender Narain Singh v. Dwarka Lal Mundur (4) Madho Prashad v. Gajadhar (5), Sitla Bakhsh v. Lalta Prasad (6) and Jagat Singh v. Ram Bakhsh (7) referred to.

Acquiescence in a mortgage by conditional sale does not involve relinquishment of the right of pre-emption upon the conditional sale eventually becoming absolute.

THE fates of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court. The Hon. T. Conlan and Munshi Ram Prasad, for the appellants. Mr. C. Dillon and Munshi Sukh Ram, for the respondent.

In each of the villages Simra and Mahadewa three persons owned an eight pies share, and they executed three separate bai-bil-wafa mortgages in respect of their respective shares in both of the villages in favour of Sheodin Misr, on the 15th June, 1878.

The first mortgagor was Sital (now represented by Bodil, Ramcharit and Bhagmani), the second was Binda Prasad, and the third was Janki (now represented by Badri).

On the 22nd September, 1880, the mortgagee Sheodin took foreclosure proceedings under s. 8 of Regulation XVII of 1806 in respect of every one of the three mortgages, and the year of grace required by that Regulation having expired, a foreclosure proceeding was recorded on the 18th September, 1882, declaring the mortgages by conditional sale to have been foreclosed.

On the 20th August, 1885, the mortgagee Sheodin instituted three distinct suits for possession of the mortgaged properties, each [166] suit relating to each of the three bai-bil-wafa mortgages above-mentioned respectively. The suits were, however, compromised on the 19th September, 1885, and the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has found that "at the time of the compromise the amount of the debt due on the first bond (the original consideration of which was Rs. 782-4-0) had amounted to Rs. 1,051-8-0; similarly the debt due on the second bond (original consideration Rs. 595), amounted to Rs. 1,062, and that of the third bond (original consideration Rs. 461-7-0), amounted to the sum of Rs. 824-11-0. The compromise was to the effect that the vendee had accepted in each case 8 pies in mauza Simra and 4 pies in Mahadewa in full payment, and had agreed to release 4 pies of Mahadewa in each case. Decree was given in terms of the compromise."

The transactions above-mentioned have resulted in this litigation, initiated by two sets of pre-emptors in respect of each of the three bai-bil-wafa mortgages above-mentioned.

The first set of pre-emptors are (1) Ajaib Nath, (2) Kunjbehari, (3) Brijmohan, who jointly instituted three separate suits in respect of each of the three alienations. These three suits were instituted on the 8th September, 1886, against the heirs of the conditional vendors and Sheodin, the vendee.

Similarly on the 2nd November, 1886, Mathura Prasad instituted three rival suits for enforcement of pre-emption in respect of the same alienation.

There were thus two rival pre-emptive suits in respect of each alienation, and the rival pre-emptors were alternately impleaded as defendants to each other's suits—a procedure which is in conformity with the principles upon which the rulings of this Court in Kashi Nath v. Mukhta Prasad (1) and Hulasi v. Sheo Prasad (2) proceed.

The Court of first instance in dealing with the contentions of the parties, held that the right of pre-emption as claimed could not accrue till foreclosure of the mortgage by conditional sale; that [167] "the foreclosure proceedings were in a state of suspense" till the mortgagee Sheodin obtained a decree for foreclosure on the compromise of 19th September, 1885; that since under that compromise foreclosure took place in respect of 8 pies share in Simra and only 4 pies share in mauza Mahadewa to the exclusion of the remaining 4 pies share in the latter village which had been reserved by the compromise from foreclosure, such reserved 4 pies share was not subject to pre-emption. That Court therefore decreed the pre-emptive suit only in respect of 8 pies share in Simra and 4 pies share in Mahadewa, allotting three shares to the three plaintiffs, Ajaib Nath, &c., and one share to their rival pre-emptor Mathura Prasad—a procedure in conformity with the ruling of this Court in Jai Ram v. Mahabir Rai (1) where it was held that where there are rival suits for pre-emption the rights of the rival pre-emptors are to be taken as equal per capita with reference to the number of the pre-emptors and not with reference to the extent of their shares in the village.

(1) 6 A. 370.

(2) 6 A. 455.

As to the price payable by the pre-emptors, the first Court held that the full amounts due on the three mortgages at the time of the compromise of 19th September, 1885, furnished the proper standard of calculation.

In accordance with these findings the first Court decreed all the six suits, and, taking each couple of rival suits, framed decrees upon the principles explained by this Court in Kashi Nath v. Mukhta Prasad (2), enabling each set of rival pre-emptors to obtain a proportionate share of the pre-empted property, and in default of either set of pre-emptors, to pre-empt the whole property.

From the first Court's decrees no appeal appears to have been preferred to the lower appellate Court by the rival pre-emptor Mathura or by Sheodin, vendee, or by any of the vendors, and these parties must, therefore, be taken to have accepted the first Court's decree.

The pre-emptors Ajaib Nath, Kunjbehari and Brijmohan, however, appealed to the lower appellate Court, contending that the [168] first Court had wrongly excluded the 4 pies of Mahadewa which had been reserved from foreclosure under the compromise of 19th September, 1885, from their pre-emptive claim; that the rival pre-emptor Mathura had by acquiescence lost his right of pre-emption: that the price found by the first Court was excessive, since the vendee Sheodin was entitled only to such as was due on the three bai-bil-wafa mortgages at the expiry of the year of grace, and not to any sum as interest for the subsequent period. On the other hand, Mathura, the rival pre-emptor, who was impleaded as respondent in all the six appeals, filed objections under s. 561 of the Civil Procedure Code claiming a preferential right of pre-emption, and contending that the first Court should have allotted shares to the pre-emptors not per capita, but with reference to the extent of the shares of each pre-emptor in the village.

The lower appellate Court disallowed all these contentions with the exception of that relating to the 4 pies share of Mahadewa in respect of which the first Court had dismissed all the pre-emptive suits. The lower appellate Court held that "as the conditional vendors failed to redeem within the year of the grace, the sales on the expiration of that year became absolute. From that moment the vendee could have claimed to be put in possession of the whole of the property entered in the conditional deed. The pre-emptor was entitled to claim whatever the vendee could claim, and it was out of the power of the vendor and vendee to make any change in the conditions of the contract which could affect the rights of the pre-emptor."

For this opinion the learned Judge relied on a ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Bhadu Mahomed v. Radha Churn Bolia (3) and an old ruling of the Agra Sadr Court in Sheodeen v. Sookit (4) which go to show that when pre-emption has once accrued, no subsequent dissolution of the sale can affect the pre-emptor's right of pre-emption. Following these rulings, the learned Judge decreed the three appeals of Ajaib and others (Nos. 32, 33 and 34) as far as they related to the reserved 4 pies of Mahadewa, and accordingly [169] modified the first Court's decrees in those three cases by declaring that Ajaib and others were entitled to get possession of three-fourths of 8 pies in Mahadewa and not of 4 pies only as decreed by the first Court.

The three appeals of Ajaib, &c., (Nos. 29, 30 and 31) which had arisen from the suits in which their rival pre-emptor Mathura was plaintiff, were dismissed by the learned Judge with the exception of a small modification as to costs.

In this Court three sets of appeals have been preferred, each set consisting of three appeals.

Appeals Nos. 1288, 1290 and 1291 have been preferred by Ajaib and others, &c., and relate to the decrees in the three pre-emptive suits in which their rival pre-emptor Mathura was plaintiff. The second set of appeals, namely, Nos. 1286, 1287, 1289, have also been presented by them and relate to the decrees in the suits in which their rival pre-emptor Mathura was a defendant and they themselves were plaintiffs.

The third set of appeals, Nos. 1342, 1343 and 1344, have been preferred by the vendors and are restricted to complaining of so much of the lower appellate Court's decree as allowed pre-emption in respect of the 4 pies share of Mahadewa which had been expressly reserved for them by the compromise of the 19th September, 1885.

Such then being the nature of the entire litigation which these nine connected appeals present to me, and having heard them all, I think it will be convenient to dispose of the six appeals of Ajaib and others together, as they have been preferred upon the same grounds of appeal and raise the same points for decision. They are further connected together because in all of them the rival pre-emptor Mathura, being respondent, has preferred objections under s. 561 of the Civil Procedure Code, contending that his right of pre-emption is preferential to that of Ajaib and others, and suits of the latter should therefore have been dismissed by the lower Courts.

The first and the most important question in the case, however, has been raised by the three appeals of the vendors, namely, appeals [170] Nos. 1342, 1343 and 1344. The question is whether the lower appellate Court was right in holding that under the circumstances of this case the right of pre-emption could be claimed by either set of rival pre-emptors in respect of the 4 pies share in Mahadewa which had been released from the foreclosure by the mortgagee Sheodin under the terms of the compromise of the 19th September, 1885.

Mr. Jogindro Nath Chaudhri who has appeared on behalf of the appellants-vendors has argued that the original bai-bil-wafa mortgages of the 15th June, 1878, having been executed whilst Regulation XVII of 1806 was in force, those mortgages could not be foreclosed without due performance of the preliminary steps required by s. 8 of that Regulation, and a decree of Court rendering such sale absolute, that the foreclosure proceedings were therefore ineffective till the compromise of 19th September, 1885, and the decree passed thereon, and that the compromise being thus conclusive and binding upon the mortgagors and the mortgagee, it also concludes the pre-emptors, and precludes them from claiming pre-emption in respect of the 4 pies share of Mahadewa which that compromise released from foreclosure and reserved for the mortgagors.

On the other hand, Mr. Ram Prasad who has ably argued these cases on behalf of his clients Ajaib and others, has contended that a foreclosure decree is not a condition precedent to rendering a bai-bil-wafa mortgage absolute under Regulation XVII of 1806, and that such conditional sales became absolute ipso facto by the mere lapse of the year of grace after proceedings have been taken under s. 8 of the Regulation. Upon this contention the learned pleader argues that the foreclosure proceedings taken by the mortgagee Sheodin by his applications of the 22nd September, 1880, and which terminated in the foreclosure rubkari of 18th September, 1882, were sufficient to make the sales absolute at the expiry of the year of grace, that at that time the right of pre-emption accrued to the pre-emptors in respect of the whole of the properties, and such right of pre-emption could not be defeated or restricted by any subsequent act of the mortgagor and mortgagee such as the compromise of 19th Septem-[171]ber, 1885, and that therefore the vendors-appellants are precluded from questioning the propriety of the foreclosure proceedings of 18th September, 1882.

I am of opinion that both these contentions go much too far in the direction at which they aim. In the case of Tawakkul Rai v. Lachman Rai (1), I stated my reasons and authorities for holding that on the expiration of the year of grace allowed by Regulation XVII of 1806, the ownership of the mortgaged property vests absolutely in the mortgagee, even though he might not have obtained a decree establishing or declaring his right, and that for purposes of pre-emption the date at which the conditional sale thus becomes absolute is the period of the accrual of pre-emption and cannot be effected by any foreclosure proceedings which may subsequent to such accrual be taken by the mortgagee. I still adhere to the same views, and while they, on the one hand, answer Mr. Chaudhri's contention as to the necessity of a foreclosure decree, they on the other hand, preclude Mr. Ram Prasad's contention that foreclosure proceedings such as the rubkar of 18th September, 1882, are conclusive or binding in any sense upon the vendors when the question is litigated whether or not a valid foreclosure has taken place. Such proceedings are of a purely ministerial character, and far from being conclusive are not even prima facie evidence of foreclosure having been duly effected. This matter is settled by the ruling of the Privy Council in Norender Narain Singh v. Dwarka Lall Mundur (2). Again, their Lordships in Madho Prasad v. Gajadhar (3) have laid down that the provisions of s. 8 of Regulation XVII of 1806, are not merely directory but imperative as conditions precedent to the right of foreclosure itself. How strict an observance of those requirements is necessary has been well stated by my brother Straight in Sitla Bakhsh v. Lalta Prasad (4) in observations with which I so entirely concur that they leave nothing for me to add.

Now such being the law, no attempt has been made by Mr. Ram Prasad's clients, Ajaib and others, pre-emptors, either to assert or [172] prove that in the foreclosure proceedings which ended in the rubkar of 18th September, 1882, all the requirements of the Regulation were satisfied, so as to result in an actual foreclosure at the expiry of the year of grace. The Court of first instance disregarded those proceedings, holding them to be "in a state of suspense," which phrase I understand to mean that actual foreclosure had not taken place. I cannot help feeling that the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court in dissenting from the first Court's views upon this point had not present to his mind the exact and stringent requirements of the law of foreclosure under the Regulation, and that he took it for granted that because the foreclosure proceedings of the 18th September, 1882, had been recorded, therefore foreclosure necessarily took place and gave birth to the plaintiff's right of pre-emption in respect of the alienations. He assumes that the sale became absolute by the mere expiry of the year of grace.

Not only is this assumption unwarranted by the circumstances of the case, but the fact that notwithstanding the expiry of the year of grace the mortgagee, Sheodin, neither acquired possession nor sued for foreclosure till the 20th August, 1885, points to quite the opposite conclusion. It was on that day that he instituted his regular suits for possession against the vendors, and it was in that litigation that the compromise of the 19th September, 1885, was entered into declaring 8 pies of mauza Simra and 4 pies of Mahadewa to have passed to the mortgagee in full proprietorship, to the exclusion of the remaining 4 pies of Mahadewa which was released by the mortgagee and reserved by the mortgagors.

It has, indeed, been asserted in this litigation that these proceedings were all fraudulent and collusive with the object of defeating the plaintiffs' right of pre-emption. But no circumstances have been proved which would in law even amount to the indicia of fraud or collusion. The plaintiffs' right of pre-emption, if their theory of foreclosure proceedings, of 1880, were correct, would have been asserted before, at least, the suit of the 20th August, 1885; but, far from such being the case, it is not shown that any such assertion of pre-emption was made till after the compromise of 19th [173] September, 1885. Indeed, even after that compromise the plaintiffs waited more than a year before claiming pre-emption.

I am, therefore, of opinion that till the compromise of 19th September, 1885, no foreclosure of the bai-bil-wafa mortgages is shown to have taken place, that the compromise is not shown to be other than a bona fide transaction, that the plaintiffs' right of pre-emption must be referred to that date, that since by that compromise foreclosure took place only in respect of 8 pies of Simra and 4 pies of Mahadewa to the exclusion of the remaining 4 pies of the latter village, no right of pre-emption accrued to the plaintiffs in respect of such reserved 4 pies share of Mahadewa. And it follows that the lower appellate Court acted erroneously in interfering with the first Court's decree in this respect, also that the two rulings Bhadu Mahomed v. Radha Charan Bolia (1), Sheodin v. Sookit (2) on which the lower appellate Court has relied have no application to the facts of this case. In those cases the sales were absolute, the right of pre-emption had been asserted, and the question was whether subsequent dissolution of the sale could affect the pre-emptor's right. The result of these views will be that I shall decree the three appeals of the vendors-appellants, namely, appeals Nos. 1342, 1343, 1344.

These findings simplify the disposal of the grounds urged in the six appeals of Ajaib Nath, Kunjbehari and Brijmohan, who throughout this litigation have shown themselves unwilling to take a reasonable view of their right of pre-emption. They have been endeavouring not only to prevent their rival pre-emptor Mathura from having his share of the pre-emptive right but also to oust the original proprietors from the 4 pies share in Mahadewa which even the mortgagee Sheodin saved from foreclosure by the compromise of 19th September, 1885.

(1) 4 B. L. R. A. C. p. 129.

(2) S. D. A. N. W. P. R. 1864, Vol. I, p. 624.

The first ground urged in support of their appeals is that inasmuch as their rival pre-emptor Mathura (who is respondent in all the six appeals) was content with the first Court's decree and did not appeal in respect of the 4 pies share of Mahadewa, therefore the [174] entire 4 pies share should have been allotted to them in virtue of their right of pre-emption. After what I have said in respect of the appeals by the vendors in whose favour that 4 pies share was reserved, it is wholly unnecessary for me to discuss the matter any further, beyond saying that since I have held that share to have been rightly excluded by the first Court from these pre-emptive claims, neither Ajaib and others nor Mathura can take any portion of that reserved share. For the same reasons it is unnecessary to discuss the question raised in the second ground common to all these six appeals, where it is contended that Mathura, respondent, having taken no exception to the amount of the sale consideration adjudicated upon by the first Court, is not entitled to the benefit of any reduction therein upon the appellants' case.

The third ground of appeal, which is also common to all the six appeals, is that the respondent Mathura "having acquiesced in the transfer of the shares sued for cannot pre-empt in respect of the same." This ground of appeal was, indeed, abandoned by Mr. Ram Prasad, but I will dispose of it by simply saying that the plea of acquiescence is based entirely upon the circumstance that Mathura was a witness to two out of the three bai-bil-wafa mortgages of the 15th June, 1878, and that the lower appellate Court was right in holding that acquiescence in a mortgage by conditional sale does not either imply or involve the foregoing of the right to pre-empt should the conditional sale eventually become absolute.

There remains only one more ground of appeal, which is limited to the three appeals (Nos. 1286, 1287, 1289) to which the vendee Sheodin is respondent, and it is against him that the plea aims. In that ground of appeal it is urged that the appellants were entitled to pre-empt the property "on payment of the amount due up to the date when the year of grace expired and could not be charged with any sum accruing since that date." This plea proceeds of course entirely upon the assumption (which I have already refuted), namely, that the bai-bil-wafa mortgages became absolute by reason of the foreclosure proceedings of 1880 and 1882, and by making the conditional sales absolute gave birth to the plaintiffs' [175] right of pre-emption. The plea also assumes that the compromise of the 19th September, 1885, is of no consequence as determining either the point of time when pre-emption accrued or the amount of price which must be taken to be the consideration in lieu of which the conditional sales became absolute. But I have already said enough to show that there is nothing to vitiate the compromise, and both the Courts below have concurred in finding that the allegations of fraud as to the amount of consideration were not substantiated. Mr. Ram Prasad has relied upon my ruling in Tawakkul Rai v. Lachman Rai (1) where I held that a person claiming a right of pre-emption in cases of mortgage by conditional sale was bound to pay the entire amount due on such mortgages at the time when they became absolute, and that they became absolute at the expiration of the year of grace required by Regulation XVII of 1806. ruling does not help the appellant's case, because there the due foreclosure of the mortgage according to the requirements of the Regulation was an admitted fact, and therefore naturally the period of the expiry of the year of grace and the amount due on the mortgage regulated both the foreclosure and the accrual of pre-emption, and indeed would also have regulated the amount of price payable by the pre-emptor, had it not been that the pre-emptors sued not upon the ground of that foreclosure but upon the ground of a subsequent transfer (vide p. 350 of the report). So far as the question of the amount of consideration is concerned, perhaps the case most similar to the present is that of Jagat Singh v. Ram Bakhsh(1) where pre-emption was claimed in respect of a mortgage by conditional sale, foreclosure proceedings had been taken, a suit for possession had been instituted by the mortgagee and had ended in a compromise whereby half the property was released by the mortgagee, and the other half was foreclosed, for a price mentioned in the compromise, and the pre-emptive suit related to such latter half. In that case I held, as I have held here, that the price payable by the pre-emptor was the amount mentioned in the compromise.

[176] For these reasons all the six appeals of Ajaib and others must stand dismissed. In every one of them Mathura the rival pre-emptor has filed objections under s. 561 of the Civil Procedure Code, claiming a preferential right of pre-emption. The objections were expressly abandoned by his learned counsel Mr. Dillon, and I need only say that even if they had been pressed they could not have succeeded, because they raise a question of fact, which has been decided, against him by the Courts below, the lower appellate Court having clearly found that there was no evidence in support of the pretension of a right of pre-emption superior to that of Ajaib and others. The objections will therefore be dismissed.

This second appeal (No. 1288) is dismissed with costs, and also the objections which Mathura, respondent, has filed under s. 561 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Appeals dismissed.

S. 27 of the Letters Patent for the High Court of the N.W. Provinces has been superseded in those cases only to which s. 575 of the Civil Procedure Code properly and without straining language applies. There are many cases to which s. 575, even with the aid of s. 647, does not apply; and to these s. 27 of the Letters Patent is still applicable.

One of the cases to which s. 575 of the Code does not apply is where a preliminary objection being taken to the hearing of a first appeal before the High Court on the ground that the appeal is time-barred, the Judges of the Division Bench differ in opinion as to whether the appellant has shown sufficient cause, within the meaning of s. 5 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) for not presenting the appeal within the prescribed period. The decision of such a preliminary objection is not a "hearing" of the appeal, but precedes the hearing, or determines that there is no appeal which the Court can hear or decide. Where such a preliminary objection is allowed, it cannot [177] be said that the Court which, by reason of the Limitation Act, has no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, should nevertheless "affirm" the decree of the Court below. In the case of such a preliminary objection and such a difference of opinion (the Bench being equally divided), the opinion of the senior Judge should, under s. 27 of the Letters Patent, prevail.

Appaji Bhivray v. Shiwilall Khubchand (1) and Gossami Sri Sri Gridhariji Maharaj Tikait v. Purushotum Gossami (2) distinguished.

Where, in such a case, the provisions of the second paragraph of s. 575 of the Code were erroneously applied, and the judgment of the junior Judge holding that the appeal should be dismissed as time-barred, prevailed, and the Court, on appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent, affirmed such judgment,—held that, under the circumstances, there was a mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, and that there was sufficient cause for granting a review of the Court's decree, under s. 623 of the Code.

For the purpose of ascertaining the court-fee to be paid under sch. i, art. 5 of the Court-fees Act (VII of 1870) upon an application to review an appellate decree, the fee to be considered is the fee leviable on the memorandum of the appeal in which the decree sought to be reviewed was passed, and not the fee which was leviable on the plaint nor—where the decree sought to be reviewed was passed on appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent from an appellate judgment of a Division Bench—the fee which was leviable on the memorandum of the appeal before such Bench.

[N. B. Read in this connection, 9 A. 11 and 9 A. 655.]

THIS was an application under s. 623 of the Civil Procedure Code for review of a judgment of Edge, C. J., and Straight and Brodhurst, JJ., which will be found reported in I. L. R., 9 All. 655. That judgment was delivered on an appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent from a judgment of Mahmood, J., in which his Lordship differed in opinion from Tyrrell, J., Mahmood, J., holding that the appeal before the Division Bench should be dismissed as barred by limitation, and Tyrrell, J., that "sufficient cause" for an extension of time had been shown by the appellant within the meaning of s. 5 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) and that the appeal should be heard and determined on the merits. The judgments of Tyrrell and Mahmood, JJ., in which the facts of the case were stated, will be found reported in I. L. R., 9 All. 11.

The Division Bench hearing the appeal thus differing in opinion the appeal was, with reference to the second paragraph of s. 575 of the Civil Procedure Code, dismissed; and the appeal under s. 10 of [178] the Letters Patent was argued and decided upon the assumption that s. 575 was applicable to the case, and that, in accordance with it, the judgment of Mahmood, J., maintaining that of the Court below, determined the appeal before the Division Bench. In the result, the appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent was dismissed, the Court agreeing with Mahmood, J.

The present application was for review of this judgment, upon grounds which are fully explained in the judgment of Edge, C. J., now reported.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—This application for a review of judgment arises in this way. The first appeal in the suit was admitted to the file of first appeals by my brother Tyrrell. When that first appeal came on to be heard by my brother Tyrrell and my brother Mahmood, a preliminary objection on behalf of the respondents to the appeal being heard, that the appeal was time-barred, was taken. My brother Tyrrell was of opinion that the appellant had shown sufficient cause for not presenting the appeal within the prescribed time. My brother Mahmood was of the contrary opinion; and applying the provisions of s. 575 of the Code of Civil Procedure and s. 4 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, to the case, the appeal was dismissed with costs as being time-barred. By the decree which was drawn up, the appeal was dismissed with costs, and the decree from which that appeal had been brought was affirmed.

From that decree, or rather from the judgment or order of my brother Mahmood, an appeal was brought by the appellant under s. 10 of the Letters Patent which apply to this Court. The last-mentioned appeal, which was a pauper appeal, was heard by my brother Straight, my brother Brodhurst, and me, and we agreeing with the judgment of my brother Mahmood that the appellant had not shown sufficient cause for not presenting the first appeal within [179] time, dismissed the appeal to us. This application to us is to review our decree.

Pandit Sundar Lal kindly understood at our request to assist the Court by arguing the case for the applicant. Pandit Bishambhar Nath for some of the respondents took the preliminary objection that the application for review was insufficiently stamped, in that it was not stamped with one-half the fee which was leviable on the first appeal. We overruled that objection, holding that as the application for review had been presented before the ninetieth day from the date of the decree which we were asked to review, art. 5 of sch. i of the Court-fees Act applied, and that for the purpose of ascertaining the Court-fee to be paid on an application to review a decree passed in appeal, the fee which must be considered was the fee leviable on the memorandum of the appeal in which the decree sought to be reviewed was passed, and not the fee which was leviable on the plaint, or, as in this case, on the first appeal.

Pandit Sunder Lal contended that the appeal which we had decided must have prevailed if we had not omitted to consider the provisions of s. 27 of the Letters Patent, and that the question which we ought to have decided was not that which we did decide, namely, that the appellant had not shown sufficient cause for not presenting the first appeal within the prescribed time, but the question whether or not my brother Tyrrell and my brother Mahmood should not have proceeded to hear the first appeal on the merits, as my brother Tyrrell, who was the senior Judge, had decided that the appellant had shown sufficient cause for not presenting the first appeal within time. He contended that s. 575 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not apply to a case like the present, and consequently that s. 27 of our Letters Patent governed the procedure. On the other hand, Mr. Ross for some of the respondents and Pandit Bishambhar Nath for the others, contended that s. 575 of the Code of Civil Procedure had superseded s. 27 of the Letters Patent so far as our appellate jurisdiction is concerned. They relied on Appaji Bhivray v. Shivilall Khubchand (1) and Gossami Sri Sri Gri- [180] dhariji Maharaj Tickait v. Purushotum Gossami (2) and s. 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In the Bombay case, the Court held that the corresponding section of their Letters Patent was superseded by s. 575 of Act X of 1877, so far as regards cases to which s. 575 was applicable, and that s. 575 was extended to miscellaneous proceedings of the nature of appeals by s. 647, with which decision I entirely agree. In the Calcutta case, the Court agreed with the view taken by the Bombay High Court in Appaji Bhivray v. Shivilall Khubchand (1). I may remark that in each of these cases, s. 575 of the Code of Civil Procedure was applicable.

The material words in s. 27 of our Letters Patent are, "and if such Division Bench is composed of two or more Judges, and the Judges are divided in opinion as to the decision to be given on any point, such point shall be decided according to the opinion of the majority of the Judges if there shall be a majority; but if the Judges should be equally divided, then the opinion of the senior Judge shall prevail."

If s. 27 of our Letters Patent applied, my brother Tyrrell and my brother Mahmood should have proceeded to hear the appeal and should not have dismissed the appeal on the ground that it was beyond time.

The real question for us to decide is whether s. 575 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies to this case.

According to the well established practice of this Court, it is open to a respondent, when an appeal is called on for hearing, to take the preliminary objection to the appeal being heard, that the appeal was time barred when the memorandum of appeal was presented to the Court for admission on the file, and such preliminary objection is decided upon before the hearing of the appeal is proceeded with. In such cases there is in fact no hearing of the appeal unless and until the Court has overruled such preliminary [181] objection. When such preliminary objection is taken, the question is whether there is before the Court an appeal which can, having exclusive regard to the provisions of the Indian Limitation Act, be heard. When the preliminary objection is sustained, it cannot be said that the appeal has been heard or decided. In such a case all that can be decided is that there is no appeal before the Court which the Court can hear or decide.

An examination of s. 575 in my opinion shows that that section cannot apply to a case like the present. The second paragraph of that section provides that "if there be no such majority which concurs in a judgment varying or reversing the decree appealed against, such decree shall be affirmed." In such a case as the present, unless s. 27 of our Letters Patent applies, there could be no judgment at all varying, reversing or affirming the decree. It could not possibly have been the intention of the Legislature that a Court should decree that a decree against which there was by reason of the Indian Limitation Act no appeal for the Court to hear, should be affirmed; in other words, that a Court which, by reason of the Indian Limitation Act, had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, should nevertheless affirm the decree below.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that in such a case it would be the duty of the Judges differing to act in accordance with the provisions of the third paragraph of s. 575. I do not see that any such duty is imposed on Judges differing, and if there is any such duty, that paragraph applies only to cases in which "the Bench differ in opinion on a point of law," in which case only can the Bench differing in opinion make such a reference.

Assume, for the purposes of argument, that in the present case my brother Tyrrell and my brother Mahmood were agreed that the cause alleged by the appellant was, if proved, sufficient cause for the appellant not presenting the appeal within the prescribed time, but that whilst my brother Tyrrell was of opinion that the cause alleged was proved in fact, my brother Mahmood was of opinion that it was not in fact proved. In that event, no such reference [182] as is provided for by the third paragraph of s. 575 could be made, as the Bench had not differed on a point of law.

There are many cases to which, in my opinion, s. 575 could not apply, even with the aid of s. 647. For example, suppose that an application is made to this Court under the first paragraph of s. 545 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the two Judges constituting the Bench before which the application is heard differ in opinion as to whether "substantial loss may result to the party applying for stay of execution unless the order is made." What is to happen unless s. 27 of our Letters Patent applies? If s. 27 does not apply, the application could neither be rejected nor granted; there would be no decree or order to affirm; and there would be no power to refer the question under the third paragraph of s. 575; in fact the Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction under s. 545 of the Code of Civil Procedure would be brought to a dead-lock.

Similar difficulties might arise on an application for a certificate to appeal to Her Majesty in Council, and in many other cases.

I am of opinion that s. 27 of our Letters Patent is superseded in those cases only to which s. 575 of the Code of Civil Procedure properly, and without straining language, applies, and that this is not one of those cases. I am consequently of opinion that, on the preliminary objection to the hearing of the first appeal which was taken before my brother Tyrrell and my brother Mahmood, the opinion of my brother Tyrrell should have prevailed, and the hearing of the appeal should have proceeded on the merits according to law. I am also of opinion that, under these circumstances, there is a mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, and that there is sufficient reason for our granting this application for review of our decree, and that we should grant this application.

As the counsel and vakils in the case do not desire to be further heard on the re-hearing of the appeal to which this order of mine applies, we now proceed to dispose of the appeal.

[183] For the reasons already stated, I am of opinion that the decree appealed against should be set aside, and that the first appeal in this case should be reinstated on the file of pending appeals, and should be heard and decided according to law, and that the costs of this application and of the appeal to us should abide the result of the determination of the first appeal.

STRAIGHT, J.—I agree.

BRODHURST, J.—I concur.

The competency of a person to testify as a witness is a condition precedent to the administration to him of an oath or affirmation, and is a question distinct from that of his credibility when he has been sworn or has affirmed. In determining the question of competency, the Court, under s. 118 of the Evidence Act, has not to enter into inquiries as to the witness's religious belief, or as to his knowledge of the consequences of falsehood in this world or the next. It has to ascertain, in the best way it can, whether, from the extent of his intellectual capacity and understanding, he is able to give a rational account of what he has seen or heard or done on a particular occasion. If a person of tender years or of very advanced age can satisfy these requirements, his competency as a witness is established.

Having regard to the language of the Oaths Act (X of 1873) a Court has no option, when once it has elected to take the statements of a person as evidence, but to administer to such person either an oath or affirmation as the case may require, Queen-Empress v. Maru (1), referred to.

In a trial for murder before the Court of Session, one of the witnesses was a boy of twelve years of age, and, in answer to questions put by the Sessions Judge, he said that he worshipped Debi and understood the difference between truth and falsehood, that he did not know what would be the consequences here or hereafter of telling lies, but that he would tell the truth. The Sessions Judge proceeded to record the boy's statement, but without administering to him any oath or affirmation.

[184] Held that there was nothing in the law to sanction this procedure on the part of the Judge.

The High Court required the attendance of the boy and of the accused, and, having satisfied itself of the competency of the former to depose as a witness, examined him as to his account of what had occurred.

JUDGMENT,

STRAIGHT, J.—This is an appeal from a capital conviction of the Sessions Judge of Cawnpore, and the case also comes before us for confirmation of the sentence of death passed upon the appellant under the provisions of the statute. The appellant was charged with having, upon the 25th July, 1888, at a village called Garahya, in the Cawnpore district, murdered Musammatt Mathuria, his wife. The committing Magistrate in sending the case for trial, among the other witnesses whose depositions had been taken, recorded the deposition of a boy of the name of Churia, the son of the appellant, and his evidence, if true, was of the most vital
